CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

DEBATES AND PROCEEDINGS OF THE FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS.

SPECIAL SESSION OF THE SENATE.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 5, 1875.

The VICE PRESIDENT of the United States (Hon. HENRY WILSON, of Massachusetts) called the Senate to order at twelve o'clock noon.

Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Almighty and everlasting God, the maker of heaven and earth, we come in this place to acknowledge and to worship Thee, for with Thee are all our beginnings and all our endings. And now, as Thy servants have assembled here to commence a new chapter in the history of this body, we humbly entreat Thee, regard them with Thy favor. Give to each of them life, and health, and strength. Give them to see eye to eye in all the grave matters of this nation committed to their charge, and in all their labors and responsibilities may they lean upon Thy arm for support. Through Jesus Christ. Amen.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proclamation of the President of the United States convening the Senate will be read.

The Chief Clerk (W. J. McDONALD, esq.) read the following proclamation:

By the President of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas objects of interest to the United States require that the Senate should be convened at twelve o'clock on the 5th day of March next, to receive and act upon such communications as may be made to it on the part of the Executive:

Grant, President of the United States, have considered it to be my duty to issue this, my proclamation, declaring that an extraordinary occasion requires the Senate of the United States to convene for the transaction of business at the Capitol, in the city of Washington, on the 5th day of March next, at twelve o'clock at noon on that day, of which all who shall at that time be entitled to act as members of that body are hereby required to take notice.

HOUR OF MEETING.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, it was Ordered, That the hour of the daily meeting of the Senate, until otherwise ordered, be twelve o'clock meridian.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of two members be appointed by the Vice-President to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the Senate has assembled, and that the Senate is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent; and Messrs. EDMUNDS and STEVENSON were appointed the committee.

GOVERNMENT OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. MORTON. I offer a resolution, which I ask to have read and laid upon the table.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the State government now existing in Louisiana, and represented by William P. Kellogg as governor, is the lawful government of said State; that it is republican in form; and that every assistance necessary to sustain its proper and lawful authority in said State should be given by the United States, when properly called upon for that purpose, to the end that the laws may be faithfully and promptly executed, life and property protected and defended, and all violators of law, State or national, brought to speedy punishment for their crimes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie upon the table and be printed.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. MORTON. I offer the following resolution, which I ask may be laid on the table for the present:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback be admitted as a Senator from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years beginning the 4th day of March, 1873.

I desire to give notice that perhaps on Monday, or at any early day next week, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of this resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move, Mr. President, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, we may just as well meet to-morrow and receive from the President of the United States such communications as he may have to make to us and thus save one day. We shall forward the progress of the business by a whole day if we sit to-morrow. It is well known that there will be a necessity for a reorganization of our committees, and that may just as well be done this week as next. I have no disposition to hurry matters, nor have I any disposition or desire to stay here and procrastinate a session which may just as well and just as easily be shortened. I hope we shall meet to-morrow.

Mr. THURMAN and others. O, no.

Mr. HAMLIN. I knew the Senator from Ohio would say that, and I supposed that would be a very general expression all around. I shall be very glad, however, if we can save a day, and we certainly can do it by meeting to-morrow. I hope we shall meet to-morrow.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to suggest to my colleague that we have had an unusual strain upon us for the last three weeks, and I hope he will not press his objection to this motion.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, Mr. President, we have had a severe strain on our physical systems; but I do not think the strain will be very hard to meet here to-morrow and receive communications from the President of an executive character that he may have ready for us. I do not think my colleague would stagger very much under such an enormous load, and I think if he would only join with me we might save one day in the length of this session.

Mr. CRAGIN. It is perfectly evident that a meeting to-morrow will not advance the business at all. If we receive communications from the President, they can only lie on the table. The committees cannot be organized and announced to-morrow, certainly not before Monday if we work as hard as it is possible to work. A meeting to-morrow would simply be a loss of time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island that when the Senate adjourns it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. MORTON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suggest that we take a recess until we hear from the committee sent to wait upon the President.

Mr. MORTON. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that the Senate take a recess until one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at twelve o'clock and twenty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until one o'clock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT again called the Senate to order at one o'clock p. m.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the committee appointed by the Senate to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him of the meeting of a quorum of the Senate and of its readiness to proceed to business, have attended to that duty, and the President of the United States has requested us to inform the Senate that he will communicate with it on Monday next.

Mr. CONKLING. Unless some Senator has business to suggest, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at one o'clock and one minute p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, March 8, 1875.

HENRY COOPER, a Senator from the State of Tennessee, appeared in his seat to-day.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

COMMITTEE TO VISIT THE INDIAN COUNTRY.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, is a resolution in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Resolutions will be received.

Mr. CLAYTON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of four members of the Committee on Indian Affairs and three members of the Committee on Territories, making seven in all, be appointed to visit the Indian Territory during the recess of the Senate, with authority to inquire into the condition of affairs in that country, the manner in which justice is administered, and the wants and capacities of the lawful inhabitants thereof with respect to self-government; and to report at the next session of the Senate the result of their inquiry and what legislation, if any, is needed.

I move that the resolution be printed and lie on the table. I wish to say, however, in offering this resolution, that I do not desire to be appointed on the committee.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I object to the reception of that resolution, and I make the point of order——

Mr. CLAYTON. What is the Senator's objection?

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. That it is not in order.

Mr. CLAYTON. I asked the Chair if it was in order, and he said it was, and I offered it on that decision of the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit the question to the Senate whether it be in order or not.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. At the called session of the Senate, I think two years ago, the then Senator from Michigan [Mr. Chandler] moved that the Committee on Commerce be instructed to perform certain duties in the recess, among which was one involving, as I remember, a visit to the Pacific coast and a report at the regular session. To that resolution I raised the same point of order that I do now, which was laid before the Senate, and the point of order was sustained. Several other resolutions of a similar character were offered at that session, to some of which the point of order was made and some not. In every instance in which the point of order was raised it was ruled by the Senate, if I remember aright, that it was out of order to receive such a resolution.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the Senator from Connecticut please state his point of order?

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. That at this called session of the Senate business of a legislative character, or looking to legislation, cannot be entertained by the Senate.

Mr. CLAYTON. This is not, in my opinion, business of a legislative character. The proposition is to raise a committee of the Senate for the purpose of getting information which may be laid before the Senate when it convenes again. The question of legislation will come up when the Senate convenes again. I do not think that the proposition to make this inquiry for the information of the Senate hereafter can be considered as coming under the rule sought to be applied by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If it is in order to make a remark now, I wish to say that, even if this resolution were properly before the Senate, the appointment of special committees to roam over this country at public expense is a matter which is seriously objected to by the people of the United States.

Mr. CLAYTON. I dislike very much to call the Senator from Delaware to order, but it seems to me a discussion——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware has the floor.

Mr. CLAYTON. But discussion——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware has the floor unless he yields to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I cannot. I only wish to put in a general remark that the appointment of committees to roam over this country——

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will yield in a moment. The appointment of committees to travel over this country at the public expense is a matter about which the people of this country have heretofore made complaint; and unless there is special necessity for it, I hope no such committees will be appointed at this extra session.

Mr. CLAYTON. Since the merits of this proposition are being discussed, I hope I may be pardoned if I enter upon the same line.

In offering this resolution I stated that it was not my intention to become a member of this committee. I desire to say now that I consider there is no question before the people of this country which requires investigation so much as this touching the management of Indian affairs. If the Presiding Officer will excuse me one moment further, I beg to suggest that the discussion of the merits of this question can very properly be raised when the resolution is called up. Of course it will then be for Senators to say whether it is wise or unwise to create such a committee. I shall not, therefore, go any further into that view of the question now. I hope the resolution may be allowed to lie on the table, and it seems to me it certainly can do no harm to have it called up at some future time and discussed and acted upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut raises a point of order on the reception of the resolution. The Chair submits that question to the Senate to be determined, because the Senate ought to determine its own business. This question as a practical question has been acted on both ways.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a practical question and an important one, and I move that the subject be postponed until to-morrow, so that we may look into the precedents and see what the Senate has been accustomed to do.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont moves that the question of order be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. CLAYTON. That will do. That will leave the resolution still before the Senate.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

COLUMBIAN INSTITUTE FOR THE DEAF AND DUMB.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. EDMUNDS a director in the Columbian Institute for the Deaf and Dumb for two years from March 4, 1875.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, it was Ordered, That Joshua Hill have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution in regard to the admission of Mr. Pinchback, which I submitted on Friday last.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback be admitted as a Senator from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years beginning the 4th day of March, 1873.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, as chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I have been brought in contact with the Louisiana question, as it is called, from the time of its first inception in the winter of 1872–'73; and as the chairman of that committee, to which all questions of contests in this body are referred, it is made my duty to present to the Senate the question with regard to the admission of Mr. Pinchback as a member of this body. So far as I am personally concerned, it affords me no pleasure to again advert to the Louisiana question on this floor. It has been here for some time, has often and thoroughly been discussed, and it is one of which perhaps most of us are tired; and I should be quite willing to have this vote taken without saying a word, but for the fact that there are a number of new Senators upon the floor who, while they must have a general knowledge of this question, yet perhaps are not so familiar with it as older members of this body, who have engaged in the discussion heretofore or who have heard the question discussed.

I therefore feel it my duty, Mr. President, as briefly as I can and in as general a way as I can, to present the grounds upon which the committee of the former Congress reported in favor of seating Mr. Pinchback, and to state the general arguments in his favor and the law more particularly upon which his claim rests.

I do not deem myself called upon at this stage of the discussion to enter into any particular consideration of the facts attending the election in Louisiana in 1872. I shall refer to the existing condition of affairs in that State and endeavor to apply the principles of law which I think govern the case. But a little recitation of the recent history of the State government of Louisiana may be necessary in order to understand the application of some of these principles.

In 1871 Lieutenant-Governor Dunn, of Louisiana, died. At the next session of the Legislature P. B. S. Pinchback, a member of that body, was elected president of the senate. By operation of law, by virtue of the provisions of the State constitution, this election of Pinchback as president of the senate made him the lieutenant-governor of the State, and he held that office without regard to the time when his term of office as a senator would expire. This was the necessary construction of the constitution of Louisiana as afterward declared by the supreme court of that State.

In the month of December, 1872, after the election of that year, Governor Warmoth convened the new Legislature in extra session to meet at the capitol on the 12th of December. The Legislature thus convened was the Legislature elected in November, 1872, the Legislature which subsequently elected Pinchback as a member of this body. When that Legislature convened, the house of representatives under the constitution of the State preferred articles of impeachment against Governor Warmoth which were duly presented to the senate of the State. By virtue of the constitution and laws of the State, the presentation of articles of impeachment to the senate by the house had the effect to suspend the governor from the exercise of his office, and the president of the senate, Pinchback, the lieutenant-governor of the State, became ex officio the acting governor of Louisiana.

Afterward, on the first Monday of January, 1873, Kellogg, who had been declared elected by the returning board of the State, a board created by the laws of the State to count the votes, was declared by the Legislature in joint convention, assembled in accordance with the constitution, to be the governor of the State and was then and there inaugurated into that office.

Afterward, on the second Tuesday after the convening of the Legislature in regular session, the special session having terminated, Pinchback was elected a member of the Senate of the United States for the term commencing on the 4th of March, 1873. The governor of the State certified to his election. That certificate was in the usual form such as we have all presented here, declaring that at a certain time he was duly elected in accordance with the act of Congress by the Legislature of Louisiana; and the first question which I present to the consideration of the Senate is, What are the rights of Pinchback under that certificate of election now upon the table of the Senate?

Assuming, as I now shall for the sake of the argument, that Kellogg then was, as he now is, the lawful governor of Louisiana, my first proposition is that he has a prima fɔcie case, a prima facie title to a seat in this body, which entitles him to be sworn in, and that if there be objections as to the mode of his election, as to the character of the body by which he was elected, or as to his conduct in connection with that election, those objections are to be considered after he takes his seat, and that in accordance with the usages of the Senate, the doctrine I believe applicable to the admission of members in both Houses, these questions of contest should not be tried until after the Senate has obtained jurisdiction of the case by his admission as a member of this body.

I may state here that the general rule has been in the House of Representatives, and I know of no exception to it, that the person presenting to the House the certificate of election issued by the governor of a State in accordance with the act of Congress, has a prima facie title to take a seat in that body; and so far as I know there is no exception to that rule in the House; and if the right of the person having the certificate of the governor to take his seat in the House of Representatives is questioned, either because of his own conduct in regard to the election, as bribery or corruption, or because illegal votes have been received or lawful votes have been excluded, or because of a failure to make proper returns by the returning officers, if his seat is contested upon any or upon all of these grounds, such contest must be prosecuted after the member holding the certificate has taken his seat. This, I believe, has been the doctrine received in the House from the time of the first organization of the Government. It is equally applicable in the Senate, that the person claiming a seat in this body who holds that form of evidence of his election is entitled to be admitted to his seat and questions of contest must be made afterward.

There has been one difference, however, between the House and the Senate in this particular; for until 1866 there had been no act of Congress prescribing what should be the evidence to a seat in this body. In 1866 Congress passed an act regulating the election of members to the Senate, and the third section of that act reads as follows:

That it shall be the duty of the governor of the State from which any Senator shall have been chosen as aforesaid to certify his election, under the seal of the State, to the President of the Senate of the United States, which certificate shall be countersigned by the secretary of state of the State.

That act was passed in 1866. It was the first statute prescribing what should be the evidence of a title to a seat in this body. But from the very nature of the Government and from the nature of the relations which the States sustain to the Government of the United States it has been held from the very beginning that the certificate of the governor of a State was the proper evidence of title to a seat upon this floor, and such certificate in the absence of any provision by Congress has always been held to create a prima facie title to the seat. I will refer to a very few cases in which this doctrine has been enforced by the Senate of the United States; and the first case to which I call attention is that of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. SPENCER,] fresh in the recollection of many Senators now around me. When Mr. SPENCER presented his credentials and went forward to be sworn in objection was made that he was not elected by the Legislature of Alabama. A memorial was presented here, claiming to be signed by the president of the senate and the speaker of the house of representatives and numerous other persons in Alabama, showing that Dr. Sykes had been elected by the Legislature; and the admission of Mr. SPENCER was resisted upon that ground, and a motion was made to refer the credentials of Mr. SPENCER and the memorial of Dr. Sykes to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that until that committee made its report neither party should be admitted. The claim was that there were two Legislatures or pretended Legislatures of the State of Alabama, one called the capitol legislature, and the other the court-house legislature; that the court-house legislature had elected Mr. SPENCER and the capitol legislature had elected Dr. Sykes. The right of Mr. SPENCER to be admitted as a member of this body was urged upon the usage of the Senate from the foundation of the Government, with perhaps one exception, which will be hereafter adverted to. Here was a case where the governor was not in dispute; I concede that; but where the Legislature was, there being two bodies of men each claiming to be the Legislature of Alabama, in session at the same time, and making an election of Senator upon the same day. But it was urged that Mr. SPENCER, holding the certificate of the governor, which declared that he was elected by the Legislature of Alabama, had a right to take his seat, and that the question as to which body was the Legislature of Alabama must be tried and determined afterward. After very lengthy and elaborate discussion in this body, it was decided that Mr. SPENCER, holding the certificate, had a prima facie title, was entitled to be immediately sworn in, and that the question as to which was the real Legislature of Alabama must be examined and decided afterward. I will refer to extracts from two or three speeches on the occasion, which fairly show the spirit of the debate and the ground on which Mr. SPENCER was admitted. I read an extract first from the remarks of Mr. Buckingham, Senator from Connecticut, now deceased:

Mr. President, I am under the impression that it has been the practice of this body to admit members who have brought testimonials which, upon their face, gave evidence that they were elected to seats here. I know of only one instance in which an exception has been made to that rule; and it seems to me it would be very difficult for us to organize and continue this body unless we adopt that rule and are governed by that principle. For instance, every second year twenty-four members of this body are re-elected or twenty-four go out and their places are filled by other men. Now if any man is to be permitted to come and present a petition for the places of these twenty-four men, and if we are, in consequence of that petition, to delay action until we can settle all questions which are connected with them, we may be a long time organized with a body of only two-thirds of the members which the law allows us to have.

Mr. Boreman, of West Virginia, in the course of the same debate, said:

The practice of this body, and, if I may refer to it, I believe the practice in the other end of the Capitol, has been that when a gentleman presents himself with credentials in the usual form, with the proper certificate, with everything that goes to show that he is properly elected, he shall be sworn in; and then, if others want to contest his election, they present their papers and the case is then referred to a committee for investigation. But in this instance Mr. SPENCER comes here with the proper document, properly authenticated, showing that he is properly elected, and it is our business to qualify him, and then he is a member of this body until he is ousted by the report of a committee and the judgment of the Senate upon the report of that committee.

Mr. SPENCER was afterward sworn in. The question of a contest as to which was the lawful Legislature of Alabama was tried, and after a long investigation decided in favor of that body by which Mr. SPENCER had been elected.

I now take up the question arising under the proposition to admit Mr. GOLDTHWAITE, the other Senator from Alabama, which occurred in 1871. When Mr. GOLDTHWAITE'S credentials were presented here, a memorial was presented, as in the Spencer case, alleging that Mr. GOLDTHWAITE had not been properly elected, because there were persons sitting in that body who voted for him and whose votes were necessary to his election who were not elected to the Legislature of Alabama and had no right to seats in that body. There were two classes of men specified in the memorial who it was said had no right to seats in the Legislature of Alabama who voted for Mr. GOLDTHWAITE and without whose votes he could not have been elected. First, three members of the house who it was said had not been elected at all, had received a minority of the votes, had never received certificates of election, who were admitted arbitrarily without any title whatever and the rightful members excluded. Next it was said that there were seven members of the body who were ineligible to membership in it because they were excluded by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States from participation in the Legislature. The admission of Mr. GOLDTHWAITE was delayed for some time, but finally the Committee on Privileges and Elections made a report in his favor to which I will now call the attention of the Senate. The report of the committee is as follows:

Resolved, That GEORGE GOLDTHWAITE be permitted to take a seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Alabama upon taking the proper oath; and that the Committee on Privileges and Elections proceed hereafter to consider the grounds on which his right to a seat is contested, and hereafter make report to the Senate thereon.

Upon that report the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] a member of the committee, made the following remarks:

So far as GOLDTHWAITE was concerned that report was unanimous on the part of the committee, as appears by the report itself, a copy of which I hold in my hand. It went upon the ground, which has been observed ever since this Government was formed, that the certificate of election of a Senator was prima facie evidence of his right to a seat and sufficient until it was overthrown; that he was entitled on that prima facie case to his seat in the body, and if any one said he was not entitled to it the contestant was bound to overthrow that prima facie case by sufficient charges and sufficient testimony, but that in the mean time the Senator was entitled to his seat on his prima facie case.

There was not, and there is not, as I had occasion to observe then, after a most careful examination of all the precedents, a single case in the whole history of this Government in which that rule has been departed from.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to say a word in respect to that quotation?

Mr. MORTON. I prefer to get through what I have to say. In the course of the discussion that morning as chairman of the committee, I submitted a few remarks which I will quote simply to show the view that I then took and that I now take of the other question involved in the Goldthwaite case. I said:

The committee reported the case as a prima facie case, for the action of the Senate, for him to take his seat until the question was decided. I know of nothing having been presented to the Senate since, and I believe nothing has been presented to the committee. My own views were these: that so far as the question of election of members of the Legislature by fraud was concerned, that was a matter to be determined by the Legislature itself, and that we could not go behind its decision upon the question. As to whether a member had been allowed to take his seat without having had a certificate of election and without having received a majority of the votes cast, that was also a question to be determined by the Legislature, and we could not go behind its decision. As to the question whether members of the Legislature were under disabilities imposed by the Constitution of the United States, I held that that was a question which this Senate had a right to inquire into.

That was the distinction then made, the distinction that was made in the case of Mr. Thomas, of Maryland, about which something will be said hereafter. So much with regard to the Goldthwaite case.

I might refer to very many cases in which this question has been raised to show the uniform understanding of the Senate during a long series of years, but it is hardly necessary. I will, however, refer to the case of General Shields, decided by this body in 1849. General Shields had been elected a member of the Senate for the term of six years by the Legislature of Illinois. When he presented himself to be qualified to take the seat objection was made on the ground that he was not eligible under the Constitution of the United States, because he had not been a citizen of the United States for nine years. It was well understood by perhaps every member of the Senate at that time that General Shields was not eligible; that he had not been nine years a citizen of the United States. In fact he did not pretend personally that he had been, but the question came up under the certificate. The governor of Illinois had certified to his election in the usual form, as it was insisted; and although there was no dispute about the fact and although the objection was one of the highest character, that is a want of qualification under the Constitution, it was insisted that the question could not be raised even upon his own admission until after he had been sworn and taken his seat. Mr. Douglas, of Illinois, who presented the credentials and moved his admission said:

It appears from the credentials now on your table that James Shields was elected a Senator of the United States by the Legislature of Illinois for six years from the 4th instant. His credentials are in due form, and therefore those credentials entitle him to a seat in this body. He stands in precisely the same position in which other Senators stood who were yesterday admitted to seats; and if there is any objection on the ground of ineligibility, it must arise after he has been sworn and has taken his seat. This body has no jurisdiction over him or this matter until he has been admitted to his seat as one of its members, for then alone can the question of eligibility arise. At present he has a right to a seat here, and to a vote on any question that may arise until the Senate shall adjudge him ineligible. In assuming this ground, I am justified by the uniform precedents, so far as I have examined them.

Mr. Douglas went on in a lengthy statement to the same effect, in which he argued the question very fully. I will not take the time of the Senate to read all his remarks, but I will read this further extract:

I do not say that General Shields is eligible to a seat on this floor—

Mr. Douglas knew he was not—

I do not say that General Shields is eligible to a seat on this floor. I know nothing of the facts, sir; but I do know, from the credentials on your table, that he has been duly elected by the Legislature of the State of Illinois. His credentials are in due form. They are in such form as to make it a matter of right that he shall take his seat. I know also that yesterday you swore other members who presented credentials identically the same. And I likewise know that hitherto you have never refused the right to a seat to any gentleman coming with like credentials. After General Shields shall have been sworn and admitted to a seat I shall throw no impediment in the way of any examination that the Senate may desire to make of the facts of the case. It is the right of this body then to institute an investigation when objections are made; but (and I say it with great respect) this body has no right to reject without examination a Senator, when he presents his credentials in due form, showing that he has a right to a seat here.

Mr. Mangum, of North Carolina, then spoke—a very able man, as we all remember:

Mr. MANGUM. Mr. President, I am disposed to think that the Senator from Illinois is right. The credentials in this case are in due form; they are properly authenticated under the seal of the State, and hence they constitute a prima facie case. If it be deemed necessary, the Senate can enter upon an investigation after the claimant has been admitted to his seat; and, with my present impressions, I withdraw my resolution.

He himself had first offered the resolution to investigate before admission. Then spoke Mr. Turney, a distinguished member of the Senate at that time:

Mr. TURNEY. I insist that a prima facie case is presented which entitles the claimant to a seat; and it is not in the power of any one to exclude him from the enjoyment of his right. Why, if this were so, one member by an objection could yesterday have excluded one-third of this body; for yesterday one-third of the seats here were vacant, and they were filled by gentlemen on the presentation of just such credentials. It cannot be done, sir. I insist that General Shields is entitled to his seat, and if any constitutional question shall arise the Senate may then inquire as to his eligibility to remain here.

And now I want to make a remark in regard to the reason of the rule as presented by Mr. Turney. It is indispensable to the integrity of the body that it shall be the rule that a member presenting the proper credentials shall be admitted to a seat; for, as stated by him and as stated by Senator Buckingham in the Spencer case, if it were otherwise objections might exclude one-third of the members of this body, and in a case where parties are closely divided and where the party having the numerical majority may be anxious to keep it they can by objections exclude new applicants and thus retain their numerical supremacy in the body. They cannot, as has been objected in the Pinchback case, as was objected in the Goldthwaite case, exclude applicants from year to year, and perhaps the complexion of the body may depend on that. Therefore the integrity of this body requires that there shall be an inflexible rule that when the applicant presents his credentials in due form he shall be admitted, that the organization of the Senate shall be completed, that it shall not be in the power of a party by factious objections to delay the organization of the Senate, and that all questions of contest are to be examined afterward.

Mr. BAYARD. Shall I interrupt the Senator from Indiana if I ask him a question? I appreciate the danger of permitting a mere majority——

Mr. MORTON. I prefer, if my friend will allow me, to conclude my remarks.

Mr. BAYARD. Very well.

Mr. MORTON. I will read further from the debate in the Shields case. Mr. Badger, who was a distinguished member of this body, said:

I imagine that there is very little difference of opinion among Senators as to the right of General Shields to be sworn in at the present time as a member of this body. In the absence of any precedents to the contrary, it seems to me perfectly clear that General Shields, having presented to the Senate his credentials, showing in proper form his election to a seat in this body, is entitled to be sworn in as a member of this body, and treated as constitutionally a member of this body, until upon investigation it shall be fully ascertained that he is not constitutionally eligible to a seat here.

I have not time to read all that he said, but it is in the same line of argument. Mr. Butler, of South Carolina, then said:

Coming here, then, with prima facie qualifications and credentials, I cannot see how we can refuse him the right to be sworn as a member of this body. I think the case is analogous to proceedings at law involving the rights of membership—the right of holding office. Usually the question is made, under proceedings by a writ of quo warranto, "By what right do you hold office?" The member is sworn in, and the question as to his eligibility to a seat is afterward determined.

Mr. Webster said:

This is a very important question, sir, and it becomes us so to act as not to deprive ourselves of the power to exercise our undoubted constitutional right of judging of the qualifications of a member of this body, at the same time to act with all proper respect toward the State which has sent us a Senator which it has elected. To observe the established precedents in cases of this character is the best course we can adopt. There may be instances or precedents in which objection has been made before the member has taken his seat in either one House or the other. This gentleman's case is the other way. Being admitted to his seat, he is then to produce his credentials, and they are to be examined and investigated by the Senate, to decide if, constitutionally, he is eligible to a seat here. I think the proper course to be adopted in this instance is to allow the gentleman to be sworn at once.

After further debate, Mr. Foote, of Mississippi, in conclusion, said:

That it is now established, beyond all reasonable doubt, that precedent sustains fully the motion of the Senator from Illinois; that that motion is grounded firmly and irresistibly upon parliamentary usage. And I cannot perceive anything in the circumstances of this case which should constitute an exception to a general rule which I think has been fully established.

Then General Shields was sworn in. After that the investigation was made, he was found to be ineligible, and was expelled from the Senate.

There is another case to which I will refer anterior to the Shields case. I refer to the case of Potter vs. Robbins, from Rhode Island, in 1833. That case was very peculiar, and presents the strongest view of this question that can arise. In that case the Legislature of Rhode Island, acting under the charter, which was but an imperfect constitution, and the constitution of Rhode Island being in part unwritten, the Legislature of Rhode Island by a joint resolution extended the term of the existing governor of the State for one year, the lieutenant-governor for one year, and the members of the senate for one year. As the law then stood the terms of the senators would expire at the end of the session of 1831. As to the power of the Legislature to extend the term of the governor, lieutenant-governor, and members of the senate by a joint resolution there was much doubt and much debate. But after the term thus extended had begun to run, and during that one year, the Legislature of Rhode Island elected Mr. Robbins as a member of the Senate of the United States, and afterward, in the fall of 1832, an election was held, which was unquestionably legal, and a new governor, lieutenant-governor, and Legislature were elected. When that Legislature assembled they treated the Legislature of 1832 as an unauthorized body, the election of Robbins as a nullity, and proceeded to the election of Mr. Potter, and his election was certified to by the new governor of Rhode Island. The credentials of Mr. Robbins, certified by the governor of Rhode Island in 1832, came here first and were placed upon file; afterward the credentials of Potter, certified to by the governor in 1833, came here and were placed on file; and when the question came on organizing the Senate both parties appeared. A motion was made to refer both credentials to the Committee on the Judiciary to determine which of the applicants had the right to the seat. It was a very strange question; but after long debate it was held, Mr. Clay taking the leading part in the discussion, that the credentials of Mr. Robbins were signed by the governor of Rhode Island; that he had the prima facie title; and that the question as to which was the lawful Legislature of Rhode Island, or as to whether the Legislature of 1832 was a Legislature at all, must be examined afterward. Mr. Robbins was accordingly admitted by the Senate; and after great examinations it subsequently was determined that the Legislature of 1832 was lawful, and that Mr. Robbins was entitled to hold the seat. That, I think, presents the strongest question that could arise.

But I think, Mr. President, I have said enough to show what is the rule on the subject. I then come back to the pivotal question of this case upon which the whole thing must turn: Was Kellogg the governor of Louisiana in January, 1873? If he was, Pinchback has a prima facie case and is entitled to be sworn in as a member of this body, as much so as any gentleman now having a seat on this floor whose title was in the same form and of the same character.

I think I may state it as a general proposition that the actual government of a State, without reference to its origin, in possession of all the functions of government and in full operation, must be received as the government of a State by each House of Congress in its dealings with that government and must be so received by the President of the United States. The Constitution provides that—

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and * * * against domestic violence.

It has been held that that means that Congress shall do it; that by "the United States" is meant "Congress;" that it is not meant the Senate acting separately or the House acting separately, but it is meant that Congress, the joint convention of both bodies, shall guarantee to each State a republican form of government. The necessary result of that doctrine is that while there is an actual government in a State, in full possession of the government of the State or of the authority of the State, until both Houses as a Congress have jointly determined that it is not the lawful government of the State, each House acting separately must receive it as such. If this doctrine is not sound, then you have no guarantee against anarchy and confusion; for if one House is at liberty to receive and accept the established government of a State and the other House is at liberty to reject it, you have that sort of confusion and anarchy inconsistent with the frame and theory of our government. Therefore the actual government of a State must be received until by both Houses of Congress it has been determined, as a Congress, that it is not the lawful government of a State.

Then, Mr. President, I come to the next proposition, and that is, that all questions arising under the constitution and laws of a State that do not involve any question under the Constitution of the United States, or any law of the State, are left to the determination of the authorities of the State which the State by her constitution and laws has provided and established for the determination of such questions. That is the theory of our Government, and it cannot be carried on harmoniously or successfully upon any other theory. I am not an advocate of the doctrines of State sovereignty, as is well understood; I have repudiated that doctrine; but I am an advocate of the doctrine of State rights as recognized and established by the Constitution of the United States. My proposition is that it is the right of a State through her own tribunals, established for that purpose, to determine all questions arising exclusively under State laws, and that the determination of her highest courts is binding upon the Government of the United States in its dealings with that State; that the courts of the United States must accept the decisions of the courts of a State as final and conclusive; and that the Congress of the United States, each House, or the executive department in its separate dealings, must accept such determination unless Congress, as such, shall determine otherwise. This doctrine was laid down in the case of Luther vs. Borden, a case very familiar to all members of this body, in the strongest terms. I will ask the Clerk, to save me from too much fatigue, to read from the opinion of Chief Justice Taney in the case of Luther vs. Borden, commencing at the cross on page 40 down to the cross on page 41.

It is worthy of remark, however, when we are referring to the authority of State decisions, that the trial of Thomas W. Dorr took place after the constitution of 1843 went into operation. The judges who decided that case held their authority under that constitution; and it is admitted on all hands that it was adopted by the people of the State, and is the lawful and established government. It is the decision, therefore, of a State court, whose judicial authority to decide upon the constitution and laws of Rhode Island is not questioned by either party to this controversy, although the government under which it acted was framed and adopted under the sanction and laws of the charter government.

The point, then, raised here has been already decided by the courts of Rhode Island. The question relates altogether to the constitution and laws of that State; and the well-settled rule in this court is, that the courts of the United States adopt and follow the decisions of the State courts in questions which concern merely the constitution and laws of the State.

Upon what ground could the circuit court of the United States which tried this case have departed from this rule, and disregarded and overruled the decisions of the courts of Rhode Island? Undoubtedly the courts of the United States have certain powers under the Constitution and laws of the United States which do not belong to the State courts. But the power of determining that a State government has been lawfully established, which the courts of the State disown and repudiate, is not one of them. Upon such a question the courts of the United States are bound to follow the decisions of the State tribunals, and must therefore regard the charter government as the lawful and established government during the time of this contest.

Besides, if the circuit court had entered upon this inquiry, by what rule could it have determined the qualification of voters upon the adoption or rejection of the proposed constitution, unless there was some previous law of the State to guide it? It is the province of a court to expound the law, not to make it. And certainly it is no part of the judicial functions of any court of the United States to prescribe the qualification of voters in a State, giving the right to those to whom it is denied by the written and established constitution and laws of the State, or taking it away from those to whom it is given; nor has it the right to determine what political privileges the citizens of a State are entitled to, unless there is an established constitution or law to govern its decision. (7 Howard, 40, 41.)

Mr. MORTON. Now, Mr. President, that is a clear recognition that the courts of the United States are bound to follow the courts of the State in all questions arising under the constitution and laws of the State. The political department of this Government it cannot be said is bound to do anything, because you cannot compel the Senate to do anything. You cannot compel it to pass an appropriation bill; you cannot compel it to act upon any question. I am speaking, not of the power to compel, but I am speaking of duty, which ought to be equivalent to that power. The political department of this Government, Congress, may determine all questions as to which is the lawful government of a State; but that question does not belong to one House separately. It belongs to both Houses jointly, acting as the Congress, and until both Houses acting jointly have overruled or determined against the lawful government of a State, that government must be received as such, and the decisions of the highest courts of that State must be followed in the execution of the laws and constitution of the State. This is a question that rises above all party. Party considerations are trifling and contemptible when brought into connection with the decision of questions of this character. This is the true doctrine upon which the State governments alone can be preserved. I am inflexibly determined, so far as my own action is concerned, that the true province of the State shall not be infringed; that State rights shall be preserved in all their integrity, because the States have rights sacred, unapproachable, and that ought to be inviolable; and among these, and indispensable to the existence of the State, is the right through their own tribunals to determine who are their officers, to determine by their own courts, under the special tribunals that may be created for that purpose, who is the govornor of the State, who compose the members of the Legislature, who are entitled to sit upon the bench and to administer the laws; because if the Government of the United States may enter into the consideration of these questions, may review State elections and determine who has been elected a member of the Legislature or the governor or the treasurer of the State, then indeed the State governments exist only by sufferance. Then indeed the Government of the United States is supreme. Then indeed you have what is called centralization.

Different States have different tribunals for determining questions of State elections. We have one form in the State of Indiana; you may have another in the State of Maryland; and Louisiana may have perhaps still another form of tribunal. It makes no difference what the form is, what may be the forum, the question is as to the absolute right of the State to determine who have been elected to administer the State offices. When the tribunals constituted by the State have determined that question, their conclusions must be received as final, whether they are true or false. It may be said that the tribunals have determined dishonestly, that they have determined ignorantly, erroneously. That makes no difference. You cannot have government unless you have some final arbiter, and when that final arbiter has made its decision, whether it be right or wrong, you must abide by it. Without that, you have anarchy, for if any one is at liberty to disregard a final judgment upon the ground that it was erroneous, or that it was corrupt, then the final judgment amounts to nothing, and there is no government, and there is no final conclusion upon any question. Therefore, whether the courts of last resort determines correctly or not, makes no difference. When the decision comes from that court it must be received as settled. If not, that is the end of government.

Now, Mr. President, allow me to advert for a few minutes particularly to the laws and constitution of Louisiana. By the law of Louisiana there is created what is called a returning board to count the votes for all officers—county or parish officers, as they are called there, State officers, and members of the Legislature. The authority to count and determine is given to that board, and the decisions of that board are made final and conclusive by the law of Louisiana. They are to count the votes as to the election of members of the Legislature, and they make a return to the secretary of state as to the persons whom they have found to be elected. The secretary of state upon that return makes out a list of the members-elect to the new Legislature—certificates they are sometimes called. This list is handed to the clerk of the old house and the secretary of the old senate, and upon that list the officers of the two former houses organize the new Legislature; and by the law of Louisiana no person is entitled to take a seat in that body whose name is not upon that list. That list constitutes the authority to take a seat as a member of the house or of the senate. After the senate and the house have been thus organized, each house has that authority which belongs to all legislative bodies, to determine the election and qualification of its own members. Each house may then pass upon the title of any sitting member; and if it finds that he was not elected, may turn him out and put some one in his place. I am speaking now of the organization of the two houses. The votes for the governor of the State are also to be counted by this returning board and with the original returns are to be sent to the secretary of state. When the Legislature convenes the two houses are to assemble in joint convention and to canvass the vote for governor and to declare who has been elected the governor of the State; and that is the last proceeding in the whole matter so far as the governor is concerned.

Now, whether the Legislature which elected Pinchback was the lawful Legislature of the State, must depend upon the laws of the State. It was organized by the persons returned by the returning board as elected. Kellogg was counted in by that board, afterward counted in by the Legislature, and has been the governor of Louisiana since the second Monday of January, 1873, now more than two years.

Now I come to speak of the recognition of Kellogg. I will first speak of the recognition in fact. He has been the governor of Louisiana in point of fact, exercising all the authority belonging to that office. He has made recommendations to the Legislature and it has acted upon them. The Legislatures that have assembled since that time have submitted all their enactments to him. More than two hundred laws have been submitted to him for his approval or rejection. Most of them he has approved, but some of them he has vetoed. He has been recognized by all the courts of Louisiana, the supreme as well as the subordinate courts, continuouly. The laws enacted by the Legislature electing Pinchback, some hundred in number, have been enforced throughout the State from the time of the meeting of that Legislature up to the present day, and have been recognized by all the courts, high and low. This has been his actual and positive recognition by the different departments of the State government; there has been but one government in Louisiana; there has been but one governor; there has been but one Legislature. What was called the McEnery government existed only on paper; it never had any other existence; McEnery was never governor for a single minute. The Legislature that he assembled never assumed to pass a law, never assumed to act as such except to send a man to this body to ask for admission as United States Senator. The actual government in Louisiana has been the Kellogg government, and it must be received as such until both Houses of Congress acting as a Congress, and not separately, shall decide that it is not the lawful government of Louisiana. I said the courts in Louisiana had recognized Kellogg as governor, had recognized the Legislature that elected Pinchback as the Legislature of Louisiana, and that this government had the sanction of the State tribunals created for the express purpose of deciding all questions, whether in regard to elections or anything else, that might arise under the constitution and laws of Louisiana.

Now, Mr. President, I shall call the attention of the Senate to the decisions of the supreme court of Louisiana, and I want to remark in regard to that court that it is not involved in this controversy. All the judges but one were elected in 1868, and still held their offices. There was one resignation, that of Judge Howe, in December, 1873. The vacancy was filled by the appointment by Pinchback in the month of December, 1873, confirmed by the senate, and that judge is now upon the bench; but the other three were elected in 1868. There has been no second supreme court in Louisiana. It is one of the departments of that State government which has never been questioned and is not now. Its adjudications are entitled to all the weight and all the authority that are to be given to the adjudications of the supreme court of any State.

In 1873 the question as to which was the lawful returning board of Louisiana came before that court for determination. You are aware of the fact that there were three boards nominally; that Governor Warmoth attempted to organize one board, that there was another board of which he was in point of fact a member called the Lynch board, and that board was finally held by the supreme court to be the lawful returning board of Louisiana, and we are to receive it as such just as much as though there had never been a pretended board different from that. It was held upon final argument and decision to be the lawful returning board of Louisiana, and we must receive it as such, and we have no right in the decision of any question coming from Louisiana to raise a single doubt upon the subject.

But there was a dispute in Louisiana, and the members of the Lynch board, the lawful returning board under the laws of Louisiana, presented a petition to a subordinate court which found its way to the supreme court of the State. I will not read all of that opinion, but only the concluding part of it. The case was begun in this way:

The petition of the State on the relation, &c., in this case represents that H. C. Warmoth, F. J. Herron, John Lynch, James Longstreet, and Jacob Hawkins, constitute the legal board of returning officers and are duly qualified as such for making the returns of the elections held in this State on the 4th of November, 1872, and that Jack Wharton, F. H. Hatch, and Durant Da Ponte, are pretending to be such officers and are attempting to act as such, and are interfering with the above named parties in the discharge of their official duties. The petitioner prays that the said Wharton, Hatch, and Da Ponte be cited and decreed to be intruders into and usurpers of the office of returning officers of elections, and that said Herron, Longstreet, and Hawkins be decreed to be such officers.

I will ask the Secretary to read the conclusion of the decision of the court which I have marked.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Our conclusion is that at the institution of this suit Warmoth, Herron, Lynch, Longstreet, and Hawkins were the legal board of returning officers under the law of 1870 (No. 100) for the election on the 4th day of November, 1872; that the defendants, Wharton, Hatch, and Da Ponte, were intruders; that the injunction against them properly issued; that the act No. 89 of 20th of November, 1873, did not have the effect of abolishing the said board of returning officers, who met on the 12th of November, 1872, and were by the first-mentioned law required to "continue in session" until the returns of said election were completed; and that the judge of the eighth district for the parish of Orleans erred in dissolving the said injunction and dismissing this suit.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the board of returning officers, composed of H. C. Warmoth, F. J. Herron, John Lynch, James Longstreet, and Jacob Hawkins, was the legal board of returning officers of elections of the State of Louisiana, and it is decreed that the judgment of the court a qua be avoided and reversed so far as the appellant is concerned, and that the defendant, appellees, pay cost of this appeal. (25 Louisiana Annual Reports.)

Mr. MORTON. That is the decision of the supreme court of Louisiana as to the returning board, as to the lawful authority of the board that counted the vote and returned as elected the members of the Legislature which elected Mr. Pinchback to a seat in this body. I say that upon all principle and authority that decision of the court is final upon that question.

There were various questions going before that court in regard to the authority of the county officers, in reference to one of the supreme judges, in reference to the attorney-general, in reference to a case growing out of the conviction of a man for murder, and in various other ways came before that court. The validity of that Legislature, its right to pass laws, the authority of Governor Kellogg as governor, was called in question, and all these questions were passed upon and decided by the supreme court of the State.

I next refer to the case of Morgan. He was appointed by Pinchback, while he was still acting governor of the State, between the 12th of December and the first Monday of January, to fill the vacancy on the supreme bench occasioned by the resignation of Judge Howe, who was confirmed by the senate of that Legislature which afterward elected Pinchback to a seat in this body. The supreme court passed upon the question, and they held that Pinchback was the lawful governor of Louisiana at the time he made the nomination and that the senate which confirmed Morgan was the lawful Senate of Louisiana. I will ask the Secretary now to read the extract from the decision, beginning where I have marked.

The Chief Clerk read as follows from 25 Louisiana Annual Reports:

A suit was instituted on the 16th of January, 1873, after the promulgation of the law in question, which was in operation, by the terms of the law, "from and after its passage."

On the merits, the question is, have the plaintiffs proved their demand; have they shown that P. H. Morgan was appointed and confirmed to the office of associate justice of the supreme court of the State of Louisiana? The public is concerned in knowing this fact.

To determine that question, it is necessary to know if his appointment was made by the governor of the State, and if that appointment has been confirmed by the senate of the State.

The appointment was made by P. B. S. Pinchback, who signs the commission as acting governor of the State of Louisiana. Was he acting governor of the State? We have no doubt of the fact. He was elected president of the senate in December, 1871, after the death of Lieutenant-Governor Dunn. As such he became lieutenant-governor during the unexpired term of Oscar J. Dunn. Section 1560 of the Digest of the Statutes of this State provides that "in case of the vacancy in the office of governor, the lieutenant-governor shall be governor; in case of vacancy in the office of lieutenant-governor, the senate shall elect a president, who shall be lieutenant-governor." (Page 142.)

The law does not say during his senatorial term, but that he "shall be lieutenant-governor." If the governor had died or resigned the day after, the lieutenant-governor would have become governor. Can it be pretended that under those circumstances the office of governor would have become vacant by the expiration of the time for which P. B. S. Pinchback had been elected a senator? We think not. He was lieutenant-governor when Governor Warmoth was impeached by the house of representatives. During his impeachment the governor was suspended, and the "powers and duties of the office devolved upon the lieutenant-governor." (Constitution of Louisiana, article 53.)

Was the senate which confirmed P. H. Morgan the senate of the State of Louisiana?

It was composed of persons returned as elected to the secretary of state by the returning officers recognized by this court to be the legal returning officers at the late election. (Constitution, article 46.)

It was organized at the State-house by those whose names had been furnished by the secretary of state to the secretary of the senate, in accordance with the election law of this State; it was presided over by the lieutenant-governor, and subsequently it was recognized by the acting governor of the State as a part of the General Assembly. It is tacitly admitted by the defendant that the body of men who confirmed the appointment of Morgan is the senate, for he attacks a law under which this suit is brought, enacted by the General Assembly of which this senate forms a part, not on the ground that the law violates the constitution of the State and of the United States.

Though we have not the power to decide who are the members of the General Assembly, yet we, as judges, are bound to know what assemblage of men constitute the State Legislature, for we are bound to know what are the laws of the State in order to adjudicate upon the rights of litigants under the law.

We are of opinion, therefore, that P. H. Morgan was duly appointed and confirmed associate justice of the supreme court, vice W. W. Howe, resigned.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, here is the direct finding of the supreme court in a case where they were required to pass upon the question whether one of their own colleagues had been confirmed by the senate of the Legislature of Louisiana. They find that he was, and declare that his title was consummate. They say that the members of the senate had been returned by the lawful returning board, that Pinchback was the acting governor between December 12, 1872, and the second Monday in January 7, 1873. Now I submit that in the face of that decision there is no principle and there is no precedent by which the Senate of the United States can refuse to admit Mr. Pinchback. Always reserving the power of Congress, both Houses acting together, to determine which is the government of a State, while acting separately, I say that the Senate of the United States is bound upon every principle to recognize the existing government of Louisiana.

I now refer to another case. I refer to the case of Kemp vs. Ellis, and the extract will explain itself. It was a question of which party was entitled to an office. Governor Warmoth, before his suspension and before the votes of the November election of 1872 had been counted, issued a commission. Afterward another person was commissioned to fill the same office, and the question which was entitled to the office was passed upon by the supreme court. I ask the Secretary to read the extract which I have marked and which explains itself.

The Chief Clerk read as follows, from the twenty-fifth volume of Louisiana Annual Reports:

And now, under the confused state of litigation that appears to exist in that judicial district in relation to judicial offices, and the contradictory evidence we find in the record, to enable us to decide the question it becomes necessary for us to determine incidentally which of the two claimants of the office of parish judge of the parish of Tangipahoa had prima facie the right to render the order of transfer. Each of these parties, like the contestants for the district judgeship, presents a commission. The commission of Addison is dated December 4, 1872, and was issued by Governor Warmoth. Bradley holds the commission of Governor Kellogg, dated 24th of January, 1873. We have several times decided that the Warmoth commissions that were issued, like the one in the present case, before the general election returns were reported and promulgated by the returning officers of the State, are null and void. Bradley, therefore, holding a commission regular and legal on its face, must be considered as prima facie entitled to the office, and therefore that he had the right to render the order of transfer.

On the merits, the case is to be disposed of under the provisions of the law enacted on the 5th March, 1873, No. 39. The question then is, which of the contestants holds the legal and valid commission? The defendant's commission was issued by Governor Warmoth on the 4th day of December, 1872, before the general election returns had been officially made out and promulgated as required by law, and before he could legally issue a commission. The court, as was said in the case of Collin vs. Noblock, lately decided, will take judicial cognizance of that irregularity which renders the issuing of a commission null and void, as having been done in contravention of positive law.

The plaintiff holds the commission of Governor Kellogg, issued on the 24th of January, 1873.

The commission bears prima facie evidence of its genuineness and validity, and nothing to the contrary being shown, must be recognized as having legal force. The reasons assigned in the case of Collin vs. Noblock apply in the general to this case. It becomes unnecessary to pass upon the various bills of exceptions found in the record.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment of the superior court be affirmed with costs.

Mr. MORTON. In this case the question was between a commission issued by Warmoth and a commission issued by Kellogg subsequently, and it was held by the court that the commission issued by Warmoth of the 4th of December, and before the votes cast at the November election had been counted at all, was a nullity, as being in direct contravention of law, and that the commission subsequently issued by Kellogg was the lawful commission, and that that person receiving it was entitled to exercise the office of parish judge.

I now ask the Secretary to read a further extract from the case of The State of Louisiana vs. McFarland, page 552 of the same volume, in which the authority of Governor Kellogg is again brought into question. This extract will also explain itself. It was a case in which McFarland was indicted for murder and was held for bail by the presiding judge, and the question was as to the authority of the judge to take the bail.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

They do not hold office by virtue of any title having color of authority. They claim to have been elected at the general election of November, 1872. They never were declared elected by the board of returning officers, neither have they been commissioned. The documents called commissions, purporting to have been issued by Governor Warmoth on the 4th of December, 1872, are absolute nullities, having been issued in violation of law. This we had occasion to decide in the case of Collin vs. Noblock, and in other cases decided at the last term of this court at New Orleans.

We will notice, judicially, that no one claiming an office by election in November, 1872, could have been commissioned except by Acting Governor Pinchback or by Governor Kellogg, inasmuch as Governor Warmoth was suspended by being impeached by the house of representatives before the promulgation of the returns of the election by the returning board, and that his trial was discontinued in consequence of the expiration of his term of office.

These facts form a part of the history of this State. It was impossible, therefore, for him to have issued commissions while he was suspended from discharging the duties of his office.

But it is hardly necessary to consider the commissions, even if they can be regarded as commissions, inasmuch as the law No. 41 declares that no one by virtue of an election shall exercise the functions of the office until "declared elected by the returning board constituted by law." The obvious meaning of the words, "if any person shall assume or pretend to be an officer of the State, executive, judicial, or legislative, without authority of an election declared by the returning board constituted by law, or without authority of a commission from the governor of the State, in case the law requires such officer to be commissioned," is that no one shall exercise the functions of an elective office by virtue of an election unless he has been declared elected according to existing laws, and in cases where the law requires the officer to be commissioned, until such commission shall have been issued.

Mr. MORTON. There are some decisions which that court has made since the publication of this volume which have not yet been put in book form. I had them at the last session of Congress, but have been unable to place my hand on them up to this time. Perhaps I can find them by to-morrow. They are all in the same line; a clear and distinct recognition by the supreme court of Louisiana of what is known as the Kellogg legislature as the lawful Legislature of that State, and a clear and distinct recognition that Kellogg is the lawful governor of that State; in other words, Kellogg is surrounded with all the forms of law, invested by the approval of all those tribunals in the State of Louisiana empowered by the constitution and laws of that State to settle questions of contested election.

If there be an infirmity in his title, it goes back to the polls; it does not exist in any form of law, because those tribunals empowered to pass upon all those questions have determined in his favor; I mean the returning board and the courts of the State. If you feel empowered to go behind these decisions, to go to the polls and to inquire who received the votes, then you assume a jurisdiction that places the government of every State at the mercy of the Congress of the United States. As I said before, while I abhor the doctrine of State sovereignty, blood-stained as it is, yet I recognize the rights of the States, and I recognize those rights that are indispensable to the continued existence of the State governments.

Mr. President, so far as the Legislature is concerned which elected Pinchback and so far as Kellogg is concerned, they have received the sanction of the established tribunals of the State of Louisiana.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, Secretary of the President of the United States, appeared below the bar and delivered several messages from the President of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the consent of the Senator from Indiana, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at two o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 9, 1875.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT pro tempore.

The SECRETARY, (Hon. GEORGE C. GORHAM,) called the Senate to order, and said:

The Secretary has received the following letter from the Vice-President, dated March 8.

DEAR SIR: Please state to the Senate that an absence from the city for two or three days will prevent me from being present to-morrow.

Very respectfully,

H. WILSON.

Hon. GEORGE C. GORHAM.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Secretary, I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That in the absence of the Vice-President, honorable THOMAS W. FERRY be, and is hereby, chosen President of the Senate pro tempore.

Mr. MCCREERY. I should suppose that would be decided by an election. I did not suppose the Senator would want the resolution to pass in that way.

The SECRETARY. Does the Senator from Kentucky make a motion?

Mr. MCCREERY. I merely make a suggestion—an election. I suppose the Senator from Rhode Island will be willing to wait a few minutes and have an election for President pro tempore.

Mr. ANTHONY. I withdraw the resolution with pleasure, and move that the Senate proceed to the election of a President pro tempore by ballot.

Mr. MCCREERY. Will the Senator wait for a few moments before having the question put?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Can we wait? The Senate is not organized.

Mr. ANTHONY. We cannot wait.

The SECRETARY. The Secretary will state that the Senate is without organization at present.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the election of President pro tempore by ballot.

Mr. COOPER and Mr. MCCREERY called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ANTHONY. There will be no objection to the ballot-boxes being kept open long enough to allow all the Senators to vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Kentucky wants a little time, and the call of the yeas and nays will give time sufficient for his friends to come in.

Mr. CONKLING. The balloting will give time.

Mr. SHERMAN. The call of the yeas and nays will certainly give time.

The SECRETARY. The Secretary will put the question on sustaining the call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 53, nays none; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dorsey, Eaton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston of Virginia, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, Logan, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Paddock, Randolph, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, West, Whyte, Windom, Withers, and Wright—53.

ABSENT—Messrs. Boutwell, Bruce, Cockrell, Cragin, Dawes, Dennis, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hitchcock, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones of Nevada, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Ransom, and Wadleigh—18.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Secretary appointed Messrs. ANTHONY and MCCREERY as tellers of the election.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Secretary, I nominate Mr. FERRY, of Michigan.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Secretary, I nominate the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.]

The SECRETARY. Senators have heard the nominations. Senators will please prepare their ballots, and the Sergeant-at-Arms will collect the ballots after they are prepared.

The ballots having been deposited, were collected and canvassed by the tellers.

Before the result was announced,

Mr. RANSOM. I desire to vote. I was out when the ballots were being cast.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from North Carolina will send his ballot to the desk, if there is no objection to this proceeding.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no objection, I think.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course there cannot be any objection. The Senator has a right to cast his ballot.

Mr. RANSOM deposited his ballot.

Mr. BOUTWELL and Mr. DAWES also presented their ballots, which were received.

The SECRETARY. The tellers announce the following result of the ballot:

Whole number of ballots 64; necessary to a choice 33; of which Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, has received 39; Mr. THURMAN 25. Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, is therefore chosen President of the Senate pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREERY] will be kind enough to conduct Mr. FERRY to the chair.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, was escorted to the chair by Messrs. ANTHONY and MCCREERY, and addressed the Senate as follows:

Senators, for this distinguished assurance of your confidence I thank you. Relying upon your generous support in my endeavors to meet with impartiality the requirements of the chair, I will at once enter upon its duties, with which you have so kindly honored me.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, it was ordered that the Secretary wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that in the absence of the Vice-President the Senate has chosen Hon. THOMAS W. FERRY, a Senator from the State of Michigan, President of the Senate pro tempore.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday were read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. SARGENT presented the credentials of Newton Booth, chosen by the Legislature of California a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1875.

The credentials were read; and, the oaths prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. BOOTH, he took his seat in the Senate.

COMMITTEES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the election of the standing committees.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask unanimous consent that the rule which requires the chairmen of committees to be elected by ballot be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the suspension is ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. I also ask unanimous consent that the rule which requires the remaining members of each committee to be elected by one ballot be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following resolution:

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, it was Ordered, That Dialogue & Wood have leave to withdraw their papers from the files of the Senate.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution submitted by Mr. MORTON on the 5th instant:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback be admitted as a Senator from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years, beginning the 4th day of March, 1873.

Mr. MORTON. Yesterday, when I yielded to a motion to go into executive session, I had elaborated the proposition that the so-called Kellogg government had been recognized by all the departments of the State government of Louisiana and by the supreme court and subordinate courts; that the laws enacted by that Legislature were received as the laws of Louisiana and administered by all the courts; that this recognition extended not only to the governor but to the Legislature, and that no distinction can be drawn between the legality of Kellogg as governor and the authority of that Legislature; that the Kellogg government is one; that if Kellogg is governor, the so-called Kellogg legislature is the Legislature of that State and its enactments are to be received as the enactments of the proper legislative body of Louisiana. The supreme court—and I recall the attention of the Senate to it—said:

Though we have not the power to decide who are the members of the General Assembly, yet, we, as judges, are bound to know what assemblage of men constitute the State Legislature, for we are bound to know what are the laws of the State, in order to adjudicate upon the rights of litigants under the laws. (25 Louisiana Reports, 244.)

I call the attention of the Senate especially to the principle enunciated by the supreme court. The Senate of the United States in 1833 in the Potter-Robbins case, through the committee, passed upon the question as to what constitutes the Legislature of a State. The Senate said the Legislature of a State is "the power which makes the law;" that whatever body in a State makes the laws of that State, received and administered as laws, is the Legislature of that State. I will read to the Senate an extract from the report of the committee adopted by the Senate in that case, which I think covers the whole ground and to which I invite the special attention of the Senate. There can be no higher or better authority on this question. The report of the committee reads as follows:

The Constitution of the United States expressly declares that "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof;" but what is the definition of the term Legislature? Both its literal and technical meaning is, "the power that makes laws." It is the highest attribute of sovereignty, and merges all other powers when it does not transcend the limitations contained in the fundamental constitution of the State. When, therefore, we find that, during the existence of the General Assembly, one branch of which was continued and held their seats by virtue of the law of January, 1832, this Legislature passed fourteen laws of a general nature, and twenty-eight private acts, many of them acts of incorporation, besides numerous resolutions on various subjects falling within the range of legislative power, a schedule of which is hereunto annexed, marked C; and when these laws and resolutions remain on the statute-book of Rhode Island in full force and effect, sanctioned by judicial decisions, and tacitly submitted to by the people over whom they operate, it would seem to your committee a very dangerous assumption of power in one branch of Congress, or even in every department of the General Government combined, to interfere with the internal regulations of the State, and to denounce the body by which these laws and resolutions were passed as a mere assemblage of citizens without any public authority whatever, and not the Legislature of the State.

Not only is the authority of the highest kind but the reasoning is conclusive. The Legislature of Rhode Island had passed fourteen laws and twenty-eight private bills, received as valid by the courts of the State, standing on the statute-books unrepealed; and the Senate say that inasmuch as Rhode Island has accepted these laws the body enacting these laws must be received as the Legislature of Rhode Island. Further on we find a list of these acts, showing their character. If that opinion had been written for this very case it could not have fitted it more completely. Here we have a Legislature in existence for two years that has passed nearly two hundred laws. These laws have been administered by all the courts as laws, and are now the unquestioned laws of the State of Louisiana. Shall we say that that was not the Legislature of Louisiana which the State by every department of her government has accepted? They go on to say:

Such a power does not belong to the Federal Government, and would, if claimed and carried out to its full extent, annihilate all the reserved rights of the States.

I invite the attention of my democratic friends to this part of the opinion of the committee. They state truly that if the Congress of the United States, or one House of it, can assume to declare that that legislative body which has enacted laws administered by the courts still standing upon the statute-books of the State is not the Legislature of that State, it does assume a power to annihilate the State governments, it may make or unmake them; and the committee have no hesitation in saying that this Congress has no authority of the kind. They go on to state—

It is a general principle of national law, applicable to all distinct and independent governments, that if there arise any disputes in a State on the fundamental laws and public administration, or on the prerogatives of the different powers of which it is composed, it is the business of the State alone to judge and determine them in conformity to its political constitution.

How determine them? By their own courts. How determine them? By their tribunals created for the express purpose of determining questions of that kind. If they are questions of election, then by the special election tribunals created for that purpose. If they are general questions arising with the laws, then by the courts created for that purpose; and their conclusion must be conclusive with the Congress of the United States.

No government has a right to intrude into the domestic affairs of another State and attempt to influence its deliberations or to control its action. This principle is recognized in the Constitution of the United States, by which the respective States united and formed themselves into a federal republic. Conceding, as we feel bound to do, to the State of Rhode Island, in common with all the other States of the Union, the power to decide for itself all questions relating to its domestic policy, there would seem to be no ground on which to rest a doubt that she has decided, in the most solemn manner the character and powers of the body by which Mr. Robbins was chosen a Senator to Congress.

I may appeal to any Senator if the State of Louisiana has not through all her courts and by all her tribunals decided in the most solemn manner all the questions arising upon her State laws which are now brought into this controversy.

They passed numerous laws which are in full force.

So in Louisiana—

they elected judges of the supreme court of the State, who have taken a new engagement or oath of office and accepted new commissions from the governor—

So in Louisiana as to one judge—entered on their official duties, and condemned to death a citizen found guilty of a capital offense against the laws of the State—

That has occurred in several instances in Louisiana within the last two years—they received compensation out of the treasury of the State for their services, and disbursed the public money necessary for the support of the government. No question has arisen touching or impugning the validity of any one of these acts, because they were passed or performed by an incompetent body, with the single exception of the attempt made by a succeeding Legislature to vacate the election of Mr. Robbins.

And so it is in Louisiana; no question impugning the validity of these acts has been made before the tribunals of that State but what has been decided in their favor. The only question arising has arisen here, not in Louisiana.

I will read further perhaps from this report after a while, but it seems to me that that authority is sufficient to settle this whole question. And now I leave the question of Governor Kellogg out. I put the authority of that Legislature to elect Pinchback on grounds entirely aside and disconnected from what is called the prima facie case. Leaving Kellogg out of view, the Legislature is presented to us by the courts of the State as the only and true Legislature of the State, and we cannot set it aside unless we trample upon every principle on which the State governments are established. It has the same sanction as the Legislature of Iowa or Indiana or Illinois has; and when you come to the constitution of that Legislature, it was constituted according to law. Every State has a particular method by which the Legislature is organized. In some States it differs from what it is in others, and yet every State has its formula. The formula was strictly followed in the State of Louisiana. That most of the members of that Legislature were elected there was no doubt, and that all who took their seats were certified to by the lawful returning board, were certified to by the secretary of state, and were covered by the forms of law that cover the members organizing a Legislature in the State of Connecticut or elsewhere.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FERRY] the other day made an argument that somewhat surprised me. Why, he said, here was the certificate of McMillen elected by the McEnery legislature, and the certificate of Pinchback elected by the Kellogg legislature, one certified by Kellogg and the other certified by McEnery, and they stood on the same level, that one was a prima facie case as much as the other. I was surprised to hear the Senator make that remark. The McEnery government never existed for a moment. It was only on paper. It was never recognized by the courts, but repudiated by them all; never exercising power for a single instant. It was a mere government on paper, a humbug, a sham from the very beginning. As well might it have been said when the Senator from Connecticut came here with his last credentials that if somebody else had presented a paper signed by somebody pretending to be governor certifying to an election of another person by some other Legislature, that would have occupied the same plane with his credentials and should have kept him out until the question was tried. There is no comparison at all. Here is a Legislature, in fact, recognized by the courts and in actual existence making laws received and administered by all; and you cannot compare that with a mere sham which never had authority and has been a laughing-stock from the beginning.

It is not necessary, therefore, Mr. President, to rest this upon what is called a prima facie case. Suppose that Mr. Pinchback came here simply with the certificate of the president of the senate and the clerk of the house of the Legislature of Louisiana that Kellogg had refused to sign his papers, on the very facts now before the Senate and of which you would be compelled to take notice, you would be bound to seat Pinchback, because he has been elected by the only and the lawful Legislature of Louisiana, by the power that makes laws for the State of Louisiana, according to the definition in the case of Potter vs. Robbins.

Now, Mr. President, I pass from that to the question of the recognition of the Kellogg government by the Government of the United States, and to inquire what are the effects, the consequences resulting from that recognition first by the President and then by the other departments of the Government.

The President of the United States has formally recognized the Kellogg government, first recognizing the Legislature. Some seem to have the understanding that the President only recognized Kellogg; but the fact is that the first recognition was given to the Legislature and the recognition extends to the whole government, to the Legislature first and to Kellogg afterward. By a reference to the history of this transaction, it will be found that Governor Warmoth convened the Legislature that elected Pinchback in extra session on the 6th day of December, 1872; that on that day that Legislature passed a resolution invoking the protection of the President of the United States, which I will read:

NEW ORLEANS, December 9, 1872.

We have the honor to transmit to your excellency the following concurrent resolution of both houses of the General Assembly and to request an early reply:

Whereas the General Assembly is now convened in compliance with a call of the governor, and certain evil-disposed persons are reported to be forming combinations to disturb the public peace, defy the lawful authority, and the State is threatened with violence: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Louisiana in General Assembly convened, That the President of the United States be requested to afford the protection guaranteed each State by the Constitution of the United States when threatened with domestic violence, and that the presiding officers of the General Assembly transmit this resolution immediately, by telegraph or otherwise, to the President of the United States.

Adopted in General Assembly convened this 9th day of December, A. D. 1872.

P. B. S. PINCKBACK,
Lieutenant Governor, and President of the Senate.
CHAS. W. LOWELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Thus it appears that before Kellogg became the governor this Legislature invited the protection of the Government of the United States. Now I call the attention of the Senate to the response on the part of the President to that resolution. On the 12th of December, three days afterward, the Attorney-General by the authority of the President sent the following dispatch to Acting Governor Pinchback:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 12, 1872.

Acting Governor PINCHBACK,
New Orleans, Louisiana:

Let it be understood that you are recognized by the President as the lawful executive of Louisiana, and that the body assembled at Mechanics' Institute is the lawful Legislature of the State, and it is suggested that you make proclamation to that effect, and also that all necessary assistance will be given to you and the Legislature herein recognized to protect the State from disorder and violence.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

So that the first recognition was of the lawful character of that Legislature. Proceeding further we find that on the 13th of December the Attorney-General by the authority of the President sent the following dispatch to John McEnery:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 13, 1872.

Hon. JOHN MCENERY,
New Orleans, Louisiana:

Your visit with a hundred citizens will be unavailing so far as the President is concerned. His decision is made and will not be changed, and the sooner it is acquiesced in the sooner good order and peace will be restored.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

Again, on the next day, the following dispatch was sent to the commanding officer in the city of New Orleans:

WASHINGTON, December 14, 1872.

General W. H. EMORY, U. S. A.,
Commanding New Orleans, Louisiana:

You may use all necessary force to preserve the peace, and will recognize the authority of Governor Pinchback.

By order of the President:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

Here we have the complete and full recognition of the Legislature. Kellogg was inaugurated on the second Monday in January; and on the 22d of May we find the President issuing a proclamation recognizing the Kellogg government as an entirety, which I will ask the Secretary to read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

By the President of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas under the pretense that William P. Kellogg, the present executive of Louisiana, and the officers associated with him in the State administration were not duly elected, certain turbulent and disorderly persons have combined together with force and arms to resist the laws and constituted authorities of said State; and whereas it has been duly certified by the proper local authorities and judicially determined by the inferior and supreme courts of said State, that said officers are entitled to hold their offices respectively and to execute and discharge the functions thereof; and whereas Congress, at its late session, upon a due consideration of the subject, tacitly recognized the said executive and his associates, then, as now, in office, by refusing to take any action with respect thereto; and whereas it is provided in the Constitution of the United States that the United States shall protect every State in this Union on application of the Legislature, or of the executive when the Legislature cannot be convened, against domestic violence; and whereas it is provided in the laws of the United States that in all cases of insurrection in any State or of obstruction to the laws thereof, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the executive when the Legislature cannot be convened, to call forth the militia of any other State or States, or to employ such part of the land and naval forces as shall be judged necessary for the purpose of suppressing such insurrection, or causing the laws to be duly executed; and whereas the Legislature of said State is not now in session, and cannot be convened in time to meet the present emergency, and the executive of said State, under section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States and the laws passed in pursuance thereof, has therefore made application to me for such part of the military force of the United States as may be necessary and adequate to protect said State and the citizens thereof against domestic violence, and to enforce the execution of the laws; and whereas it is required that whenever it may be necessary in the judgment of the President to use the military force for the purpose aforesaid he shall forthwith, by proclamation, command such insurgents to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective homes within a limited time:

Now, therefore, I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, do hereby make proclamation, and command such turbulent and disorderly persons to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes within twenty days from this date, and hereafter to submit themselves to the laws and constituted authorities of said State; and I invoke the aid and co-operation of all good citizens thereof to uphold the laws and preserve the public peace.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this 22d day of May, in the year of our Lord 1873, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-seventh.

U. S. GRANT.

By the President:
J. C. BANCROFT DAVIS,
Acting Secretary of State.

Mr. MORTON. In three messages sent to Congress since that time the President of the United States has formally recognized the Kellogg government, not simply Kellogg himself but what is known as the Kellogg government, which embraces all its departments. I need not read the extracts from those messages, because you are familiar with them. Lately there was a committee sent to Louisiana to take testimony by the House of Representatives, and I read from the report made by Mr. HOAR, Mr. WHEELER, and Mr. FRYE, of that committee, certain extracts in regard to the character of that government:

The first need of Louisiana is to know who should be treated as the lawful governor until the end of the term which will expire in 1876. It has been suggested that there should be a new election under the authority of Congress. This is not desired, so far as we learn, by any considerable number of persons in Louisiana. Its legality is doubtful. The authority of the person chosen would be denied quite as strenuously as that of Governor Kellogg. Without the presence of United States troops we do not believe a fair election could be had. In the presence of troops we believe the democrats would refuse to take part. It would be a great calamity to Louisiana to excite at this time the violence and bitterness which an election contest would kindle. A government so elected would be in substance only a provisional government. The only alternative seems to be to recognize one or the other of the claimants to the office of governor.

Kellogg is now in fact in office. The President has recognized him, and states to Congress that from the best information he can obtain he believes him to have been elected. The Kellogg government is a fact; its legality is sustained by the judicial tribunals of the State; it is in active operation in all its departments. Under it the late State election has been held, and on its certificates must depend, prima facie, the right to their seats of the Representatives chosen from Louisiana for the next Congress. The McEnery government exists only on paper. Its recognition would create the most perplexing questions as to the legality of all public proceedings had in Louisiana for two years past. The recognition of Kellogg by the House will give peace and quiet to Louisiana until the next election.

Then, on the next page, among the recommendations of the committee are:

Sixth. While we believe Governor Kellogg to have received a majority of the votes in 1872, and while we believe there was violence and fraud which frustrated the will of the people in many parishes in 1874, the illegal order of Judge Durell, and the illegal conduct of the returning board in attempting to cure one wrong by another, naturally inflamed the popular discontent and lent plausibility to the complaints.

Tenth. It is the duty of Congress to use such powers as are vested in it by the Constitution. It should recognize the lawful governor of Louisiana by express resolution. We think William Pitt Kellogg the choice of a majority of the voters of Louisiana, and that he should be recognized accordingly. It should provide further safeguards for holding elections and ascertaining the result, if any can be devised.

I will now read the following resolution of the House of Representatives adopted week before last recognizing Kellogg as the lawful governor of Louisiana:

Whereas both branches of the Legislature of Louisiana have requested the special committee of this House to investigate the circumstances attending the election and returns thereof, in that State, for the year 1874; and whereas said committee have unanimously reported that the returning board of that State in canvassing and compiling said returns and promulgating the result wrongfully applied an erroneous rule of law, by reason whereof persons were awarded seats in the house of representatives to which they were not entitled and persons entitled to seats were deprived of them:

Resolved, That it is recommended to the house of representatives to take immediate steps to remedy such injustice and place all persons rightfully entitled to them in their seats.

Resolved, That William Pitt Kellogg be recognized as the governor of the State of Louisiana until the end of the term of office fixed by the constitution of that State.

Now, Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to the effect of the recognition of that government by the President of the United States. I think the common idea is that the recognition by the President of a State government is simply his act under the Constitution and that it binds nobody but him. That is an error, and a very manifest error. The recognition by the President is the act of Congress as much as it is the act of the President, and this will become very clear by reference to the Constitution and to the law and to the exposition of the law by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Let me state that proposition again. The recognition of a State government in the manner this has been recognized by the President of the United States is the act of Congress as well as of the President, and is as binding upon Congress until it is repudiated by both bodies through joint action as it is upon the President himself. In the first place I call the attention of the Senate to the provision in the Constitution under which this is done. The fourth section of the fourth article provides:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion.

It is "the United States" and not the President who is to guarantee a republican form of government; and now read on:

And on application of the Legislature, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.

Who is to protect against domestic violence? Not the President, but "the United States." It is the United States that is to guarantee the republican form of government and to protect against domestic violence, and in the absence of law the President has no power to interfere and guarantee protection, because it is made the duty of "the United States," which involves and comprehends the Congress of the United States. It has been specially held that the guarantee of a republican form of government is to be determined by Congress and cannot be determined by the President, and equally it is the duty of the United States to protect against domestic violence. Now, how shall that power be exercised? It cannot be exercised by the President in the absence of law. If he has power to interfere, it is simply to execute an act of Congress. The act of 1795 gave him that power. I read now from the case of Luther vs. Borden the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States:

So, too, as relates to the clause in the above-mentioned article of the Constitution providing for cases of domestic violence. It rested with Congress, too, to determine upon the means proper to be adopted to fulfill this guarantee. They might, if they had deemed it most advisable to do so, have placed it in the power of a court to decide when a contingency had happened which required the Federal Government to interfere.

Here the Supreme Court say that Congress might have conferred this power on a court to determine when the contingency had happened upon which the Government of the United States could interfere; but it was not conferred upon a court; it was conferred upon the President.

But Congress thought otherwise, and no doubt wisely; and by the act of February 28, 1795, provided that in case of an insurrection in any State against the government thereof it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States as may be applied for, as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection.

The court say the power might have been given to a court, but it was not; it was given to the President. When the President exercises it, he does so in virtue of an act of Congress; the act is our act; he is empowered to exercise this authority by act of Congress; he is the agent of Congress when he does exercise it; and when he does exercise it the act is ours just as much as it is his, and we are just as much bound by the exercise of that power as the President is himself. The court go on to say:

By this act the power of deciding whether the exigency had arisen upon which the Government of the United States is bound to interfere is given to the President. He is to act upon the application of the Legislature or of the executive, and consequently he must determine what body of men constitute the Legislature and who is the governor, before he can act.

He is required by this act in a case like that of Louisiana to determine which is the lawful government. Where does he get the authority to do that? Not from the Constitution, because that says the United States shall do it. He gets the power from the act of Congress; and consequently when he determines which is the lawful government of the State, that determination is made by virtue of an act of Congress, and it is as much our act as it is his own. If we will keep this principle in view, it is a solution of the whole question. The President has acted as our agent, as the agent of Congress, in making that determination. Can the Senate alone revoke that determination? Can the House alone do it? I agree that both Houses together can do it by law, but neither House can do it separately. It is a power exercised in pursuance of an act of Congress, and it is not in the power of the Senate of the United States to say it has been improperly exercised. But hear further what the court says in regard to this:

The fact that both parties claim the right to the government cannot alter the case, for both cannot be entitled to it. If there is an armed conflict, like the one of which we are speaking, it is a case of domestic violence, and one of the parties must be in insurrection against the lawful government. And the President must, of necessity, decide which is the government and which party is unlawfully arrayed against it before he can perform the duty imposed upon him by the act of Congress.

Not by the Constitution. It does not give to him that power as the Executive, but it gives it to him from the act of Congress.

After the President has acted and called out the militia, is a circuit court of the United States authorized to inquire whether his decision was right? Could the court, while the parties were actually contending in arms for the possession of the government, call witnesses before it and inquire which party represented a majority of the people? If it could, then it would become the duty of the court (provided it came to the conclusion that the President had decided incorrectly) to discharge those who were arrested or detained by the troops in the service of the United States or the government which the President was endeavoring to maintain.

Here it is held that when the President has decided it is the lawful government, decided by virtue of an act of Congress, that decision is binding upon the courts of the United States. Certainly it is binding upon the courts of the States, and it is binding upon the Senate as a separate body also. It is binding upon the House as a separate body, but the Congress of the United States by law can reverse that action, but they must do it jointly and neither can do it separately.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. I understand the Senator to maintain that the recognition of the President, being, as he says, in pursuance of a statute, nothing but a statute reversing that decision can have any effect.

Mr. MORTON. I say, nothing but the joint action of the two Houses can do it.

Mr. THURMAN. But that joint action would have to be by statute.

Mr. MORTON. Put in the form of a statute or a resolution.

Mr. THURMAN. A resolution approved by the President?

Mr. MORTON. I do not say that.

Mr. THURMAN. Then how can you reverse that statute?

Mr. MORTON. I think it ought to be approved by the President, but still it must be the action of both Houses.

Mr. THURMAN. Can the action of both Houses set aside a statute without the approval of the President?

Mr. MORTON. I think myself it must be by statute; but whether it is or not, when we take that in connection with the declaration that the guarantee of a republican form of government is to be given by the United States and not by the President, Congress has never given to the President the power to determine which is the republican form of government and to execute the guarantee. That power was never given by a statute. If it had been, the President could exercise that power just as he has exercised this; but he has never been authorized by an act of Congress to say whether a government was a monarchy in form or a republic in form. Congress could give him that power, but never has. But Congress has given him the power to say, when there are two governments in a State, which one is the lawful government, and his exercise of that power is binding upon us as a separate body. It is binding upon all the courts by the express decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. Congress as a Congress, both Houses, can reverse it, but not otherwise. Suppose it were so. Suppose, if you please, that one House can do it. The Senate might recognize the Kellogg government, the House might recognize the McEnery government, and the President might recognize still a third government. Then we would have anarchy. If the Senate was to admit a Senator certified to by Kellogg, and the House to admit Members certified to by McEnery, then we should have anarchy, we should have confusion utterly at war with our system of government. Therefore I say when the President under this act of Congress has determined which is the lawful government, we are bound to receive it. We are bound to do that to carry out the theory of the law. We cannot be compelled to do it. We cannot be compelled to pass an appropriation bill. But I am speaking not of the power to compel the Senate, but I am speaking of the duty of the Senate under the law.

If the judicial power extends so far, the guarantee contained in the Constitution of the United States is a guarantee of anarchy, and not of order. Yet if this right does not reside in the courts when the conflict is raging, if the judicial power is at that time bound to follow the decision of the political, it must be equally bound when the contest is over. It cannot, when peace is restored, punish as offenses and crimes the acts which it before recognized, and was bound to recognize, as lawful.

I will ask the Secretary to read the further passage as it is marked.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

It is true that in this case the militia were not called out by the President. But upon the application of the governor under the charter government, the President recognized him as the executive power of the State, and took measures to call out the militia to support his authority if it should be found necessary for the General Government to interfere; and it is admitted in the argument that it was the knowledge of this decision that put an end to the armed opposition to the charter government and prevented any further efforts to establish by force the proposed constitution. The interference of the President, therefore, by announcing his determination, was as effectual as if the militia had been assembled under his orders. And it should be equally authoritative. For certainly no court of the United States, with a knowledge of this decision, would have been justified in recognizing the opposing party as the lawful government; or in treating as wrong-doers or insurgents the officers of the government which the President had recognized, and was prepared to support by an armed force. In the case of foreign nations, the government acknowledged by the President is always recognized in the courts of justice. And this principle has been applied by the act of Congress to the sovereign States of the Union.

It is said that this power in the President is dangerous to liberty, and may be abused. All power may be abused if placed in unworthy hands. But it would be difficult, we think, to point out any other hands in which this power would be more safe, and at the same time equally effectual. When citizens of the same State are in arms against each other, and the constituted authorities unable to execute the laws, the interposition of the United States must be prompt, or it is of little value. The ordinary course of proceedings in courts of justice would be utterly unfit for the crisis. And the elevated office of the President, chosen as he is by the people of the United States, and the high responsibility he could not fail to feel when acting in a case of so much moment, appear to furnish as strong safeguards against a willful abuse of power as human prudence and foresight could well provide. At all events it is conferred upon him by the Constitution and laws of the United States, and must therefore be respected and enforced in its judicial tribunals (7 Howard, 43, 44.)

Mr. MORTON. The President says the Kellogg government is the lawful government in Louisiana. He recognizes it by virtue of this authority. Now the proposition is this: Until that decision of his by virtue of this act of Congress is reversed by Congress itself, not by the Senate alone, it is binding upon the courts of the United States, as it is on the Senate and every branch of this Government, because otherwise we would have anarchy. We would have the President by virtue of the act of Congress recognizing one government and protecting it, the Senate of the United States, acting separately, recognizing another, and the House, if there were three, recognizing a third. That would be absurd on its face. Therefore, to carry out the theory and the harmony of the law, when the President, acting by our authority, says that the Kellogg government is the lawful government, it must be so received until by congressional authority, not senatorial alone, it has been reversed.

If the question was whether the Kellogg government was a monarchy or was republican in form, the President is not empowered to decide that question; but if there were two governments in Louisiana, each of them republican in form, one of them of course could not be the lawful government. We have empowered the President to say which is the lawful government and we must stand by it. The fault is not his. The fault is in the act of Congress of 1795 which gives him the power to make this selection. If we think it is wrong for the President to have that power, if it is a dangerous power, the remedy is to repeal the law, not to violate it. It has been proposed all along—and that is what I charge—to violate that law and trample it under foot. After having authorized the President to make that selection, after he has taken the responsibility of doing it under his oath of office, it has been proposed in the Senate of the United States that we shall trample the law under foot. No, if the law is a bad one repeal it; but while it is on the statute-book let us be loyal to the Constitution and the laws and observe its obligations.

Mr. President, this question has never been fairly met. I presented it once before in the Senate and it was never answered, and I undertake to say it cannot be successfully answered.

There is one matter to which I wish to advert before conclusion, and that is the action of Judge Durell. Great stress has been placed upon it heretofore in the discussion of these questions. I have never defended that action. I know there are many good lawyers who do. I believe the President thinks that Judge Durell acted within the pale of his authority. The Attorney-General does, and I believe there are able lawyers on this floor who do, but I have never defended it and do not to-day; but I have always resisted the absurd conclusion that even if Judge Durell's interference was unauthorized it had the effect to vitiate the Kellogg government. A title which the highest tribunal has declared to be good is not impaired by unlawful interference, even by violence, in its support. Admitting now all that is claimed, it amounts to this, that the courts of the United States unlawfully interfered to do certain things which the supreme court of the State declared to be lawful in themselves. If an officer in the performance of his duty were aided by a mob the performance would not be made illegal by the presence and co-operation of an unlawful assembly. If it were true that the mob would have prevented the organization of the Kellogg government but for the interference of the Federal authorities, yet if the Kellogg government had a right to organize, its legality would not be impaired because it was protected against the mob by the irregular interference of Federal authorities. I put it upon the strongest ground for the opposition, that Judge Durell's interference was unlawful, still if the Kellogg government had the right to meet and to organize his interference to protect it would not make that organization illegal.

The question comes back to this after all: Had the Kellogg government a right to organize? How are we to settle that? Settle it by the supreme court of Louisiana, by the only tribunal that has a right to determine it under the laws of Louisiana. That court has solemnly decided, time and time again, that the Kellogg government had a right to organize and was the legal government of Louisiana. That being settled by the court of the State, if Durell interfered improperly and gave support where he ought not, and where if he had not interfered the mob would have trampled that government down, if nobody else had interfered besides Durell, persons having no authority, still if that government had a right to organize what difference does it make? An officer serving a lawful writ, that service does not become illegal because other persons having no connection with the arrest and not having been summoned as a posse comitatus come in to aid him in his service of it. The question is not whether Durell had a right to interfere. That is all ad captandum. That is mere popular clamor. The question is whether the Kellogg government had a right to organize; and if it had, it made no difference who protected it or who helped it to organize. That it had that right, as I said before, has been settled by the highest courts of that State. So much upon that point.

I believe I have gone over all the questions I intended in this opening argument, and should have concluded yesterday in a short time if I had not been interrupted. So far as the history of the election of 1872 is concerned and the violations in that State, I have not referred to it. I will do so hereafter if it shall be brought into this argument. I have chosen to confine it not to partisan questions, not to introduce partisan arguments, but to deal with the simple law of the case. If it be desired by others to reopen the election scenes of 1872 and to go into those questions, I shall be quite willing to follow; but I think it wholly unnecessary and prefer not do it now. There are some other matters that I might advert to, but I will pass them by and now yield the floor.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I was gratified to hear the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] say yesterday that the question involved in the resolution now under discussion is one that rises above party considerations. I concur most heartily with him in that sentiment, and I trust for the sake of the Constitution and the country that every Senator in delivering his views upon this subject and in casting his vote will be governed only by the Constitution and the laws and have in view only the highest and best interests of the country, without regard to party considerations of any kind whatsoever.

The question before the Senate is presented by these facts briefly: The State of Louisiana is a State in the Union in all respects, and entitled to all the benefits that the Union can confer upon any State composing a part of it. In 1872 the regular election in that State was held for State officers and the Legislature. The Legislature which was elected at that election was charged with the election of a United States Senator. It was, by the constitution, to assemble on the first Monday of January of 1873, and, in pursuance of a statute of the United States, on the second Tuesday next after its assemblage, it was bound to elect a United States Senator to represent that State in the Senate for the term of six years after the 4th of March of that year. It was insisted, and so it appears to the Senate, that a body purporting to be the Legislature of the State of Louisiana elected the present applicant, the person named in the pending resolution, to be such United States Senator; and it was insisted further that a person purporting to be the governor of the State of Louisiana, to wit, the person who signs what purport to be the credentials of this applicant, was such governor. And now it is insisted by the Senator from Indiana and a majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections that the applicant, Pinchback, appears before the Senate with credentials in due form, and therefore he is entitled to be admitted as Senator from the State of Louisiana for the term I have mentioned. It is said that he is so entitled because in all respects he presents what is styled a prima facie case.

This involves a consideration at the very outset of what is meant in law by a prima facie case. The Senator from Indiana insists that it is one thing; I insist that it is an entirely different thing. A prima facie case is where one claims a legal right, and demands the same before a competent tribunal, states facts which, if taken to be true, constitute that right in law. I believe that that definition will stand the test of criticism.

In order to constitute a prima facie case on the part of the person claiming to be admitted as a member of the Senate, these facts must concur: First, it must appear that there was a Legislature in the State of Louisiana; that that Legislature at the time prescribed by law proceeded to elect a Senator of the United States, and did do that act. It must furthermore appear, by way of evidence of such act on the part of the Legislature, that the governor of the State of Louisiana signed the certificate of that fact; that such certificate has placed upon it the great seal of that State, and that the secretary of state of that State countersigned that certificate. If these facts appear, and there is nothing said or done in a legal way to controvert them, or to deny the truth of the certificate and put its validity at issue, then the applicant would have what is commonly called a prima facie case, and then too his case would be like those which the Senator from Indiana has cited and commented upon so much at length.

But, sir, a prima facie case is only such a one so long as the facts stated remain unquestioned in a legal way. Let us take an ordinary case in a court of justice to illustrate my meaning. The plaintiff brings his action in court and he files his declaration. By the law he must aver in that declaration facts which make in law his case. If he does not aver such facts, the court will dismiss his suit; the court may dismiss his suit sui sponte; but if he does state facts sufficient to constitute the ground of his action, then his case is prima facie a good one; it remains in court and he is entitled to judgment, because he makes a prima facie case before the court, until the defendant shall come into court and enter his plea. If the defendant comes into court and enters his plea denying the cause of action of the plaintiff, that moment the prima facie case is gone, an issue is raised, and it never can be said at any time thereafter in the pleadings that the plaintiff in that suit has any prima facie case in court, or that he is entitled to relief until the action is tried, and tried upon its merits, and determined according to law. The prima facie case is gone as soon as the issue is raised. It is the raising of the issue that destroys and cuts the plaintiff off from judgment until the trial shall be had upon the merits of the matter in litigation.

So if the facts were as I have stated them in the case of the applicant, Pinchback, he would have what is here not very aptly called a prima facie case, and he would be entitled to be admitted into the Senate, as the Senator from Indiana contends, until these facts were put in question in some lawful way.

How shall these facts be put in question? Let us see. The applicant comes and he sends his credentials, or what purport to be his credentials, to the Senate through its proper officer. In that way he places himself in relation with the Senate and within its jurisdiction. Then, according to practice, common sense, and reason, in the absence of any express rules, the manner in which these credentials can be put in question is this: Some Senator—no matter what one—may rise in his place and suggest seriously to the Senate any consideration or cause that denies the validity of credentials or the right of the applicant—puts them in question—as, for example, that the body which purported to elect the applicant was not the Legislature of Louisiana; that the person purporting to sign the certificate was not the governor of that State; that the seal purporting to be the seal of that State was not the seal; that the person purporting to countersign the credentials was not the secretary of state of that State. Any of these suggestions, or any suggestion denying the right of the applicant seriously made, puts in issue the credentials and the right of the applicant, and forthwith the prima facie case is gone; it has no longer any existence, and the applicant has no right to a seat in the Senate until his right shall be determined in the ordinary way and according to the course and practice of the Senate and according to the Constitution and laws. If thus the case is put at issue, then the evidence must be taken. That done, the trial must take place, the arguments on either side made, and the whole case considered; and then, and not till then, comes legitimately the judgment of the Senate.

If I am correct in this, and I do not believe it will be seriously controverted that I am correct——

Mr. MORTON. Let me remind the Senator of a case where the allegation was that the applicant was not elected by the Legislature of the State. That was the Robbins case in Rhode Island and the Spencer case in Alabama.

Mr. MERRIMON. I will come to comment on those cases directly. I have them in my mind's eye and will advert to them in due time, and I think it will appear most clearly that they have no pertinent bearing upon this case at all, certainly not a controlling one.

In this case it was seriously suggested in the very outset, even before the applicant made his application, that the body of men which purported to elect him was not the Legislature of the State of Louisiana. It was further insisted that the person purporting to be the governor and signing his credentials was not the governor; that the seal which purported to be the seal of that State was not the seal; that the person purporting to countersign the credentials as secretary of state was not the secretary of state. The whole was denied. It was further contended and seriously, not only in the Senate but throughout the country, that the Legislature, that the governor, and all the officers purporting to act in harmony with them except some of the judges of the supreme court, were usurpers, and that they had no authority in law whatsoever. That was suggested not only by one Senator, but by many on both sides of this body. This suggestion was duly made when the applicant asked to be admitted on the 4th of March, 1873. Upon that suggestion the issue was made up as thoroughly and completely as an issue ever was made up in a court of law in the world in any case pending before it. The form of the issue was not drawn out with technical precision as in the ordinary courts of law, but this was not necessary; indeed the practice of the Senate has always been as in this case in putting the case at issue. Then the case took its regular course; it was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. That committee took the case into solemn consideration, and for weeks and weeks, I believe for two months, the committee not only considered of the form of the credentials, but it considered of the whole merits of the case; they took testimony which covers, I believe, about eleven hundred pages of a book; they made an elaborate report, examining all the questions of law and fact connected with the case. So that it appears in this very case that the Senate treated the case as one requiring the ordinary legal course to be pursued before the Senate would determine to admit the claimant at all.

But it is said in reply to this that the uniform practice of the Senate since the beginning of the Government has been to allow a person applying to be admitted to a seat upon his credentials—upon a prima facie case—to be admitted; and if there was any question about the validity of his election, to inquire into that afterward. I know that there are cases which it is said sustain this view; but while perhaps there are cases which sustain it, there are many cases which contradict it and deny the policy and propriety of it, and to those I wish now to refer. But before I do so let me say to the Senate that the practice which the Senator advocated and insisted upon yesterday—and his position seems, perhaps, to be sustained by a few cases—in my judgment, with due deference to the past, was exceedingly unwise, and I go further and say unlawful. A sound regard for the Constitution, a proper construction of it, and a due sense of what is due the Senate, the States, and the whole country alike forbid it.

By the Constitution each State is entitled to be represented in the Senate by two Senators. The language of the Constitution is in these words:

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

That creates the right of the State. While there is a right thus created on the part of the State, there is a right growing out of it on the part of the Senate, a right which the Senate has for its own protection and the protection of all other States than the State so applying to be represented by any one delegated to represent the State in the Senate, a right not only for such purposes but also for the State claiming itself, and I may add, the whole Union. When, therefore, a Senator, purporting to have been elected from the State of North Carolina, for example, presents his credentials to the Senate, what right has the Senate in that behalf? First, a right to inquire whether or not his credentials certify the fact that the Legislature of the State of North Carolina, in the case I put, elected the person applying to be admitted; second, that the person certifying was the governor; next, that the seal was the seal of the State, and that the person countersigning such credentials was the secretary of state. They not only have the right so to inquire, but that right implies a further right to inquire duly, in a satisfactory way, about these facts, and to take sufficient reasonable time, as the circumstances of the case demand, to make this inquiry. If the case is simple and it can be done in a day, then it must be so done so as not to delay the State in its right for one hour. Very well; but if the case is so complicated that it cannot be done in a day, two days may be taken, a month may be taken, two months may be taken, three months may be taken, a year, two years, the whole term of office may be taken, if need be, in order to determine, in the interest of all parties concerned, whether the person claiming to be admitted is indeed the Senator contempleted by the Constituion and laws of the State and of the United States.

I maintain that in point of reason, in point of the language of the Constitution, as well as also in point of the practice of the Senate, the Senator who comes with what purport to be credentials is not entitled to be admitted forthwith upon what is styled here a prima facie case; that the Senate has a right to take reasonable time for any consideration satisfactory to it to inquire into the law and the facts of the case, and after a solemn examination and determination of it to admit the party applying or to reject him, if it shall appear that he was not lawfully entitled. Nay, I maintain that it is the duty of the Senate to make inquiry when it is properly suggested that the applicant was not elected according to law. That would be so by the proper legal construction of the words which I have already read from the Constitution. But the Constitution provides further, in these words:

> Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business.

So that the Constitution in terms gives the Senate the power to institute all necessary examinations and inquiries in order to determine the right of any one making application to be admitted here. In view of the dignity of the Senate, its importance, the vast interests involved, does it not occur to the mind of any reasonable person that the Senate would not be true to itself or to its duty or to the country if it allowed any one whose right was questioned to come here, be seated, and vote upon the gravest questions that could arise, affecting the whole country, before the question of right should be determined? It seems to me that it would not only be unreasonable and unlawful, but monstrous and criminal in itself. Let us take the case of this very applicant to illustrate how such a practice would operate: It is now two years since it was insisted that he had a right to a seat here. If he was entitled to be admitted on a prima facie case, he ought to have been admitted forthwith on the presentation of his credentials on the 4th of March, 1873. Suppose he had then been admitted, he would have voted upon the vital questions that have been decided since that time. He would have voted upon the questions of finance, upon the question of civil rights; he might have voted upon the question of the force bill; he might have voted on other momentous questions, and his vote might have been the turning vote that would have involved the salvation of the country; might have precipitated the country in civil war; and then after all this in the end it might have turned out that he was not entitled to sit here at all.

There is a case which the Senator from Indiana cited yesterday which sustains this view strongly, and that is the case of General Shields. General Shields had conducted himself honorably and gallantly in the war with Mexico. He was renowned for his courage; exceedingly popular. He was elected by the Legislature of Illinois to represent that State in the Senate. He came on here, and everybody wanted to do him honor. He presented his credentials. It was said, without much consideration, "They are in due form; the State has a right to representation; on the presentation of these credentials he has a prima facie case; let us admit him and inquire into his real right afterward;" and hurriedly, without much examination, he was admitted to take his seat in the Senate. He sat here for months and months, voting upon grave questions affecting the interests of the whole country, and at last, when the proper committee came to investigate the matter and his case was tried, it was determined that he was ineligible; that he never was elected; had no right to sit in the Senate; and he was turned out of the Senate. Is it not manifest that the action of the Senate in admitting him on his prima facie case was unwise, nay, unlawful? Who can say what interests his unlawful vote affected!

I say that that case, so far from sustaining the view insisted on by the Senator from Indiana, goes to show the reason why no Senator ought ever to be admitted to a seat in this body when there is any question made about the legality of his election. It is said, "Why not admit a Senator on the presentation of his credentials in due form?" I answer, because of the reasons I have stated. If there is no question made as to the election of one applying, the case is very different. Take the case of the new Senator from California [Mr. BOOTH] as an example. He came forward this morning with his credentials, they were presented, and I believe they were not referred at all. It was not necessary in his case. Why? Because no Senator suggested that the Legislature which purported to elect him was not the Legislature of California. No one pretended to suggest that the person signing his credentials was not the governor; that the seal upon the credentials was not the seal of that State; that the person who countersigned the credentials was not the secretary of state. There was no ground for question. But suppose I had risen in my place and suggested to the Senate that the body that elected that Senator was a usurping body, and was not the Legislature of California; would any one here, if I had made that suggestion seriously, have been content to allow the Senator to be qualified without inquiry, and, if need be, trial? Will any man in his senses who observes reason in his action contend that we should have allowed him to be admitted under such circumstances without having a reference of his credentials to a proper committee? I take it not.

Mr. BURNSIDE. May I ask the Senator from North Carolina a single question? Do I understand him to say that this Senate could take any action whatever with reference to the applicant here or any other applicant in this body that would endanger the country as far as to bring about a civil war in any contingency?

Mr. MERRIMON. I have no doubt that the Senate may at any time institute a proceeding even against a sitting member for sufficient cause to expel him.

Mr. BURNSIDE. But my question is, is there anything, can there be any action taken by this Senate which would endanger the country in that respect, which would justify any loyal citizen of this country in precipitating or attempting to precipitate upon the country civil war?

Mr. MERRIMON. If I understand the question, I think so, sir. There might be a case one way or the other.

Mr. BURNSIDE. By the action of this Senate?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am quite uninformed, then, on the subject.

Mr. MERRIMON. But the argument I was making was this: I said that a person who came here claiming as a Senator and who might not have been lawfully elected, if he were admitted upon a prima facie case, might in the course of his sitting here vote upon measures which, carried into practical operation, would precipitate the country into civil war. I was making an argument to show the inpolicy of such a practice on the part of the Senate.

But, Mr. President, while the reason of the thing is as I have insisted, my view is strongly sustained by practice as well as by reason; and I desire now to direct the attention of the Senate to the cases which sustain the view I have submitted in this hasty manner.

Almost at the very outset of the Government a case which presented this very question was tried and decided, as I insist all cases ought to be decided. The first case I refer to is that of Kensey Johns, from the State of Delaware. (Annals of Congress, 1793–'95, page 74.) The record of it is in these words:

Kensey Johns appeared and produced his credentials of an appointment by the governor of the State of Delaware as a Senator for the United States, which were read.

Whereupon it was moved that they be referred to the consideration of the Committee of Elections before the said Kensey Johns could be permitted to qualify, who are directed to report thereon; and it passed in the affirmative—yeas 13, nays 12.

In that case Johns, the applicant, appeared and produced his credentials in all respects regular, but it was suggested to the Senate by a Senator that there was a defect about his election or appointment which rendered it void; and because it was so defective he was not then allowed to take his seat. On March 26, 1793, the Senate took this further action in the case:

Mr. Bradley, from the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the credential of Kensey Johns, appointed by the executive of the State of Delaware a Senator of the United States in place of George Read, resigned.

Ordered, That the report lie for consideration.

After that again it was further considered, as follows:

FRIDAY, March 28.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the credentials of Kensey Johns, appointed by the executive of the State of Delaware to be a Senator of the United States; which report is as follows:

I will read the whole report, because it is interesting here, and I think it is very important to break down the false and pernicious doctrine which is sought to be established in the case before the Senate and in other cases in these hasty modern times. We had better go back to the reasonable practice instituted by the founders of the Republic. The committee reported and the Senate took action as follows:

The Committee of Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of an appointment by the governor of the State of Delaware of Kensey Johns as a Senator of the United States, having had the same under consideration, report:

That George Read, a Senator for the State of Delaware, resigned his seat upon the 18th day of December, 1793, and during the recess of the Legislature of said State.

That the Legislature of the said State met in January and adjourned in February, 1794.

That upon the 19th day of March, and subsequent to the adjournment of the said Legislature, Kensey Johns was appointed by the Governor of said State to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation aforesaid.

Whereupon the committee submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That Kensey Johns, appointed by the governor of the State of Delaware as a Senator of the United States for said State, is not entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States; a session of the Legislature of the said State having intervened between the resignation of the said George Read and the appointment of the said Kensey Johns.

On the question to agree to this report, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 7; as follows.

Resolved, That an attested copy of the resolution of the Senate on the appointment of Kensey Johns to be a Senator of the United States be transmitted by the President of the Senate to the executive of the State of Delaware.

That is a case directly in point and a very early one, soon after the Government went into operation. Kensey Johns, from the State of Delaware, came to the Senate with credentials in all respects formal, making what is called here to-day a prima facie case. It was suggested then that there was a defect in his appointment; that it was irregular and improperly made, and that he was not in fact entitled. According to the doctrine insisted on here he was entitled to come into the Senate to vote upon all the grave questions that might arise before it until the committee appointed to investigate the matter could determine it; but the Senate at that day took no such action, they believed no such doctrine. By their action they said he was not entitled to a seat until the right should be inquired into—his right being questioned according to the course and practice of the Senate; and when it was inquired into, it was ascertained that he was not entitled, and he never sat in the Senate at all. I cite another case directly in point.

I refer now to the case of Lanman, from the State of Connecticut. On the 4th of March, 1825, the Senate took this action in that behalf:

The President laid before the Senate a letter from Hon. James Lanman, inclosing the credentials of his appointment by the governor of Connecticut as a Senator of the United States, "to take effect immediately after the 3d day of March, 1825, and to continue until the next meeting of the Legislature," and expressing his readiness to receive the usual qualifications.

The letter and credentials were read.

On motion by Mr. Holmes, of Maine,

That Mr. Lanman be admitted to take the oath required by the Constitution,

A debate ensued; and,

On motion,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

In that case it was solemnly moved upon the presentation of the credentials, upon his prima facie case, that he be admitted; whereupon it was at once resisted and he was not allowed to take a seat. But see what followed. On March 5 the Senate took this further action:

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of yesterday,

That Mr. Lanman be admitted to take the oath required by the Constitution; and,

On motion by Mr. Eaton,

Ordered, That the said motion, together with the credentials of Mr. Lanman, be referred to a select committee, to consist of three members, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. Eaton, Mr. Edwards, and Mr. Tazewell were appointed the committee.

Mr. Van Buren submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That Hon. James Lanman have leave to be heard at the bar of the Senate on the question as to his right to a seat therein under an appointment made by the executive of Connecticut.

MONDAY, March 7, 1825.

Mr. Eaton, from the select committee to whom was referred, on the 5th instant, the motion "that Mr. Lanman be admitted to take the oath required by the Constitution," together with the credentials of Mr. Lanman, submitted the following report:

That Mr. Lanman's term of service in the Senate expired on the 3d of March. On the 4th he presented to the Senate a certificate, regularly and properly authenticated, from Oliver Wolcott, governor of the State of Connecticut, setting forth that the President of the United States had desired the Senate to convene on the 4th of March, and had caused official notice of that fact to be communicated to him.

The certificate of appointment is dated the 8th of February, 1825, subsequent to the time of notification to him by the President. The certificate further recites that at the time of its execution the Legislature of the State was not in session, and would not be until the month of May.

The committee have looked into the Journals of the Senate to discover if they could find any authority or decision by them on this question, and the following have been found recorded:

On the 27th day of April, 1797, William Cocke was appointed a Senator from that State by the governor of Tennessee, his term of service having expired on the 3d of the preceding March, and on the 15th of May took his seat and was qualified.

On the 3d of March, 1801, the seat of Uriah Tracy became vacant, the time for which he had been elected having expired. On the 20th of February preceding the governor of Connecticut reappointed him a Senator, and in pursuance thereof he was qualified and took his seat.

Joseph Anderson, a Senator from Tennessee, was appointed by the governor a member of the Senate on the 6th of February, 1809, and on the 4th of March after took his seat, the period for which he had been elected having on the preceding day expired.

John Williams, of Tennessee, on the 20th of January, 1817, was appointed a Senator in Congress, to take his seat on the 4th of March, when the term for which he had been elected would expire. Mr. Williams appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

In none of these cases does it appear that there was any objection made or question raised except in 1801 in the case of Mr. Tracy, when the vote was 13 for and 10 against the right of the member to take his seat. Those are the only analogous cases the committee has been able to find.

By reference to the statute laws of Connecticut the committee find that in that State there is a law upon this subject, which is in the following words: "Whenever any vacancy shall happen in the representation of this State in the Senate of the United States by the expiration of the term of service of a Senator, or by resignation, or otherwise, the General Assembly, if then in session, shall, by a concurrent vote of the senate and house of representatives, proceed to fill said vacancy by a new election; and in case such vacancy shall happen in the recess of the General Assembly, the governor shall appoint some person to fill the same until the next meeting of the General Assembly."

The report was read.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of the 5th instant, that the Hon. James Lanman have leave to be heard at the bar of the Senate on the question as to his right to a seat therein, and agreed thereto.

Mr. Edwards submitted the following motion; which was read:

Resolved, That the Hon. James Lanman, appointed a Senator by the governor of the State of Connecticut, be now admitted to the oath required by the Constitution.

And on the question to agree thereto it was determined in the negative—yeas 18, nays 23.

There is another case, Mr. President, in which the applicant came to the Senate with credentials in all respects regular; and when it was suggested in opposition to a motion to admit him on a prima facie case that there was a defect about his election which rendered it void, he was not admitted, but it was referred to the appropriate committee, and that committee upon examination made report to the effect that he was not entitled to be a Senator; and the report of the committee was sustained by the Senate, and Mr. Lanman never sat in the Senate at all under the credentials he then presented. The point is that he was not admitted on a prima facie case, and that the Senate, without admitting the claimant, passed upon the substantial merits of his claim and rejected it.

But, sir, there are cases of a modern date as well as these cases which happened a long way in the past. I refer now to two cases together. They are the cases of Fishback and Baxter from the State of Arkansas. They came to the Senate in 1864 with credentials in all respects regular upon their face, informing the Senate that the Legislature of the State of Arkansas had duly elected them to be Senators from that State in the Senate of the United States. The certificate was proper in form; so far as the Senate could see there was no irregularity or defect about their election; but it was at that time suggested that the State of Arkansas had been in rebellion against the Union, and the relations of that State to the Union were put in question upon suggestion in the Senate, and thereupon those two cases took the regular course: they were referred to a committee to examine them upon their merits. But the parties claiming in the mean time were not admitted to seats in the Senate, as it is contended they ought to have been if the doctrine of the Senator from Indiana is to prevail. I refer to the report made by the Committee on the Judiciary in those cases. It throws light upon the case in hand, and may be remembered with profit to the Senate and country.

The committee in their report, among other things, say:

IN THE SENATE, June 27, 1864.

Mr. Trumbull, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report:

That the credentials presented are in due form, purporting to be under the seal of the State of Arkansas, and to be signed by Isaac Murphy, governor thereof; and if the right to seats were to be determined by an inspection of the credentials—

That is exactly what is contended for here—

Messrs. Fishback and Baxter would be entitled to be sworn as members of this body. It is, however, admitted by the persons claiming seats, and known to the country, that, in the spring of 1861, the State of Arkansas, through its constituted authorities, undertook to secede from the Union, set up a government in hostility to the United States, and maintain the same by force of arms.

Does it not appear in that case that the Senate took jurisdiction of the credentials, and that for cause outside of the credentials, outside of the record as it appeared in the Senate, and for cause suggested by some Senator, those persons purporting to be Senators-elect in that case were not admitted to take their seats, but they were kept out of the Senate, they were kept in waiting until their right to seats was determined; first, upon an examination by the proper committee, and then, upon the report of that committee, by the solemn judgment of the Senate? It does not make any difference, I take it, that the State had been in rebellion, which it was suggested destroyed, or rather prevented, the right. It was a cause, and any other cause might have been considered in the same way; any other cause might have been applicable in the same way to delay the admission of any one applying to be admitted to the Senate, until that cause, its character, its extent, how far it affected the election, could be examined into by a committee and passed upon by the Senate At all events the Senate so decided in those two cases. There are other cases of a similar kind. I refer now to the cases of Cutler and Smith, of Louisiana. They came also with credentials, in all respects regular, to represent the State of Louisiana in the Senate. When their credentials were presented it was suggested to the Senate that the State of Louisiana also had been in rebellion, and that these parties, for some consideration or other, were not entitled to sit. Thereupon their cases took the regular course and were referred to the committee, but in the mean time they were not allowed to sit upon a prima facie case until the merits of their cases were examined into. After the committee had considered the matter they made a report, a portion of which is in these words:

Messrs. Cutler and Smith, the claimants for seats, were duly elected Senators by the Legislature which convened on the 3d day of October, 1864, and but for the fact that, in pursuance of an act of Congress passed on the 13th day of July, 1861, the inhabitants of the State of Louisiana were declared to be in a state of insurrection against the United States, and all commercial intercourse between them and the citizens of other States declared to be unlawful, which condition of things had not ceased at the time of the reorganization of the State government and the election of Messrs. Cutler and Smith, your committee would recommend their immediate admission to seats.

The persons in possession of the local authorities of Louisiana having rebelled against the authority of the United States, and her inhabitants having been declared to be in a state of insurrection in pursuance of a law passed by the two Houses of Congress, your committee deem it improper for this body to admit to seats Senators from Louisiana, till by some joint action of both Houses there shall be some recognition of an existing State government acting in harmony with the Government of the United States and recognizing its authority.

That case, it seems to me, has a direct bearing upon this case, and goes to sustain the right of the Senate to inquire, whenever it shall see fit to do so for any cause, why a person applying to be admitted to a seat in the Senate should not be so admitted until his case shall be inquired into and determined upon its merits.

There are other cases of a similar character that might be cited from the States lately in conflict with the United States. The fact that these cases come from these States does not in any way distinguish them from any other case, in the view and for the purpose for which I cite them.

But these are not the only cases. If it shall be said that these are cases from States in rebellion, I cannot see how that could have any effect upon the question of law that we are now discussing; but there was a case in point from the State of Maryland after the war. Mr. Thomas was duly elected to represent the State of Maryland. He came with his credentials in all respects regular and he asked to be admitted. It was suggested that there was some reason why he ought not to be admitted, perhaps that he was not a person fit to sit in the Senate, or there was some consideration that affected his right. According to the doctrine insisted upon here, he was entitled to be seated upon his prima facie case, so called; but the Senate did not see fit to take that course. His case also took the course prescribed by the practice of the Senate and went to a committee, and finally he was rejected and never took a seat in the Senate.

There are other cases that I might cite the names of which do not occur to me now. If I had time I could cite them. Some of them were cases where the claimants never sat in the Senate, as in the cases I have cited; in others, the claimants were not admitted upon their prima facie case, but after their cases were decided upon their merits they were admitted.

Here then are cases, many of them directly in point, some which happened soon after the organization of the Government, one as late as 1825, and five cases since the recent war, and many others not cited by name; and it seems to me, taking these precedents in conjunction with the reason of the law, with the manifest purpose and proper construction of the Constitution, there can be no sort of question that the applicant in this case is not entitled to be admitted upon the presentation of his prima facie case. If there had been no question, as there was no question to-day in the case of the Senator from California, then the Senate might have admitted him; but while the Senate has power to do so where there is no question, and I do not complain of such a practice, I maintain as matter of law and right, as matter of propriety, as matter of justice to the country and to the Senate, wherever there is any question about the election of a Senator he ought not to be admitted upon the floor of the Senate as a member until his case shall be tried, and not tried upon the form of his credentials but tried and determined upon its substantial merits.

If that is not the true doctrine, the Senate might be imposed upon many times by wicked and corrupt men seeking to pervert right, subvert the Constitution, and destroy the Government. Ambitious and designing and powerful men might, in many cases that can easily be supposed, compass the ruin of the States and the Union by circumvention and fraud, to say nothing of usurpation and violence.

Let me put a suppositious case: Suppose that I should go into the State of Maryland with five thousand armed men at my back and proclaim myself governor and appoint judges, assemble of those cooperating with me a Legislature, and they should take possession of the State-house at Annapolis, elect two persons to be Senators from that State, and I should make out a certificate in due form, put the seal of the State upon the credentials, let my usurping secretary of state countersign the credentials, and those two persons so claiming to be Senators from Maryland should come here; would they in that case not have a good case in form, a prima facie case, and be entitled to seats until their cases could be determined? Why, sir, it is monstrous to think upon; it is absurd, one would say, to suggest it. Absurd as it is, that is the very case now before the Senate. It is seriously, solemnly insisted, and has been so insisted for two years and more, that Kellogg is not the governor de facto or de jure of the State of Louisiana; that the Legislature which purported to elect Pinchback was not the Legislature of Louisiana, but a mere usurping body of men who were a band of rioters; that the party purporting to countersign these credentials was not the secretary of state of the State of Louisiana; that the seal purporting to be the great seal of that State is a forgery; that the whole proceeding was usurpatory in its character. Is it to be said when this solemn suggestion is made here, not by one Senator, but by Senators on both sides of the Senate, of both political parties, that this state of things existed in Louisiana; that this person was never elected by any lawful body in that State; that we are to admit him upon this prima facie case? It seems to me, with all respect to every one, that it is too preposterous to be considered for a moment, and that the Senate cannot think of such a thing. Such a proposition is too monstrous to be lawful; such a practice as that contended for ought not to be tolerated.

But, sir, I take it that this view of the matter might have been omitted but for the persistent manner in which the Senator from Indiana has pressed it upon the attention of the Senate to-day and in the past, for the Senate has contravened it in this very case. As I said awhile ago, as soon as these credentials were presented, the question was raised, the issue was made up, the case was properly made before the Senate. It went to a committee, not to inquire into the form of the credentials, not to see whether the certificate was formal, but it went to the committee to examine the case upon its real merits, to determine solemnly whether or not there was a Legislature that elected the claimant, and whether there was a governor who certified to his credentials, whether what purported to be the seal was the seal, whether the secretary of state countersigning them was the secretary. That issue has not only been made up, but it has been undergoing investigation from that day to this. It has occupied much of the time, much of the solemn consideration, much of serious anxiety of the Senate and of the whole country from that day to this; and I take it, sir, that if the applicant is to be admitted at all, he is to be admitted, not upon a prima facie case, as it is insisted, but he is to be admitted upon the deliberate judgment of the Senate, which involves the determination that the Kellogg legislature was the lawful Legislature of Louisiana; that Kellogg was the lawful governor; that the seal which purported to be the seal of that State was the seal; and that the secretary of state who countersigned the credentials was the true and lawful secretary of state of that State. The Senate, if it admits Pinchback, is about to commit itself to these things. It cannot be otherwise. It is plain that the Senate does not intend to act upon a prima facie case. But let us note the fact that the committee in their report now before the Senate do not pretend to ask action upon the merits of the case.

The report of the committee is to be ignored and the case is to be determined, as I have said, on its merits.

So then, Mr. President, he cannot be admitted simply because he has a prima facie case. The Senate has not only the power to refuse to admit him upon what is called a prima facie case, but it is plain from what I have said that it is the duty of the Senate not to do it; that it is bound in law and right not to do it. While it has the physical power to do it, it has no lawful right to do it. But, Mr. President, I insist that in this case the applicant ought not to be admitted upon a prima facie case, if the Senate could lawfully exercise such a power. Indeed, sir, I go further, and say that upon the merits of his claim he ought not to be admitted at all; and I will discuss both these views together. Why do I say so? and this is a very solemn inquiry. The question was made on the presentation of these credentials that the body purporting to elect Pinchback was not the Legislature of Louisiana. Thereupon, according to the course of law and the practice of the Senate, his case was referred to a committee, and a very able committee it was. All the gentlemen composing it I believe were lawyers of great ability and experience, with probably one exception. It was composed of Senators MORTON, Carpenter, LOGAN, ALCORN, ANTHONY, Trumbull, and Hill. Messrs. Carpenter, LOGAN, ALCORN, and ANTHONY made a majority report. The others each made a minority report.

That committee proceeded to discharge their duty, deeply impressed with the matter wherewith they were charged. Their examination of the case occupied them about two months. They took evidence which fills a volume of about eleven hundred pages. They made a report very elaborate in its character, finding the facts and stating the law bearing on the whole case. In that report they say that at the regular election held in 1872 in the State of Louisiana John McEnery was a candidate for governor on what was called the fusion ticket and was at the head of that ticket for governor and State officers and members of the Legislature; William Pitt Kellogg was at the head of the republican ticket. After the election was held the inspectors of the election at the polls ascertained that McEnery and the persons on the fusion ticket for State officers and the persons on that ticket for the Legislature with him were elected by an average majority of 10,000 votes. The inspectors' returns made that fact manifest. The supervisors of the several parishes of that State discharged the duty imposed by their office, and they duly ascertained and reported also to the returning board of that State, where all the returns had to be made under the law of the State, showing the same fact.

The returning board was composed of Governor Warmoth and four other persons. They differed; they disputed and they did not execute their office; but Governor Warmoth, as he might do according to the constitution of Louisiana—and there is no question about that—took from his safe an act which had passed the Legislature at the session last before that time, and approved it, which superseded in many material respects the then existing election law. The effect of that act was to destroy the then existing returning board, so that it could not act and compare the votes; but under a clause of the constitution of Louisiana, in the absence of the senate, the governor had power to appoint officers to serve until the senate should convene, and he had power under the law to appoint a new returning board for the purpose of comparing the votes cast at the election of 1872. In the exercise of that power, he did appoint what was called the "De Feriet board." That board had possession of all the returns. It is not pretended—the committee did not find the fact to be so at all, nor was it suggested—that the returns had in any way been tampered with. They took the returns, compiled them, stated the result, and the result as ascertained by them harmonized with the result as ascertained by the inspectors of the election and the supervisors of election in the several parishes; and this De Feriet board ascertained, as I insist according to the constitution and law of Louisiana, that the McEnery or "fusion ticket" was elected by an average vote of 10,000 majority. The Legislature thus ascertained by this De Feriet board assembled and organized, and thereupon another board was provided by that Legislature. That board appointed by the Legislature also took charge of the returns, compared them just as the De Feriet board had done, and ascertained that the result ascertained by the inspectors of the election, by the supervisors of the several parishes, and by the De Feriet board was correct in substance, and they reported also that the McEnery ticket was elected by an average majority of 10,000 votes.

This able committee of the Senate who thus report had the returns of that election before them here in the committee room. They found them all regular, and in their report, after a laborious examination, they say in terms that the vote as ascertained by the De Feriet board and also by the board appointed by the Legislature was substantially correct, and they report also that the McEnery or fusion ticket was elected by an average majority of 10,000 votes. The majority report says so; Judge Trumbull says so; Mr. Hill says so. Nobody denies that fact; not even the Senator from Indiana himself, who made a minority report.

So, then, Mr. President, there can be no question that so far as that election went the McEnery ticket was elected.

A majority of the committee said, however, that they thought Kellogg ought to have been elected, and therefore they said there was no election; that McEnery's election was obtained by fraudulent means. The principal ground suggested in support of that view of the matter was this: that the republicans at the election next before that had a very large majority in the State; that it was well known that the whole negro vote in the State of Louisiana ought properly to have been cast for the republican ticket. I declare to the Senate that that is the principal suggestion made upon which it is alleged that the election was fraudulent. One of the committee said that the election was unusually quiet and peaceful; there was no riot; there was no force used; there was no disturbance. More than that they report that the vote polled was unusually large. They go upon the ground that the whole colored vote ought to have been cast for the republican party, and therefore they say the election was void, and there was no real election. That is absurd, it seems to me, upon its very face, if nothing else appeared; but when we come to consider the facts connected with that election, it is not surprising that the result ascertained took place.

In the first place, it is stated in one of the reports that the influence of Governor Warmoth, the then governor, was equal to 20,000 republican votes. It was said that by reason of the patronage he controlled he could carry a great many votes; that he had a wonderful personal influence with the negroes and the republican party in that State. It was said furthermore that he had formed a coalition with the fusion ticket. I do not think a public officer has a right to exercise his official patronage for the purpose of controlling elections; but the fact that he does so does not render an election void. We know that it is the practice in this country, in the State governments and in the Federal Government, to use official patronage for the purpose of controlling elections. It is uniformly done by political parties. It is done everywhere. I shall believe while I live, I think the great body of the people of North Carolina to-day believe, that I, in 1872, received a majority of from five to eight thousand of the lawful votes as governor; but the Federal Administration threw all its power there, exercised all its patronage, and in that way the election was nominally carried against me. I could have contended with just as much semblance of right—infinitely more indeed—that I ought to be the governor of the State of North Carolina when my competitor was inaugurated as Kellogg could in this case that he was entitled to be governor, because McEnery got a majority, and the facts go to show that reasonably he ought to have had that majority. There was much more reason in my case. But to get back.

It is admitted that Warmoth was equal to about 20,000 votes; that he had great personal influence; that he had official patronage that gave him control of a very large portion of the colored vote and of the white republicans. He formed an alliance with the McEnery ticket. He had a right to do that. Nobody can question his right to form an alliance with McEnery or any other party he saw proper; and if he chose to cast his influence in favor of that ticket, that fact does not vitiate the result of the election. No reasonable man can so contend. It never was so decided in any case that I have ever seen or heard of.

So that, Mr. President, it does appear by the investigation made in the way and manner I have indicated that the McEnery ticket was elected by a majority of 10,000 votes. It further appears by this same report that the Legislature elected upon his ticket assembled and organized. It further appears that McEnery himself was qualified; that all the State officers elected upon his ticket qualified according to the constitution and laws of the State of Louisiana, and from that day until this they have been claiming to represent the lawful government of the State of Louisiana. Not for one moment have they conceded that any other officers of the State represented the lawful government. In every way in their power have they endeavored to assert their right. They are doing so to-day, and proclaim their purpose to continue to do so.

Mr. McCREERY. Will the Senator from North Carolina give way that I may move that the Senate adjourn?

Mr. MERRIMON. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest that the Senator change his motion to one for an executive session.

Mr. McCREERY. Very well; I modify the motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twelve minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at two o'clock and fifty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. MORTON on the 5th instant:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback be admitted as a Senator from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years, beginning the 4th day of March, 1873.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, it had not been my purpose to address the Senate on yesterday, and therefore I had not collected the cases which I desired to cite upon the point which I debated with as much care as I ought to have done. I therefore beg leave this morning, at the risk of having them come in my remarks at a place not exactly pertinent, to cite a few other cases to which I did not then call attention.

The first case to which I call attention this morning is that of Stark, of Oregon, in 1862. Mr. Stark was appointed by the governor to fill a vacancy. He came to the Senate and presented his credentials. It was suggested by some Senator that he perhaps had used language hostile to the Union in that State. Thereupon his credentials were referred, and the whole merits of the case were gone into by the committee. They made a report, and he was finally admitted to his seat, but in the mean time he was not allowed to sit.

The next case I refer to is that of Mr. GOLDTHWAITE. Senator GOLDTHWAITE was elected by the Legislature of Alabama to represent that State for six years. He also came to the Senate and presented his credentials. They were in due form in all respects and so far as the Senate could see, looking simply at the record, he was entitled to be admitted; but it was suggested that there was some reason why he ought not to be admitted, and thereupon his credentials were referred, and he was kept out of his seat for months. Finally he was admitted. I cite the case to support the view that the Senate is not bound to admit upon a prima facie case. If it were, when he presented his credentials, they being in due form, he was entitled to sit until the merits of his case could be determined.

The Senator from Indiana cited this case as one sustaining the view that he has taken of the case now before the Senate; but so far from sustaining that view it will be seen that it sustains the position which I have taken.

I refer again to the case of Blodgett who was elected to represent the State of Georgia. Blodgett also came with credentials in all respects formal and regular, and he had what is termed here a prima facie case. It was suggested, however, that he was not entitled to sit, and according to the course and practice of the Senate his case went to a committee. That committee examined it and finally made report declaring that he was not entitled. At all events, he never took a seat in the Senate at all. In the mean time, while his case was undergoing investigation he was not allowed to sit.

The next case that I refer to is that of my colleague, [Mr. RANSOM.] He was duly elected by the Legislature of the State of North Carolina in 1872. He presented his credentials. They were in due form in all respects; there was no question made about them. They were, however, referred to a committee and he was not allowed to sit for many months, at all events for a long time. Finally his case was determined and he was allowed to take his seat.

The Senator from Indiana made reference to the practice of the House, and I believe he mentioned the case of Sypher. It seems to me that the case of Sypher in the House illustrates as strongly as any case that I could cite the strength, and force, and propriety, and reason of the doctrine which I have insisted upon. Mr. Sypher presented his credentials more than two years ago. He was admitted upon what is called a prima facie case to a seat in the House. He sat in the House until a very brief period before the last Congress expired. Probably within twenty-four hours before the expiration of the Congress his case was acted upon by the House and he was turned out, because it was ascertained that he was not elected.

Under this practice of admitting upon a prima facie case Mr. Sypher was admitted to the House and he voted upon all the stirring and important questions that were decided by the House during the last Congress. I believe some of them turned upon one vote. How he voted I do not know, nor is it material; but it shows the impolicy, the impropriety, and I go further and say, the illegality of allowing a person applying here to sit upon a prima facie case when his right is questioned.

Now, sir, in opposition to all this vast array of cases which I have cited and which I think settle the regular practice of the Senate, the Senator from Indiana cites two cases. The first one is that of General Shields. I commented sufficiently upon that yesterday. He then cites the case of Robbins from Rhode Island, and he lays a great deal of stress upon that. It would seem that that case does sustain his view; but at the same time it appears to me that every Senator must see at once the impropriety of that case and that it was improperly and unwisely decided. Mr. Robbins sat here many months while his case was questioned; he voted upon all the questions that came before the Senate, and perhaps his vote may have determined an important question before the Senate one way or the other. In the end of that case, it turned out that he was allowed to sit; it was found upon examination that he was duly and properly elected; but suppose he had not been elected? Then there had been a Senator sitting in this body, as in the case of Shields, who had no right whatsoever to sit here and vote. How far his vote may have affected the best interests of the country, the interests of individuals, how far it detracted from the dignity of the Senate, how far it affected his State, how far it might have affected the Union, no earthly power can determine. But I say the case of Robbins goes to show the impolicy of such a practice; and I insist, Mr. President, that the vast array of cases which I have cited are not to be overborne and set aside by the citation of the two cases which the Senator from Indiana has cited, to wit, those of Shields and Robbins. I maintain that they are in the face of the reason of the thing, in the face of the proper construction of the Constitution of the country, in the face of the best interests of our governments, both State and Federal.

When I concluded yesterday, I was giving a brief but correct summary of the action of the committee appointed by the Senate to inquire into the election in Louisiana in 1872. I called attention to the fact that all the authorities of Louisiana that could be called lawful—and I maintain that those who did examine and determine as I suggested were lawful, they were at all events colorable; I believe nobody questions that or ever has questioned it—ascertained that the McEnery ticket was elected by an average majority of ten thousand votes. I think I had better sustain my statement by a few extracts from the report giving the conclusions of the committee. It seems to me that no fair person can consent to doubt the findings and action of the committee under the circumstances. The committee say in reference to the action of the De Feriet board, as follows:

> In the opinion of your committee there can be no doubt—conceding the validity of the act of November 20—that it transferred the duty of canvassing the returns of the last election to the board to be elected under the provisions of the act. The act provided for such election by the senate, and, taking effect in the vacation of the Legislature, created offices to be filled thereafter by the senate. This is what is styled in that State an original vacancy, which, happening in the vacation of the Legislature, the governor is authorized to fill by appointment; and it is said that the State courts of that State have repeatedly recognized the right of the governor to make such appointments.

To make that clause in the report a little clearer, I will say here that the Warmoth board quarreled among themselves. There were two parties, a Kellogg party and a McEnery party, in that board. Each of these factions brought suits in the courts and enjoined the other from counting the returns as they were charged by the law to do. Pending this litigation, Governor Warmoth took from his safe an act which had been passed by the Legislature which assembled in that State next before that time, and approved it. That became a law and repealed the then existing board. Under the law which he then brought into existence by his approval a new board had to be created, and it ought to have been appointed by the governor with the sanction of the senate of that State; but under a provision of the constitution, in the absence of the senate, the governor could appoint, and he did appoint what was called the De Feriet board; and the board to which the committee refer in the clause I have read was the De Feriet board. Now let us see what they say about the result of the action of that board. Speaking of the McEnery ticket, the report says—and this is their conclusion—it would take too much time to go into the evidence upon which they acted; I can only give their conclusions:

It is the opinion of your committee that, but for the unjustifiable interference of Judge Durell, whose orders were executed by United States troops, the canvass made by the De Feriet board, and promulgated by the governor, declaring McEnery to have been elected governor, &c., and also declaring who had been elected to the Legislature, would have been acquiesced in by the people, and that government would have entered quietly upon the exercise of the sovereign power of the State. But the proceedings of Judge Durell, and the support given him by United States troops, resulted in establishing the authority de facto of Kellogg and his associates in State offices, and of the persons declared by the Lynch board to be elected to the Legislature. We have already seen that the proceedings of that board cannot be sustained without disregarding all the principles of law applicable to the subject, and ignoring the distinction between good faith and fraud.

Judge Trumbull in his report says:

According to the official returns, the fusion State ticket, headed by McEnery for governor, received an average majority of about ten thousand votes, and a large majority of the persons elected to the Legislature were of the same party; and but for the illegal interference of the United States authorities, as is stated in the report of the majority, the McEnery government would have been peacefully inaugurated.

How skillfully the plan was laid to overthrow the legitimate State government, set aside an election, and inaugurate the Pinchback and Kellogg administrations and legislatures, and how well Judge Durell was supported in all these revolutionary and illegal proceedings by other United States officials, will appear by reference to a few facts disclosed in the evidence.

The committee say again:

If the Senate should be inclined not to go behind the official returns of the election, then the McEnery government and legislature must be recognized as the lawful government of the State, and McMillen, if regularly elected by that Legislature, should be seated in the Senate in place of Kellogg. But your committee believe that this would be recognizing a government based upon fraud, in defiance of the wishes and intention of the voters of that State.

I cite these extracts from the report of the committee and from the minority report of Judge Trumbull, for the purpose of showing that according to all the legitimate action taken in the State of Louisiana for the purpose of ascertaining who was elected at the election in 1872, according to the examination made by the committee itself, having the returns before them here, according to the truth as ascertained and not denied by any one, the result of the election in 1872 showed that the fusion or McEnery ticket was elected by a majority of 10,000 votes. I cannot conceive how any one in the Senate or anywhere, who has a fair and just mind, can doubt the fact for one moment that the McEnery ticket was elected by the majority I have stated.

After obtaining that majority, the Legislature which was elected upon his ticket assembled; they had a quorum; they proceeded to elect a Senator to fill the vacancy and to fill the regular term in the Senate here. The Legislature also proceeded to count the votes for governor, as they were charged by the constitution and laws of that State to do. They ascertained that McEnery was lawfully elected; that the other State officers upon his ticket were lawfully elected; and they were duly inaugurated. The people of the State of Louisiana were advised, according to the forms and practice of that State, of his election, of his inauguration, and that he and his colleagues were the true and proper officers of the State. The President of the United States was also informed and notified of the election. The matter of his inauguration was brought directly to the attention of the President; it may be said the world was notified of his election and his inauguration in pursuance of it. From the day of his inauguration until this day he has claimed to be the lawful governor of the State of Louisiana and his colleagues the lawful officers of that State, and whenever they have had power to do it they have exercised their offices.

It has been said that their government is a paper government. That I deny. They have exercised power and they have exercised their offices whenever and wherever and under whatever circumstances they could. To-day they claim to exercise their offices, and they proclaim their purpose to insist upon the administration of the government until they shall be subverted by absolute force. And the truth is, the Senate knows, the country knows, the world knows, that they are suppressed to-day by the interference of the Army of the United States.

Why, sir, the President has told us in his recent message that but for the presence of the Army there the Kellogg government could not operate for one hour. The press of the State of Louisiana tells us every day that it cannot stand without the aid of force. The officers of the Army tell the Senate, tell the Congress, tell the President, tell the world in their official reports that but for the presence of the Army of the United States this Kellogg government could not stand there for one hour; and one officer—and he seems to be an officer of sound discretion, of very considerable experience and wise judgment—tells the President, in a report made by him, that the Army might be stationed in every parish in the State of Louisiana, and then the Kellogg government could not administer the government. He says furthermore that the government could not last twenty-four hours but for the presence of the Federal troops, and this in great part growing out of the fact that there is a universal impression, to use the language of the officer, that Kellogg was not elected; that McEnery was elected; that he has claimed to be the lawful governor of the State and his colleagues the lawful officers, and the people are not content to recognize any other authority.

Then, Mr. President, can there be any doubt in the mind of any Senator who is looking simply after truth, without regard to any other consideration, that at the election in 1872 the fusion ticket—the McEnery ticket—was elected by ten thousand majority? Can there be any doubt that in pursuance of that election McEnery was inaugurated as governor and the other State officers elected with him were inaugurated as officers of that State respectively? It seems to me there can be no doubt about it.

But it is said that Kellogg and the Kellogg government are the true and lawful government of the State of Louisiana, and this assertion which I say is not founded in fact or law—I deny it at every step—turns materially upon the question whether or not he was ascertained to be elected by what is called the "Lynch returning board." Those who listened to the argument of the Senator from Indiana will remember that he laid great stress upon the action of the "Lynch returning board;" and if we would take his general statements, underlying his whole argument, the Senate would infer and the country would infer that there was no question in the world about this Lynch returning board, that it was the regular and lawful returning board of the State of Louisiana. Because he laid so much stress upon it, because his whole argument rests upon it, I deem it worth while to look into this Lynch returning board, and see what its character was, and whether it was lawful or unlawful, or whether indeed it was a board at all or not.

Under the law of Louisiana there was what was called a returning board. That returning board was charged to examine the returns in all cases of election, and ascertain who was elected to fill any office. It consisted of five persons. It was to be appointed by the governor, with the consent of the senate, from all political parties, without distinction. Under the law as it existed prior to the 20th of November, 1872, the governor and four others composed this board. In the contest about the election of 1872 Governor Warmoth and his political associates quarreled; they differed; and that difference extended to the returning board. After the election was held, and when it became necessary that the votes should be compared by this returning board, a meeting was held according to law. At that meeting a quarrel sprang up. It is said that Warmoth apprehended that a portion of the board were inimical to his views, and that they would not count the vote as he wanted it counted. They apprehended that he on his part would not count it as they wanted it. The result was that there was an irreconcilable difference, and, besides, two of the members of the board could not act, to wit, Pinchback and Anderson, because they had been candidates and were therefore ineligible to sit. Their places were filled by appointment, and at this meeting Lynch was not present. The board, as a board, never met after that time. Lynch, heading what was called the "Lynch board," composed of Longstreet and three others, brought their suit in court and enjoined the Warmoth faction from comparing the vote. The Warmoth faction, on the other hand, also brought suit against the Lynch faction, and obtained an injunction restraining the Lynch faction from counting the vote; and so the matter stood, and neither faction could compare the vote, nor could the whole board do it, because both factions were enjoined by an injunction issued by a proper court.

Warmoth apprehended that the judge who had granted the injunction in favor of Lynch would decide in favor of the Lynch board. He had no confidence in the judge; he supposed he was corrupted, and I expect he was about right in that. Seeing that he was about to be defeated, he took from his safe the act which had passed the Legislature next before that, to which I have referred two or three times in the course of my remarks, and he approved it. It is conceded on all hands that he might well do it, that the constitution and laws of Louisiana allowed him to approve that act although the Legislature had dissolved and gone, and that that act became operative and was a law of that State as valid as any other statute. The effect of that act was to repeal the law of 1870 and also to abolish the then existing returning board, that is, to abolish the Warmoth returning board as it was styled. It put out of existence the returning board composed of Warmoth, Lynch, and others. In the first place, Lynch, in organizing his board, had no more power to appoint the persons who co-operated with him as the Lynch board than I had. He was not a majority of the Warmoth board. He had no power to fill any vacancy. The whole board had no power to fill any vacancy, for by the law the governor must appoint by and with the sanction of the senate persons to fill such vacancies and in the absence of the senate it was the duty of the governor to appoint. Nobody but the governor could fill any vacancy upon the board as the law existed before the 20th of November, 1872, and I may add after that time too. So that before the approval of the act of the 20th of November, 1872, the Lynch board, so called, had no existence whatsoever any more than if five gentlemen were to get together in the Senate and say they composed a board to compare the vote of Louisiana. But if it could have had any legal existence before the passage of the act of the 20th of November, 1872, it cannot be denied that by operation of that act the board was absolutely abolished. Then I put it to the Senate, I put it to every one who knows anything about principle and about law, to say whether or not that Lynch board ever had any existence at all.

In the first place, it never existed because Lynch had no power to fill any vacancy, nor had the board any power to fill a vacancy. No one but Warmoth could fill a vacancy in the absence of the Senate, and he did not do it; it is not pretended that he did. But suppose the Lynch board had any existence prior to that time, then the approval of the act of the 20th of November, 1872, repealed the act that had existed before that time, abolished the board, and created the necessity for appointing a new board, which was done by Warmoth according to law, and the De Feriet board came into existence.

Then it does appear conclusively that the Lynch board, on the action of which the Senator from Indiana lays the basis of his whole argument, rests his whole case, never had any existence at all. But, Mr. President, will the Senate believe it, if it had any existence? The Lynch board, if it had any legal existence, if it had been a board, never compared the vote cast at the election in 1872 at all; it never ascertained that anybody was elected, and for the reason that there were no returns before it, and it had no returns to compare, and it never ascertained that anybody was elected. Without enlarging upon that, I wish to read to the Senate what the committee who investigated this matter say about the Lynch board. This puts any possible controversy to rest. Even the Senator from Indiana will not contradict what the committee say in the paragraph which I read:

On the 6th of December, 1872, the Lynch board—Bovee, (who was then acting as secretary of state in place of Herron,) Lynch, Longstreet, and Hawkins—pretended to have canvassed the returns of the election, and certified to the secretary of state that Kellogg had been elected governor; Antoine, lieutenant-governor; Clinton, auditor; Field, attorney-general; Brown, superintendent of education; and Deslondes, secretary of state; and also certified a list of persons whom they had determined to be elected to the Legislature.

Now see what the committee say:

There is nothing in all the comedy of blunders and frauds under consideration more indefensible than the pretended canvass of this board.

The following are some of the objections to the validity of their proceedings:

1. The board had been abolished by the act of November 20.

2. The board was under valid and existing injunctions restraining it from acting at all, and an injunction in the Armstead case restraining it from making any canvass not based upon the official returns of the election.

3. Conceding the board was in existence and had full authority to canvass the returns, it had no returns to canvass.

The returns from the parishes had been made under the law of 1870 to the governor, and not one of them was before the Lynch board.

It was testified before your committee by Mr. Bovee himself, who participated in this canvass by the Lynch board, that they were determined to have a republican Legislature, and made their canvass to that end. The testimony abundantly establishes the fraudulent character of their canvass. In some cases they had what were supposed to be copies of the original returns; in other cases they had nothing but newspaper statements; and in other cases, where they had nothing whatever to act upon, they made an estimate, based upon their knowledge of the political complexion of the parish, of what the vote ought to have been. They also counted a large number of affidavits purporting to be sworn to by voters who had been wrongfully denied registration or the right to vote, many of which affidavits they must have known to be forgeries. It was testified by one witness that he forged over a thousand affidavits and delivered them to the Lynch board while it was in session. It is quite unnecessary to waste time in considering this part of the case; for no person can examine the testimony ever so cursorily without seeing that this pretended canvass had no semblance of integrity.

So then it appears, Mr. President, that, according to the facts as they are admitted to be by all parties, the Lynch board never had any existence in law; that if it ever had any existence it was abolished by the act of November 20, 1872; and, further, if it ever had any legal existence at all, if it had been competent in law to count the vote, it never had any returns before it to compare. So neither the Lynch board nor any other authority whatsoever ever ascertained that Kellogg was elected, and nobody can so pretend, founding such pretense on fact or law.

But what appears on the other hand? It appears by the action of the inspectors of the election, the commissioners as they are called under the Louisiana law, by the action of the supervisors in the parishes, by the action of the De Feriet board, which was legal, by the action of another returning board provided by the Legislature which assembled in 1873, by the action of the committee here, it was ascertained that McEnery was elected by ten thousand majority, and, as a necessary consequence, that Kellogg and his ticket were not elected for lack of votes to destroy that majority.

But then the Senator from Indiana, apprehending that somebody would call this defect in his argument to the attention of the Senate and the country, says that the supreme court of that State has recognized Kellogg as the lawful governor and the Kellogg legislature as the lawful Legislature; that there is no question about the supreme court, and that the Senate is bound by the decision of the supreme court of Louisiana.

Now, sir, I do not concede that the Senate is bound by the decision of the supreme court of Louisiana, even if the decision shall be a lawful one. The power of the Senate to determine who is elected one of its members is absolute. It cannot be abridged by any power, State or Federal; nor can it be abridged by the ruling or determination of any other officer whatsoever. The Senate, I repeat, is absolute, and must pass judgment in this behalf without any restraint from any source.

But, sir, if we look to the decisions of the supreme court of Louisiana, we cannot hesitate to determine that the decision made touching this Lynch board was not worthy of any respect or consideration at all. In the case of the leading decision, in which a majority of that court held (for there was a minority that held otherwise) that the Lynch board was lawful, it is plain to any lawyer, it is conceded I believe by all lawyers at least, that the court had no jurisdiction whatever to determine the matter before it. It is a plain principle of law that where a court has no jurisdiction of any matter brought before it, its decision in that behalf is absolutely null and void and goes for nothing. In the leading case which has been cited the court had no jurisdiction, as is conceded by every lawyer, as our able committee said in their report. It had no jurisdiction; and its decision has no effect and no weight whatever, and is not to be regarded by the Senate or anybody else.

In addition to that, it is manifest that the supreme court of the State of Louisiana had conspired with the Kellogg government to sustain it and uphold it with a view to defeat the popular will of that State. Some of the judges of that court were under direct obligations to Kellogg; some of them were looking to his administration to keep them in office. They expected benefits. In addition to that their decision is in the face of the law as it would be determined by any intelligent mind, and in the face of the facts. Besides, there is evidence that goes to show that the supreme court had been in communication with Kellogg and his associates and that fact had been communicated to the Administration here. There was a direct conspiracy between the supreme court of Louisiana and the Kellogg usurpation, and all the decisions made by it are justly referable to that conspiracy, especially when it is manifest to anybody whose mind is controlled by reason that their judgment was in the face of law and right and justice and decency and dignity and everything else that is virtuous and good.

The majority was, as I have shown, beyond controversy, as ascertained by all the authorities who examined the question, Federal and State, in favor of the fusion ticket; and yet in the face of the fact that the De Feriet board was legal, in the face of the returns of all the officers, that court went on and decided that the Lynch board was legal. Such a decision as that shows corruption on its face and that the judges who made it are not entitled to consideration or respect at the hands of the people of Louisiana or of the Senate or anybody else.

Let me show you what Mr. Casey said to the President on the subject of this supreme court before they made this decision. I regret to know that this band of conspirators there put themselves in communication with the President on this subject and were recognized and sustained by him. James F. Casey sent to the President a telegram on the 12th of December, 1872. He was urging the President to recognize the Pinchback government, and after Pinchback to recognize the Kellogg government and his legislature. If I had time I could read half a dozen communications showing that he was importuned day after day and night after night by Casey, Kellogg, Packard, and others to recognize the Pinchback government, or in other words to recognize the whole usurpation there. In the telegram I refer to Casey says this:

The supreme court is known to be in sympathy with the republican State government. If a decided recognition of Governor Pinchback and the legal Legislature were made, in my judgment it would settle the whole matter. General Longstreet has been appointed by Governor Pinchback as adjutant-general of State militia.

Now, I ask how Mr. Casey knew the feeling of the supreme court in anticipation of the decisions relied upon by the Senator from Indiana? I ask, if the supreme court judges will agree to do such dirty and corrupt political work as that, are their decisions entitled to consideration at the hands of anybody? I ask every one who has any sense of justice if such a supreme court does not deserve to be denounced by every honest man throughout the land; if it does not deserve execration; if it ought not to be spurned from society and civilization; if such a set of judges do not deserve, every one of them who joined in such practices and decisions, to be impeached and turned out of the office they have disgraced?

But the Senator says in the next place that the election of Kellogg and his government was recognized by the President of the United States. First, that he recognized the Legislature and afterward Kellogg as governor.

Suppose the President did so, that does not bind Congress or the Senate. It is not the office of the President to recognize a State government except as he is empowered to do so by Congress. He is the executive power. Congress has the legislative and the political power. It is the peculiar office of Congress, it has exclusive jurisdiction to recognize what are State governments and what are not State governments in particular cases properly brought before it. It is true, indeed, that the President, in the exercise of his authority, which I will speak of more by and by, is bound to recognize the existing government in one case, but only in that case. His action is not final in that behalf; his action is subject to review by Congress; and his action in that behalf in no way affects the Senate in determining who was elected one of its members. It is a mere circumstance, that might have moral weight upon the mind of a Senator. He might say, "The President has recognized the Kellogg legislature; the President has recognized Pinchback as governor; he is a good man; he is an intelligent man; it was his duty to recognize somebody; and inasmuch as he has so determined, I take it he did it upon sufficient examination and deliberation, and it has weight with me." That is all that can be said about his action. It is not final, as the Senator from Indiana has said. He showed no authority to sustain his view, nor can he do it; but the Constitution as expounded by judicial decisions makes it clear beyond cavil that it is peculiarly the office of the Congress of the United States to determine what is a lawful State government and who are the properly ascertained officers representing it.

Then he says further that the House of Representatives has recognized the Kellogg government as the true and lawful government. He says they passed at the late session, just before they adjourned, a resolution in these words:

Resolved, That William Pitt Kellogg be recognized as the governor of the State of Louisiana until the end of the term of office fixed by the constitution of that State.

In the first place, the House of Representatives had no more right to pass that resolution than I have. The Senate has no right to pass that resolution or another similar resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana. Where is the warrant of authority in the Constitution that empowers one branch of Congress to recognize any State government? I never heard of it. I never read it. I do not believe any can be cited, and I challenge the Senator from Indiana or anybody else who can do it to cite it. I say that the House of Representatives had no right to pass that resolution, and it is no more than if it had not been passed at all. Nor can the Senate pass a similar one. All the Senate can do is to determine whether or not Pinchback was elected by the Legislature of Louisiana to represent that State here, and the Senate has no power to determine what is the lawful State government, except in determining whether a particular person was elected or not a Senator to represent the State in the Congress of the Union. In determining who was elected Senator, the Senate decides that a particular body was the true Legislature, but it can only determine in that way; it has no other or further jurisdiction to say by resolution or otherwise that one government or another is the lawful government.

But let us see what the House of Representatives did. They passed this resolution, which they had no jurisdiction or power to pass, and it therefore goes for nothing.

They allowed to sit in their body, upon what is here called a prima facie case, members of Congress from Louisiana elected upon the Kellogg ticket; and before they adjourned they turned them out and seated those members of Congress who were elected upon the McEnery or fusion ticket; so that if there is anything in this resolution, if it has any force or effect whatsoever, the House has stultified itself, for after it declared at one moment by this resolution that the Kellogg government is the lawful government and to be recognized as such, it turned around and admitted that the members elected to Congress upon the fusion or McEnery ticket, thereby declaring very strongly that the McEnery ticket was elected. So that, I say, all these authorities that the Senator falls back upon to sustain his case go for nothing. They are empty; they prove nothing; indeed when examined they go to show that he is in the gravest error, that the President has erred, that the Kellogg government is a sheer usurpation, unlawful, upheld and sustained by Federal power.

Then, Mr. President, it must be manifest to reasonable men that the Kellogg government was not elected by the people of Louisiana, nor has anything transpired in the State of Louisiana or anywhere else that has the force and effect to give that government legality. And thus it appears that there is a lawful government there, and that the Kellogg government, so called, is in power and administering the government; but now let us see what his government is, and what ought to be done with it; whether indeed it is a government or whether indeed it is a sheer usurpation.

It is not pretended that his government is a de jure government. It is said that he is the governor de facto and that his officers are the officers de facto of the State of Louisiana; that it is the existing government; that it would lead to bad consequences to displace it, to abolish it; and that because it is the existing government it has force and effect, it is legal, it is competent to administer the government of the State of Louisiana. All this I flatly deny.

In the first place it is not de jure. Why? Because Kellogg and his associates were not elected. A de jure officer is one who was duly elected or appointed and fills the office, and his office is in all respects complete and effective. Then I say that he is not a de facto officer. What is a de facto officer? It is not simply one who happens to be in the office and undertakes to discharge the duties of the office. That seems to be the supposition here; but it is a very false and pernicious view of the subject. A de facto officer is one who goes into office by color of right in an irregular way, but still in some sense recognized by the law, and he exercises the office for the benefit of the public; and for the benefit of the public alone, not for himself, his acts are deemed and held valid. He is one who appears to act in pursuance and by authority of law, who appears to act in the office by colorable sanction of law.

I want to cite some authorities on this subject, for, as I said a moment ago, a very false notion seems to prevail in the Senate and outside of the Senate as to what constitutes a de facto officer. The first case I cite is a very ancient English one, drawing the distinction. I cite the case of The King vs. Lisle. In that case the court say:

It was held by the whole court (except Lee, chief justice, who gave no direct opinion as to this point) that Goldwire was not so much as a mayor de facto—

The question was about whether a particular party was the mayor of a certain town or city—for in order to constitute a mayor de facto it is necessary that there be some form or color of an election; but without this, the taking the title and regalia of the office, and the acting and being sworn in as mayor, are not sufficient; and with this agrees the Abbot of Fountain's case. Now here it appears that Goldwire was never elected in fact; and though it be stated that he was sworn at the leet, it does not appear (as it ought) that this was agreeable to the constitution of the borough. And it is not material that he acted as mayor, as it is found that a quo warranto was recently prosecuted against him, pending which the present election was made, and that he was thereupon adjudged to be an usurper. The consequence hereof plainly is that the election is void. And Lee, chief justice, said that in these cases the proper question is, whether the person be an officer de facto as to the particular purpose under consideration, according to 1 Salkeld, 96. And he cited the Queen and Davis, in Queen Anne's time, where on a motion for an information it was held that there cannot be an officer de facto and an officer de jure at the same time; and therefore the chief justice said that it would deserve great consideration whether collation by a bishop de facto is good where there is a rightful one in being. (Andrews's Reports, 172, 173.)

The next authority I cite is an interesting case which will be found in 37 Maine Reports, page 423. The court say:

An officer de facto is one who has the reputation of being the officer he assumes to be, and yet is not a good officer in point of law. * * * Or one who actually performs the duties of an office, with apparent right and under claim and color of an appointment or election. He is not an officer de jure, because not in all respects qualified and authorized to exercise the office; nor a usurper, who presumes to act officially without any just pretense or color of right. A mere claim to be a public officer and exercising the office will not constitute one an officer de facto; there must be at least a fair color of right, or an acquiescence by the public in his official acts so long that he may be presumed to act as an officer by right of appointment or election.

* * * * * * *

The distinction between officers de facto, acting colore officii, and officers de jure has been recognized in England from an early period, and seems to have been applied to officers of every grade, from the king to the lowest incumbent of office.

The court say further:

The same distinction is equally well known in this country, and has been applied in numerous cases, and to a great variety of offices, where persons have claimed to act colore officii, though not qualified according to the requirements of law, and where their acts, as officers de facto, have been upheld. It is familiar doctrine in the courts of our own State, and is sustained by the cases following.

Citing a great number of them.

I then cite Bouvier's Law Dictionary. Bouvier, a learned law lexicographer, says this:

An officer de facto is one who performs the duties of an office with apparent right, and under claim and color of an appointment, but without being actually qualified in law so to act.

If these definitions of what constitutes an officer de facto are correct, I put it to every sensible man to say if in any point of view Kellogg can be called an officer de facto? He was not elected. There was a majority of ten thousand votes against him and his associates. He did not come in by color of any authority. It was alleged that he was ascertained to be elected by the Lynch board, but the facts, the reports, the examinations all go to show that the Lynch board had no existence whatsoever, and that it never compared any vote or returns at all. All the authorities that examined the vote cast in that State in 1872 go to show that the McEnery ticket was elected, I repeat, by a majority of ten thousand votes. Therefore it cannot be pretended that Kellogg came in by any color of authority whatsoever. If anybody can show any color for his authority I will be obliged to him if he will cite it.

Then if Kellogg is not an officer de jure, if he is not the governor de facto, what is he? He is a mere naked usurper. He is as much a usurper as if I were to go into the State of Maryland to-day with ten thousand armed men at my back and proclaim myself governor there, and with that force and power, backed by the Army of the United States, were to administer that government for twelve months. Would anybody pretend in that case that I could be the governor of the State of Maryland? I have ten thousand armed men, and I proclaim myself governor. I inaugurate a State government founded upon the constitution of that State. I observe all its provisions in every respect. I apply to the President of the United States for troops to sustain me as governor, and, advisedly or unadvisedly, honestly or corruptly, he recognizes and sustains me there in the exercise of this power; could that by any possibility constitute me the lawful governor de facto, de jure, or in any other way, in the State of Maryland? I apprehend that there is not a man in all this country that would so believe for one moment; and apart from the frauds, the dust, and fog that prevailed in the State of Louisiana, Kellogg and his associates are as much usurpers as I would be if I were to go into the State of Maryland and do all that I supposed. I could not live there an hour unless I were backed by armed force; nor could the Kellogg usurpation last an hour but for the fact that he is backed by the troops of the United States.

What is a usurpation? Let us see. I will cite again Bouvier's Law Dictionary. He says:

Usurpation—

A term used in connection with government, means this—

The tyrannical assumption of the government by force, contrary to and in violation of the constitution of the country.

I ask any Senator here, I ask any friend of the Kellogg government, if that definition does not cover completely and precisely the case in hand? The author, if he had been writing a definition to cover this case, could not have been more exact. It is so strong and pointed that I will read it again:

Usurpation: The tyrannical assumption of the government by force, contrary to and in violation of the constitution of the country.

Usurper:

Another word applied to government—

one who assumes the right of government by force, contrary to and in violation of the constitution of the country.

Now let us see how Worcester defines these terms. He says:

Usurpation: The act of usurping; forcible, illegal seizure or possession.

Usurper: One who usurps; one who seizes or possesses that to which he has no right; applied particularly to one who excludes the rightful heir from the throne.

Then, Mr. President, as the Kellogg government was not elected nor ascertained to be elected, and is not and never has been in any legal sense a government de jure, is not in any possible sense a government de facto, inasmuch as Kellogg is there exercising power and undertaking to administer the government; and inasmuch as he has been upheld by force from the beginning of the exercise of such power on his part to this day, and by force alone, according to the legal definitions which I have brought to the attention of the Senate, according to all law, according to all rules of construction, he is a mere naked usurper; he is not an officer de facto, and he is liable to be displaced from the position he holds whenever the lawful authorities of the State of Louisiana can displace him.

But it is said, however that may be, by the Constitution of the United States the Federal Government, the President in the first place and Congress after him, has the right to determine who constitute the lawful officers of a State government; and the President of the United States having recognized Kellogg as the lawful governor and the Kellogg government as the lawful government, the people of the State of Louisiana must acquiesce; they must admit and sustain that usurpation, however much and widely the President may have erred. Now, sir, I wish to inquire into this matter. It is an interesting question. It is one that ought to be decided after solemn debate and the most thorough and scrutinizing investigation. A question of higher interest and more momentous concern could not arise.

Looking into commentaries on our Constitution and the political writings of public men, I regret to find that the article of the Constitution which bears on this subject has never been much discussed, and the responsibility is with us to examine it and determine its meaning and apply it. The Constitution provides in section 4, article 4:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.

In the first place I remark, that this clause of the Constitution contains a power to be exercised, not originally or directly; it is a power to be exercised in a collateral way, collaterally to the State government. It is a clause which provides a guarantee; it is a collateral undertaking on the part of the nation—the United States—not to make a republican government for a State, but to secure to a State with a republican form of government that government against foreign invasion or domestic violence, or any and all causes that might in any way destroy its republican character. It is a collateral undertaking on the part of the United States to do this. It implies that there is a government already existing; it implies the United States agreed, as the National Government when it came into operation, to protect the several States in the then existing governments, which were treated as republican in their character, to protect them forever against foreign invasion and domestic violence or interference in that form of government. It applies manifestly and reasonably to more than that; it means that as often as the several States shall see proper to change their forms of government, preserving a republican form, so long as they should continue to be republican in form the United States will from time to time and forever protect them in the exercise of rights under such a form of government.

What is a republican form of government? Why, sir, I do not think there can be any doubt about that. In a very general sense it may be said to be a government of public sentiment regulated by law; but that is not sufficiently definite for my present purpose. A republican form of government is a government by the people, administered through their agents, their representatives, and their officers elected by the voting population. It seems to me, after some consideration, that this definition embraces every feature of a republican government. The essential feature in it is that it is representative in its character. It is a government administered through agencies, agencies of the people, representing the whole people, but not necessarily elected by the whole people, but elected by the voting population as the constitution and laws shall provide.

While, therefore, any State in the Union shall have a republican government that compasses this leading idea, the Government of the United States is bound to protect it in that behalf. And if a State should undertake to establish a monarchical feature in its constitution, such a provision would be absolutely inoperative. Why? Not only because it contravenes the genius of our institutions, but it would contravene the Constitution of the United States; and I apprehend that if a State were by its constitution and law to undertake to invest an officer there with regal powers, to make him king, the United States Government, its courts, its whole authority, could declare in a legal way that such a provision of the constitution or the laws of any State was absolutely null and void and inoperative; and because such a provision would contravene the Constitution of the United States; and the United States courts, and indeed every department of the Government of the United States, its action being regulated by law, would have the power to treat such a provision as a nullity anywhere and everywhere, under all circumstances.

How far must the United States Government go in guaranteeing a republican form of government? It may be said in one sense that a constitution republican in form in all its provisions is a republican form of government; but that is not what is meant here. A reasonable, just, and necessary construction of this clause of the Constitution implies a great deal more than that. Suppose the State of New York to-day by the act of God or the public enemy were deprived of all its officers, its governor and all other State officers, so that it would have no State officers at all. The form of government as embodied in its constitution would remain republican, but that would not be the complete government contemplated by this clause of the Constitution of the United States. It implies that if by the act of God or the public enemy or any other cause the State government shall be dismantled so that there are no lawful officers to administer it, and if there is no law by which the places of those officers may be filled by the voting people of the State, it is the duty and obligation of the United States to provide a means by which the people of the State could fill those offices. I say then if it shall turn out that the State of Louisiana has no officers, through the frauds, combinations, and corruptions of the Kellogg party, or the McEnery party, or the other ambitious and corrupt men in the State of Louisiana and elsewhere—in that extreme case, and only in that extreme case—Congress not only has the right and power but it would be its duty, it would be under obligation to provide a means whereby those officers may be supplied by the voting people of that State.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to ask the Senator a question right there. Does he mean by that to say that it is the duty of Congress to provide for an election?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir; in the case I suppose.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I would ask a further question. When a majority of our committee reported to this House against the government in Louisiana, stating that the frauds were so great that they could not recognize either government and asked the Senate to pass a bill authorizing an election so as to establish a government, why was it that the Senator voted against that bill, with all his associates on that side of the House?

Mr. MERRIMON. In the first place I was not in Congress at that time; but if I had been I would not have voted for that bill for a reason which I will now state.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. When I asked why he did not vote for that bill, I did not recollect the fact that he was not here. But every Senator on that side of the Senate, commonly denominated democrats, voted against that bill, and I supposed that included him. I did not remember that the Senator himself was not here at that time.

Mr. MERRIMON. But I will now answer the Senator's question in full, for I am very anxious on this subject; I am serious about it, and mean to do what is right without regard to party affiliations. I am sincere when I say that this question is above parties, and I intend to act above parties and I wish everybody else would do likewise.

I say to the Senator most frankly that if I had been here I would not have voted for that bill. I say to him frankly that I will not vote for such a bill now; and why? Because I believe as I know there is a God, I believe as I know that I exist, I believe by every evidence by which conviction can be carried to my mind in that respect, that a lawful election was held in the State of Louisiana at the regular time according to law in 1872, and that a governor and other State officers were elected; that they were inaugurated; that they from that day to this have been proclaiming their right to administer the government; that they are doing it to-day, and if the United States would do their duty they would administer it and there would be peace and quiet in the State of Louisiana. For these reasons I could not vote for such a bill.

But if there are Senators in this Chamber who believe otherwise—and I shall not question the sincerity of their convictions; I shall not question the sincerity of the convictions of the Senator from Illinois, for I believe he was sincere and the whole committee were sincere—I implore them in the name of justice and my country to declare by their act and their vote that there is no government there, and to make a just and wise provision by which the people can elect officers to fill the offices. I shall complain of no one for doing so, however much I may think they err. If I could believe there was no government there, if I could believe there were no officers there to administer the government, that by fraud or any other means the State was dismantled of its officers, in one moment I would gladly vote for an appropriate law to enable the people to elect officers to fill the necessary State offices that are not filled according to law. I would not vote, however, for the bill presented by the late Senator from Wisconsin, (Mr. Carpenter.) That bill did not provide for an election according to this provision of the Constitution. Congress has no right to have an election held there under a statute of the United States regulating the manner of election at all. Congress must provide according to the circumstances of the case for an election to be held pursuant to the constitution and laws of the State of Louisiana and for the election to be held by the people of Louisiana. It might provide that certain officers should be appointed under the act of Congress to superintend the holding of the election, but that is as far as it could go. I never would consent to allow it to be held by Federal authority, by Federal troops, by Federal officers to control the vote. I would provide the means whereby the people according to their own constitution and laws could hold an election and fill the offices, uninfluenced by extraneous force or influence.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to disturb the Senator in his discussion, to which I am paying attention; but as we go along I would like to make a suggestion to him. As I have before stated to the Senate, I was placed in a very peculiar position in reference to this question. Suppose, acting upon the theory that he is now going on, that an election might be provided by the Congress of the United States in a constitutional form, or mode, or plan, in some such way as he suggests, that the Congress of the United States should absolutely refuse to adopt that plan, no matter by whose votes, whether by republicans or democrates, and the condition of things in the State was that of chaos and confusion, as was the case in Louisiana, I ask him what his remedy would be? If there was no recognition given to the party that he claimed to be elected, and there were two State governments claiming the right in that way, and all was turmoil and confusion, and Congress should utterly refuse to take any step whatever, then I ask him what would be the result?

Mr. MERRIMON. That is to suppose Congress would be false, that it would not do its duty.

Mr. LOGAN. I am supposing precisely the case that exists. I was on the committee and was with the majority. We reported to the Senate that there was no State government in Louisiana. We said that according to the best lights we could get, according to the certificates before us, McEnery was elected if any election took place; but the frauds were so great on both sides that we deemed there was no legal election held, and therefore, we asked the Congress of the United States to authorize an election to be held so that the people might elect a governor and other State officers, with the safeguards that we thought necessary in the bill; but that was voted down. Then what was the condition? What was my condition? Congress having refused to carry out the suggestion of a new election, I must then adopt the next best mode in order to give those people a government. What is that mode? I ask the Senator, and I put it to him as a legal proposition, how he would act? Suppose then the President acts when Congress refuses to act, and recognizes one of the parties; suppose then the courts of the State act and recognize one of these parties, as they have a right to do when the question is before them, then I ask the Senator what course would he take? Would he adopt the form of revolution for the purpose of overturning that government which had been recognized when there was a necessity for the establishment of some government; or would he support that government in order to give peace to the people? I put that as a square proposition to him; and that states my position precisely as I have occupied it here in the Senate. When I could not get what I thought it was right for Congress to do, I then adopted the next best mode in order to give peace and tranquillity to the people in Louisiana; I fell back upon the necessity of the case, and that necessity requires a government of some kind to exist; and if there is a legal government that we can find, supported by the President and the courts, I ask him what would he do? Would he overturn that government by revolution if Congress refused to pass a law authorizing an election; or would he support the President in maintaining peace?

Mr. MERRIMON. I will answer the Senator with all frankness. In the first place, the President under the legislation of Congress, not in the exercise of any original power conferred on him by the Constitution but by virtue of an act of Congress, where there are two contending parties in a State claiming to be the lawful officers of the State, has the right, and indeed it is his duty, to determine, on proper application to him with a view to the exercise of his office, which of the two parties lawfully represented the State government. Having determined that question, it is his duty to aid that party in administering the government. It is the duty of everybody to sustain the President while he shall continue in that course. But it is the duty of the President also, before he shall determine which faction he will recognize, to decide that delicate question after full hearing and thorough investigation. He may not decide hastily, rashly, recklessly; he must decide cautiously and advisedly. If he shall not do so, then I have to say he is false to the high trust reposed in him and he is not fit to be President. That officer is charged with no more delicate power and duty. There is no Federal power that more vitally affects the State governments. If he does it without a hearing, if he does it without due consideration—as I contend, with all respect, he did in this case—the President is to be complained of, he is to be held responsible for his unwise and injudicious conduct and held responsible to the American people; but inasmuch as he has the legal authority to so determine in the first instance, it is the duty of the people of the United States and the people of the State of Louisiana to submit to his action, and only to his action, until he shall reverse it himself or Congress shall reverse it.

I maintain that when the President found out from the report of the Senate committee and from other sources that bad and corrupt men had imposed upon him and led him astray, that it was his solemn and high duty, and it ought to have been his highest pleasure and an opportunity seized upon joyfully, to change his action, and say "I acted inadvertently; I was not properly informed." But then after he had taken action and recognized the Kellogg government, and while his action, and his action alone, ought to have been submitted to until it should be reversed, as I have said, it was the duty of Congress long, long ago, and the President and the country have a right to complain of Congress because it did not do it, to have determined, as the proper power and the only proper tribunal to determine, which of the two governments was the lawful one. If the Congress of the United States are willing for any consideration, political or otherwise, to take the responsibility of recognizing the Kellogg government, let them do it; they may so decide for improper and sinister considerations and purposes, but let them decide. They have full and complete jurisdiction to do it, and when they have made the decision, however distasteful to the people of Louisiana, they are bound to submit, because the lawful and properly constituted authorities of the country shall have so determined. In that case the decision would be manifestly wrong, but there is no further appeal, except to the ballot-box—to the high tribunal of the American people—to public sentiment. But inasmuch as Congress has not acted in this respect, inasmuch as it has failed in its duty in this respect, until the action of the President shall be reversed or until he shall reverse his own action, as I maintain he has the power and right to do and he ought to do, it is the duty of the people of Louisiana and of the whole country to submit to his determination. In the mean time the proper and lawful government is to protect its existence as far as it can until the highest authority, to wit, Congress, shall determine the question at issue.

Mr. LOGAN. That is just the point exactly that I desired the Senator to come to. I stated that Congress had not acted. I care not how much fault he finds with Congress, nor do I care what fault he finds with the President; but I put the simple proposition, that inasmuch as Congress has not acted and the President has acted, the President not having reversed his action, but standing by it, then the question is what is the duty of the people of Louisiana, whether to go into revolution or to stand by the action of the President?

Mr. MERRIMON. To submit to his action unquestionably until it is reversed.

Mr. LOGAN. I am very glad to hear the Senator say that.

Mr. MERRIMON. But I do not mean by that that the McEnery government is to cease to exist. I mean that the McEnery government is to stand there until the highest and last authority shall act and determine that it is not the lawful authority.

Mr. LOGAN. I will ask the Senator another question, then, in furtherance of this discussion. Inasmuch as he says the duty of the people of the State of Louisiana is to maintain the position of the President until the President reverses his action, I ask whether he considers McEnery and his followers and satellites a part of the people of Louisiana?

Mr. MERRIMON. I do.

Mr. LOGAN. Then it is their duty to maintain that government, too, is it not? If it is their duty to maintain it, how can they maintain a separate government?

Mr. MERRIMON. It is their duty to submit to the action of the President, and only to him. Their separate government is not active, but is there to spring into existence the moment this unlawful power is removed, the moment the controversy is ended.

Mr. LOGAN. It stands ready?

Mr. MERRIMON. Until the unlawful power is decided against by the authority competent to decide in that behalf.

Mr. LOGAN. It stands ready, as I understand the Senator, fully organized but in a passive condition until the other government can be wiped out, and then it proposes to come in. That is the idea?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir. I maintain that it is the duty of the President this day, in view of the facts and the law of this case, to withdraw the troops from Louisiana and to allow the McEnery government to operate.

Mr. LOGAN. Now I will ask the Senator another question right in connection with that, because I see that he and I on the general view would not disagree very much in the conclusion we come to except that I would differ from him about the McEnery government being a government at all at the present time. When the McEnery government usurped the authority of the State last September and absolutely ousted and overturned the Kellogg government, which they did, if McEnery had then taken possession of the government, does the Senator think he would have been lawfully in possession?

Mr. MERRIMON. I do.

Mr. LOGAN. You then sustain the rebellion against the Kellogg government?

Mr. MERRIMON. It was no rebellion; it was the right asserting itself against the wrong—not against the President or any lawful authority.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the point. There is a difference of opinion.

Mr. MERRIMON. I maintain that when the rightful government asserted its power at that time, it was not only competent for the President to do it, but I did hope that he would recognize and sustain it. If the President will withdraw the troops and thus put the case out of court, McEnery and his associates have the right forthwith to assert their authority.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes; but he did not do it.

Mr. MERRIMON. Will the Senator wait until I get through with my sentence?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. MERRIMON. It was not only the right of the President but it was his duty to uphold the rightful government, it having asserted its authority.

Mr. LOGAN. I would differ with the Senator as to which government it was his duty to uphold; but we would both agree that it was his duty to uphold the government. I sustain the President in upholding the Kellogg government; but when the revolution occurred and overturned that government, according to the theory of the Senator McEnery was the rightful governor. If the McEnery government had been inaugurated and had possession, then the President was at fault when he sustained the Kellogg government and put down the Penn insurrection, as I understand the Senator?

Mr. MERRIMON. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. LOGAN. According to the Senator's reasoning, when the Kellogg government was overturned on the 14th of September and the McEnery government usurped the control—I use that term; perhaps he would not—took the places and installed themselves, then the Senator would maintain that they were rightfully in power and it was the duty of the President then to maintain McEnery in possession of the governorship of that State instead of sustaining Kellogg and putting down the insurrection. There is the difference between the Senator and myself. I say that the President's duty was to put down the rebellion against the government, and he did do it, and did right and proper under the authority conferred upon him as President of the United States. The Senator thinks differently; and there is the conclusion that he is bound to come to, and I am bound to come to the other, for his reasoning sustains the rebellion of the 14th of September and my reasoning would put it down. That is the difference between us.

Mr. MERRIMON. The difference between us is this: I say there was no rebellion there at the time he mentions; I say the rightful government being prevented from the exercise of its rightful authority had a right to assert itself whenever it could do it, except as against the President exercising his power.

Mr. ALCORN. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALCORN. I understand the Senator's position to be that it was the duty of the people of Louisiana to maintain the government recognized by the President, and he carried his declaration so far as to declare it to be the duty of the McEnery government to obey the government that had been recognized by the President.

Mr. MERRIMON. To submit to the President—not to the Kellogg government.

Mr. ALCORN. To submit. Then when they failed to submit, when they came forward and took possession of the Kellogg government, they were usurpers and revolutionists, as I understand, according to the logic of the speech of the honorable Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. MERRIMON. No, sir; that is not my logic, nor my meaning. I mean to say that the lawful government had the right to assert itself as against the Kellogg government and all unlawful authority at all times, but not against the President, and not against him because he exercised authority he might under the law exercise.

Mr. LOGAN. That is not his logic. His logic was just the contrary, that they were not usurpers.

Mr. ALCORN. If it was the duty of these people to maintain the Kellogg government, to recognize it, how could they without violating that duty take hold of and usurp the government themselves?

Mr. LOGAN. That is the point exactly. I say they could not; the Senator says they could lawfully do so.

Mr. MERRIMON. I will illustrate my meaning by a rule of law that is practiced upon in the courts every day and has been for centuries. A owns a tract of land and proposes to cut down all the timber and shade trees. B makes claim to the land and brings his suit; pending the litigation he obtains an injunction to restrain A from cutting down the shade trees. A may not resist that injunction, but the moment it is dissolved he may freely exercise his right. Pending the injunction his right was in existence, but he could not exercise it. Take another case: A has been elected to an office; B, an intruder, a usurper, has by some means gotten possession of the office and will not surrender it; A brings his suit to oust the usurper. His office is not lost pending the litigation; it exists all the time; he may take possession of the office whenever he can. And so if one in office lawfully is temporarily restrained in its exercise he does not by such restraint lose his office; he may again exercise it when he can. He may always assert it when lawful restraint is removed.

Mr. ALCORN. Will the Senator allow me one word again?

Mr. MERRIMON. Certainly.

Mr. ALCORN. In a question of forcible entry and detainer, if a party being in possession of the property is ousted by the legal owner and he uses violence to take possession, upon the trial of the forcible entry and detainer the title to the property does not come in question; it is the question of possession, and he will be ousted upon the facts without regard to the manner in which he acquired possession of the property. McEnery in this case, if I understand, had the legal title, according to the argument of the Senator from North Carolina, but he made forcible entry, and the law of the case is that he shall be ousted, having forcibly entered.

Mr. MERRIMON. No, sir; my position is this, and it is perfectly consistent: I say that the moment this lawful government can assert itself it has the right to do it. I say that it is the continuing duty of the President to recognize that lawful government and to sustain it. I say, however, that while the President in the exercise of the authority vested in him by law shall continue to enforce his order the whole people are bound to submit to it, not recognizing it as lawful at all, but they are bound to submit to it by reason of the power vested in the President until the proper authority shall reverse his action or until he shall reverse his action himself. I say that McEnery is the lawful governor and his associates the other lawful State officers, and therefore the President ought to reverse his action now. If he were to withdraw the troops from the State of Louisiana the McEnery government would go into operation in twenty-four hours, and there would be peace and quiet in that State.

But, sir, this interruption is apart from the question now before the Senate. Whatever may have been the action of the President, that ought to have no weight with us in determining this question. If he has erred, it is the duty of the Senate not to err; it is the duty of Congress to reverse his action. The President has a power, but his power is temporary. His judgment there is temporary. He recognized the Kellogg government, and he has told Congress repeatedly that he recognized it, and would continue to do so, until Congress would take further action; and the moment that Congress shall decide he erred or any way, he is willing the lawful government shall spring up and operate at once.

In further support of what I have said I beg now to call the attention of the Senate to the decision of the Supreme Court in Luther vs. Borden. I believe it is the only decision bearing upon the powers of the President, and it is an exposition that throws very much light on this very question. The opinion is delivered by Chief Justice Taney, and in the course of their opinion the court say:

> Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress—
> I repeat that—
> it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State. For, as the United States guarantee to each State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State before it can determine whether it is republican or not. And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority. And its decision is binding on every other department of the Government, and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal. It is true that the contest in this case did not last long enough to bring the matter to this issue; and as no Senators or Representatives were elected under the authority of the government of which Mr. Dorr was the head, Congress was not called upon to decide the controversy. Yet the right to decide is placed there, and not in the courts.
> So, too, as relates to the clause in the above-mentioned article of the Constitution providing for cases of domestic violence. It rested with Congress, too, to determine upon the means proper to be adopted to fulfill this guarantee. They might, if they had deemed it most advisable to do so, have placed it in the power of a court to decide when the contingency had happened which required the Federal Government to interfere. But Congress thought otherwise, and no doubt wisely, and by the act of February 28, 1795, provided that "in case of any insurrection in any State against the government thereof it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States as may be applied for, as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection."
> By this act the power of deciding whether the exigency had arisen upon which the Government of the United States is bound to interfere is given to the President. He is to act upon the application of the Legislature or of the executive, and consequently he must determine what body of men constitute the Legislature and who is the governor before he can act. The fact that both parties claim the right to the government cannot alter the case, for both cannot be entitled to it. If there is an armed conflict, like the one of which we are speaking, it is a case of domestic violence, and one of the parties must be in insurrection against the lawful government. And the President must, of necessity, decide which is the government, and which party is unlawfully arrayed against it, before he can perform the duty imposed upon him by the act of Congress.
> Undoubtedly if the President, in exercising this power, shall fall into error or invade the rights of the people of the State, it would be in the power of Congress to apply the proper remedy. But the courts must administer the law as they find it.

I beg to repeat this, because it is so important—

> Undoubtedly if the President, in exercising this power, shall fall into error—

As I contend he has done in this case—> or invade the rights of the people of the State, it would be in the power of Congress to apply the proper remedy.

So in the case before us there were two contending parties in the State of Louisiana, each claiming to administer the government of that State. Both parties applied to the President for the assistance allowed by the Constitution in such cases. It was his duty to decide which party were the true and lawful officers of the State and properly and lawfully entitled by the constitution and laws of that State to administer the government. I regret that the President did not take that course of action which he ought to have taken in order to decide which of those parties he ought to have recognized. If he had done so I do not believe that Congress would be bothered and the country troubled with this Kellogg usurpation to-day. The President committed a grave error in that he did not hear both parties and decide after a full hearing. There can be no doubt, it seems to me, in the minds of Congress, in the mind of any disinterested person, in the minds of a disinterested public, that the President erred and that the McEnery government is the lawful government of that State. But still he decided. He had the right to decide and the power to decide as he did. It was his duty to decide, and he decided wrong. Like the judgment of a court in a case where it has proper jurisdiction, that decision must stand until it is reversed—reversed by him or Congress, or until he shall cease to act and dismiss the case. What

I ask is, that the President shall correct his own error and that he shall seek the first opportunity to do it. If he will not do it, then I say that it is the duty of Congress to do it, and Congress will not have discharged its duty until it shall so decide. If Congress will take the responsibility to decide that the Kellogg government is the true and lawful government, there is the end of controversy; the people of the State of Louisiana must submit, McEnery and his associates must submit, the whole country must submit, and they can only hold the Congress responsible for having made a false and improper decision. The only remedy in that case against Congress is, as I have said, at the ballot-box throughout the Union, for having made an improper decision and invaded the rights of the State. But Congress having complete jurisdiction and having decided this question even improperly, the whole country must submit or else we shall have a state of anarchy; there is no government; might is right and despotism triumphant. That is the whole of it, sir.

I advise no resistance to the President. Why? Because he had the power to decide. He has decided wrong. I am as clear about that as I am about the fact that I live; but still he had the power to decide. It was his duty to decide; but that decision did not destroy the McEnery government; that did not destroy the lawful government. The right is there. The right is in litigation. The suit is pending to try the right, and the moment that it is determined, or the contest is abandoned, the right springs up and becomes active, if the court will discharge its duty. The government of Louisiana is on trial. The President, in the first place, is its trier. I insist, and the people of Louisiana insist, that the President has decided wrong. Millions of American people insist that he has decided wrong.

But there is another court. There is another supreme tribunal to decide the case. That tribunal is the Congress. It is charged by the Constitution to decide it when it shall properly come before it, and when Congress has decided, whether they decided right or wrong, there is the end. In view of the troubles and general distress in Louisiana and throughout the country on that account, it is monstrous that Congress has not taken proper action. But although Congress has not acted, the President may yet act. I would to God he would act. In my judgment he could not do a nobler act, one that would increase the confidence of the American people in him more than to correct his own error. I know that pride of spirit, pride of party, party interests, and party considerations operate and go a long way to restrain such generous and noble acts; but I had hoped the President would rise above party. Presidents ought to rise above parties. They ought not to know anything about parties in the discharge of their high duties. They ought not to know anything but the Constitution of their country and its laws, and sacredly protect and obey them. I had hoped that, rising above parties, looking only to the best interests of the country, the President would have corrected his own error and would have spurned the bad, designing men who led him into error. If I had his ear I would tell him to correct his error. If I were a republican this day, supporting his Administration, I would go to him and I would implore him, anxiously implore him, and advise him by every consideration, to correct his false step. But if he will not do it, then the responsibility is with him. So far as there could be any expression of opinion, not only by the authorities there but as far as there has been an expression of opinion here in Congress, it is against his act.

Take the action of the House of Representatives practically. The Kellogg candidates for the lower branch of Congress were admitted there, one of them particularly, upon a prima facie case. He sat there until a few hours before the late Congress expired. He was then turned out of the House and the members elected upon the McEnery ticket were admitted, thereby giving a practical declaration, one that cannot be controverted, that the lower branch of Congress, overwhelmingly republican, ascertained that the McEnery ticket was elected. Wherever any action has been taken in the Senate the decision is the same way. For more than two years the present applicant has importuned the Senate to admit him as a Senator from Louisiana elected by the Kellogg legislature, and his credentials certified by Kellogg himself. The Senate has for that long time refused to do so. The Senate shrinks, as well it may, from a recognition of that usurpation. I shall mourn the day when it shall do so. Such a recognition will be a terrible and dangerous precedent. I admonish the Senate against it; it will come back again and again to plague us and the country.

Here let me call attention to what the Senate has done further on this subject. It is very interesting as showing the record of some Senators, and I trust they will stand by that record. I would regret exceedingly to see them go back upon it.

The Senator from Illinois a moment ago asked me why I did not vote for a certain bill providing for an election in the State of Louisiana. I gave him my reasons for it. The late Senator from Wisconsin felt very anxious on this subject. He said, for reasons which I do not think sufficient—I gave my reasons for so thinking on another occasion—that there was no State government in the State of Louisiana, that is, there were no legal officers there to fill the offices and administer the government; that the election in that State was void. He introduced a bill in the Forty-second Congress. That bill contained this recital:

That the election held in the State of Louisiana on the 4th day of November, 1872, for governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary of state, attorney-general, auditor of public accounts, and superintendent of education, and for senators and representatives for the General Assembly of said State, is hereby declared to be null and void; and it is further ordered and declared that the persons who were entitled to hold the said State offices on the said 4th day or November shall continue in office and be recognized as the legal officers of said State by the Government of the United States until their successors are chosen and qualified in accordance with the provisions of this act.

That bill containing the declaration that there was no lawful government in the State of Louisiana came to a vote, and I put it to the Senate to say whether a Senator ever could make a more solemn declaration as to his conviction than to cast a vote on that subject. The vote was taken after anxious deliberation, after long debate, and let us see how the vote resulted. Those who voted for the bill were—

Messrs. Anthony, Carpenter, Corbett, Cragin, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hamlin, Howe, Logan, Machen, Osborn, Ramsey, Sawyer, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, and Wilson.

Those Senators declared in the most solemn manner that it was possible for them to do that there was no State government in the State of Louisiana; that the result of the election in 1872 was that there was no election at all; that nobody was elected, whereby the State was absolutely dismantled, and that there ought to be another election. After that, in the Forty-third Congress, the late Senator from Wisconsin introduced another bill. In the preamble to that bill he uses these words:

Whereas there is no governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary of state, attorney-general, auditor of public accounts, or superintendent of education in the State of Louisiana, holding said offices, respectively, under an election by the legal voters of the State of Louisiana, in pursuance of the constitution and laws of said State; and whereas there is not in said State any Legislature elected by the legal voters of said State, according to the constitution and laws thereof.

That bill did not come to a final vote, but there were various votes taken during the session which indicated the approval of it by certain Senators. Those who so voted on such occasions were these:

Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Boutwell, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Kelly, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, and Thurman.

After all this, after this solemn declaration on the part of Senators, it seems to me that it is monstrous to ask any Senator here to vote for a resolution declaring, in the face of the solemn action had heretofore, that the Kellogg government is lawful. It seems to me that no one can do so without absolutely stultifying himself.

But, Mr. President, let that government be as it may, let the President's action remain as it is, we can take no action here now to reverse his action. This is but one branch of Congress. This branch of Congress has no right to determine that one State government is the lawful government or another is such by general resolution. We cannot decide this question except in so far as we do so by determining that one person or another has been properly and lawfully elected a Senator to represent that State here. The Senate has no right to pass a general resolution declaring that the Kellogg government is the lawful government or that the McEnery government is the lawful government. That must be the act of the Congress of the United States. The Constitution prescribes that as the tribunal to determine that question. It is true, by admitting Mr. Pinchback the Senate would decide incidentally, and it would be a strong circumstance to determine, that the Kellogg legislature was the lawful legislature; but it would determine the question only in a collateral way; but to pass such a resolution I maintain that it has no power.

Then, Mr. President, to conclude, in the first place, I think I have shown that the doctrine contended for by the Senator from Indiana that a person applying to be admitted as a Senator has the right to be admitted upon a prima facie case, as he styles it, is a false doctrine; that it is not sustained by a proper construction of the Constitution, by the practice of the Senate, by right, by justice, by any consideration whatever; that, on the contrary, the true theory and practice is, never to admit an applicant to be admitted when his right is questioned, until that right shall be determined on its merits. In the second place, I have shown that the fusion or McEnery ticket was lawfully elected at the election in Louisiana in 1872; that McEnery and his colleagues were lawfully inaugurated, and that they ought to be administering the government this day. In the third place, I have shown that Kellogg was not elected. I have shown that it has been ascertained in many lawful ways that he was not elected, that on the contrary he was beaten by a majority of ten thousand votes. I have shown that he did not come into office by law, and he is therefore not an officer de jure; that he did not come into office by color of law, and he is therefore not an officer de facto; that he came into office only by force and usurpation; that he is in every sense a usurper, and that being a mere usurper and an invader of the rights of the people of Louisiana, he ought to be displaced. He ought to be displaced now by the President, and if the President will not do it, Congress, in the discharge of the high duty that devolves on it, ought to displace him at the earliest possible moment by reversing the action of the President and allowing the lawful government to operate and administer the government of that State.

Then in the fourth place I have shown that the President has no original power to determine that one party or another constitute the lawful officers or Legislature of a State government or one class of officers or another; that he derives his power and has it by virtue of the act of Congress; that Congress is the political branch of the Government and has the right to determine who are the proper officers of the State government and what is the proper State government; and furthermore, that in the matter now before the Senate, the President being subordinate to Congress and acting in pursuance of the authority of Congress, and charged by Congress to decide right, having decided wrong, his action is to have no weight whatsoever in determining the question as to whether we ought to admit this applicant or not.

It is within the power and jurisdiction of the Senate in deciding the case before it to decide that the Kellogg legislature was not the lawful Legislature, and therefore the applicant, Pinchback, was not elected and is not entitled to be admitted. The Senate has the right to determine that his credentials are not sufficient evidence of his election. In that they may determine that Kellogg was not the governor; that the seal on the credentials purporting to be the seal of the State of Louisiana is not the seal; that the person who countersigns the credentials as secretary of state was not secretary. This is the office of the Senate. For one I am ready to cast my vote now, and have always been, that this applicant was not duly elected; and for the reasons which I have submitted, when the time shall come, I shall be prepared to vote to reverse the action of the President and restore the lawful government of the State of Louisiana. And I maintain, sir, furthermore, that while the Senate cannot do it, the Senators as American citizens, and especially the republicans of this body, are charged by their country to advise the President, as they have his ear, into that line of right which he ought to pursue.

I shall rejoice if the right shall prevail in this distressing and complicated case and if no permanent evil shall result from it to the country.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. McCREERY. Mr. President, I propose to speak a few minutes if the Senator will give me the floor for to-morrow morning.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. PATTERSON in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at two o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 11, 1875.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The VICE-PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter of the Second Auditor of the Treasury, transmitting copies of all accounts which have been received at that office from persons charged or intrusted with the disbursements or application of moneys, goods, or effects of any kind for the benefit of the Indians from July 1, 1872, to June 30, 1873; which was ordered to lie on the table.

COMMITTEE TO VISIT THE INDIAN COUNTRY.

Mr. CLAYTON. I should like to call up the point of order raised the other day upon a resolution offered by myself. I desire to call it up for the purpose of having the point of order settled. If the point of order is settled so that the resolution can be received, I shall not ask to have the resolution itself considered to-day; but merely desire to have the point of order settled.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits the question to the Senate. The Chair will take the opinion of the Senate.

Mr. CLAYTON. I should like to make a few remarks on this subject.

On the 19th day of March, 1873, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. ALCORN] offered a resolution which reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on the Levees of the Mississippi River be authorized to sit during the recess, and to investigate and report upon the condition of the levees of the Mississippi River; also, upon the propriety of the Government of the United States assuming charge and control of the same, with a view to their completion and maintenance; and that they have power to employ a clerk, and that the expenses attending this investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the select committee aforesaid.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FERRY] raised the same point of order upon the submission of this resolution which he raised the other day on the submission of mine.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to inquire what is the question before the Senate?

Mr. CLAYTON. The Chair will state it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is on the point of order. The Senator from Arkansas submitted a resolution and a question of order was raised upon it; and as the Senate by a yea and nay vote have decided both ways on that question, the Chair submits the question to the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. But what is the resolution, for it all depends on that?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be reported.

Mr. THURMAN. Is it the resolution for the appointment of a committee to go to the Indian country?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I understand it; it is not necessary to read it.

Mr. CLAYTON. The resolution to which I have referred was discussed at considerable length pro and con. On the 25th of March, 1873, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. ALCORN] submitted a substitute for his resolution which was merely for the purpose of allowing the committee to sit during the recess, striking out all the rest of the resolution. I will state here that prior to the introduction of this resolution of the Senator from Mississippi the following resolution had been introduced and acted upon:

That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be instructed to examine and report at the next session of Congress upon the best and most practicable mode of electing the President and Vice-President of the United States, and providing a tribunal to adjust and decide all contested questions connected therewith, with leave to sit during vacation.

This resolution, says the record, "was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to."

A resolution offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] to allow the Committee on the Judiciary to sit during the recess was also considered and agreed to.

A resolution offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] to allow the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to sit during the recess of the Senate was also considered and agreed to.

A resolution also offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] to allow the Committee on the Revision of the Laws to sit during the recess was also agreed to.

On the 26th of March the resolution of the Senator from Mississippi was brought up again and the point of order was submitted to the Senate. The Senate by a vote of 25 to 19 decided that the resolution could be considered.

I presume, if this was merely a proposition to raise a select committee to consider this question, independent of the power to sit during the recess, no one would question but that it would be in order, and I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut whether he would consider a mere proposition to raise a committee of this body as being out of order. Can I have the attention of the Senator from Connecticut a moment? I desire to ask him whether if this proposition was merely for the purpose of raising a committee of this body to consider any question independent of the power to sit during the recess, he would consider that out of order?

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I suppose that a committee could only be raised for the purpose of reporting to the Senate on some subject at some time; and to a mere proposition to raise a committee at a called session to report upon business of a legislative character, I should make the same question of order that I now make. If the Senator from Arkansas will permit me, I will submit a word or two, and perhaps relieve the difficulty of discussion on this subject at the present time.

As has been stated by the Chair, two years ago, at the commencement of the called session, some of these resolutions were introduced. I raised the question of order. The Vice-President ruled that they could not be entertained. Subsequently the Senator from New York (Mr. Fenton) introduced a petition looking to legislative business. Objection was taken to that. That question was submitted to the Senate; there was a yea and nay vote, and the Senate decided that the petition could not be received.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the Senator pardon me a moment while I call his attention to that particular phase of the question? That petition called for the concurrent action of both Houses. The petition to which he refers, if I recollect aright, looked to action from both Houses; it was a petition for Congress to do certain things, and it seems to me that would not be a parallel case to this.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I was merely stating the precedents. Subsequently a number of resolutions for raising committees or continuing them during the recess were introduced. Some were entertained by unanimous consent. One in particular I remember, introduced by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.] I at first raised the question of order, and then, at his request, withdrew it and permitted unanimous consent to be given. Upon the resolution continuing the committee regarding the levees of the Mississippi River another yea and nay vote was taken, which resulted in exactly the reverse of the yea and nay vote which had preceded it. Consequently, as the Chair has said, this question was decided two years ago both ways by the Senate. Now I desire upon this resolution to have it distinctly presented to the Senate, as it is now, whheter at a called session such a resolution will be entertained as in order. The Chair has submitted it to the Senate, and I will very cheerfully acquiesce in the decision of the Senate on a yea and nay vote.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is the attitude of the case exactly. As I understand, the question now before the Senate is merely as to whether this resolution is in order, without any reference whatever to the merits of the resolution or what it proposes.

Mr. MORTON. What is the resolution?

Mr. CLAYTON. The resolution itself is to create a special committee of this body, to be composed of four members of the Committee on Indian Affairs and three of the Committee on Territories, with certain powers to investigate questions arising in the Indian country, during the recess of Congress.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. And to report at the next session of Congress.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir. Of course, Mr. President, if this is out of order, that settles the whole question as to this committee and all other committees of a similar character. The Senator from Connecticut is right in his statement of what took place during the session to which he has alluded. The last expression of the Senate upon the subject, if I am not mistaken, was made upon the resolution of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. ALCORN,] and in that expression the Senate decided by a vote of 25 to 19 that a resolution of this character could be submitted.

I shall make no further remarks upon the subject, but allow the question to be determined.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have but a word to say about this matter. I am afraid the Senate will do to-day what it has very often done, confuse the question arising upon the point of order with that of the propriety of the appointment of the committee. That the Senate of the United States have the power to pass this resolution I do not think there can be any doubt. That the Senate of the United States, although sitting in a called executive session, may authorize a committee to make inquiries even for a legislative purpose I do not think there can be any doubt. The Senate of the United States is a permanent body. We have the same power now that we would have if the House of Representatives was present, except only that we cannot pass laws; but we may inform ourselves, may prepare ourselves, and seek information wherever we choose.

I shall vote against the resolution of the Senator from Arkansas because I do not think we ought to organize this committee. While I shall vote against it on that ground, at the same time I have no doubt that the Senate of the United States has the power and the right, if it chooses to exercise it, to pass a resolution of this kind. Therefore, while I am against the resolution of the Senator from Arkansas, I would not bind the Senate not to pass a resolution of this kind.

Mr. HAMLIN. I suppose the Senate in one sense has the power to do anything it pleases. I believe that is about the result when you come to the question of power. Under the Constitution, however, I think that the Senate has no earthly power or constitutional right to pass any such resolution which is legislative in its character or looking to any matter upon which legislation is subsequently to be had.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask my friend a question. This committee is proposed to go into the Indian country where reside tribes with whom we have existing and subsisting treaties. As a matter of course, the Senate may inquire in regard to every treaty whether a treaty should be modified or changed. Surely, we have the power to send a committee to the Indian country covered by a treaty to get any information we may choose to have which may bear upon that treaty. It may be put upon that express ground. Therefore we have the power and it is within our province.

Mr. HAMLIN. If you can show me that it is business of an executive character, then and only then will I agree with the Senator from Ohio. But that we have a right under the Constitution to raise committees to perambulate this Union for any purpose, although it has been done heretofore, I utterly and wholly deny. I deny that you have any right to authorize the withdrawal of papers from the files and to be delivered to the parties We are called here for executive purposes and for nothing else, and there is no other earthly business which we can rightfuly do. I know I am talking directly against what the Senate has done and directly against what it will do; but such is my view of its authority.

Mr. MORTON. I would ask the Senator from Maine this question, what is the difference in principle or in power between appointing a standing Committee on Indian Affairs, which we created yesterday, to consider all legislation in regard to Indian matters, and appointing a special committee of the kind designated by this resolution?

Mr. HAMLIN. The committee to which the Senator refers is a part of the organization of this body. I do not deny that we may organize, and do all things that are necessary to organize this body; but when you propose to raise a committee on Indian affairs or any other committee for purposes of legislation, you have no right to do it. There may be nominations referred to that committee; but there is no purpose for which you can raise committees at an executive session except to do executive business.

Mr. HOWE. What makes you think so?

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator from Wisconsin asks what makes me think so. I answer the Senate is a part of Congress when the House of Representatives is in session, and it is not at any other time a part of Congress. It is an executive body convened solely and exclusively for executive purposes. I go a step further. I hold that when the President stated in his proclamation that he convened us for the purpose of considering such subjects as he should communicate to us we were limited by that proclamation to the subjects for which we were convened; and when we overstep that limitation we may do anything else that is of an executive character or as we have done. I believe at every session we may do acts which look to legislation, which go to furnish the material upon which subsequent legislation is to be enacted.

I do not know that there is another Senator here who agrees with me; but such is my view. I remember very well when the Senate passed a resolution affirming precisely the doctrine that I lay down, and we lived up to it manfully I think for two or three days; but the desire of this Senator to do that thing and the other Senator to do another thing broke down the resolution that the Senate itself had adopted. I think you will find the resolution some four or five sessions ago that the Senate adopted in words that it had no power to do anything except that which was executive in its character. I shall vote therefore that it is not in order to entertain this resolution; and if it be ruled in order, as I presume it will be, then I will vote against the resolution as most unwise.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is the clause in the Constitution under which we are now convened. Defining the duties and powers of the President, it says:

> He may on extraordinary occasions convene both Houses, or either of them.

He may convene the House of Representatives, he may convene the Senate on extraordinary occasions; but there is nothing in the Constitution, there is nothing in parliamentary law that declares what we shall do when we are convened. When we are convened, we are convened as the Senate of the United States with full power to do anything that we may do by ourselves. We have no power to pass laws because we cannot pass laws except with the assent of the other House. We have no power to make treaties except with the assent of the President. But we may now do anything in the world that we as a Senate can do except to make laws.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if we can do this, will not his doctrine allow us to pass all the bills we may deem necessary here until the 1st day of December next and then send them to the House? If we may do anything we please, the Senator's position leads him to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. On the contrary, we cannot send a bill to the House because there is no House here.

Mr. HAMLIN. But we may pass bills, if the Senator's position is correct, and have them ready to submit to the House when they come.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am inclined to think we cannot. There is another provision of the Constitution that comes in there. We must sit here acting on legislative business with the assent of the other House, because there is a provision of the Constitution which declares that neither House can adjourn, without the consent of the other, for more than three days. That would exclude the action of the Senate in the mode suggested. But I say when the Senate of the United States is here convened, we may discuss any subject we choose; we may consider any question we please; we may seek any information that is desirable to us or that may be useful to us. There is nothing to prevent us except our sense of what is best and right under all the circumstances.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President——

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to ask a question of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand the Senator from Ohio, while he concedes that we cannot pass a bill, says that in this case we may organize a committee with a view of obtaining information and looking to legislation in the future. Now, if that be so, will he tell me what the difference in principle is between that case and this: a bill introduced and referred to one of the standing committees with a view of investigation and inquiry to report at the next session of Congress, not to report at this session, no action to be taken upon it except that a bill may be introduced and referred and the committee may examine and investigate with a view to report at the next session, and no action now taken beyond that. In principle what distinction is there between that case and the one proposed in the resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Indiana has the floor and will no doubt answer the question.

Mr. MORTON. A resolution lies on the table which I offered on the first day of this session and upon which I was told this same question of order would be raised. I was therefore at some trouble to examine into what had been the action of the Senate in executive sessions, and although it has not been uniform, yet the general current of that action has been to recognize the power of the Senate to do anything at a called executive session that did not require the co-operation of the House of Representatives. The passage of a bill does require the co-operation of the House of Representatives, and therefore you cannot pass a bill at this session and have it lie over till next winter and then go before the House of Representatives. That bill cannot get before the House then for other reasons than the one named by the Senator from Maine; but whatever the Senate can do when the House is in session that does not require the co-operation of the House, that the Senate can do when the House is not in session; and I think that is the general current of the precedents of the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let me ask the Senator a question. This is a perpetual body. We may pass bills and keep them here. Why should we not do that and send them to the House of Representatives at its next session? Will the Senator answer me that?

Mr. MORTON. I think I could answer that. I think there is a rule under which such a bill could not be sent there. We have a rule, I believe, under which business passed at one session may go over to the next session of the same Congress, but that does not apply to an executive session. I am speaking now, however, upon what has been the general current of the action of this body with some exceptions, that the Senate can do when the House of Representatives is not in session anything that it can do by itself when the House is in session, and I think the reason is precisely the same.

But I want to suggest another point to the Senator from Maine, who understands these questions much better than I do; and that is, that if the objection is well taken, it is not a question of order and it cannot be made a question of order. It is a question of power. It might just as well be said, if a bill to charter a railroad to run through the States of this Union should be introduced at the regular session of the Senate, that it would be competent to raise a point of order and say that Congress has no power to pass such a bill. That is the question to be determined not on a point of order, but by Congress itself. Therefore the question whether the Senate has the power now to pass this resolution is not a question of order to be determined primarily by the Chair; it is a question of power to be determined by the Senate, just as in the case supposed the question of the power to incorporate a railroad to run through the States would be determined not by the Speaker of the House or the President of the Senate, but by Congress itself. Therefore it seems to me that this question cannot be raised in the first place as a point of order, even if it is well taken; and in the second place I think the general current of action on the part of the Senate is the other way.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, it seems to me the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] stated the true rule. Though we are convened by an executive order and for executive business, we are convened; this is the Senate, and the Senate can do to-day whatever the Senate is capable of doing alone at any time. It seems to me the reason is very manifest why you cannot pass a bill to be considered by the House of Representatives at the next session. That reason is this: it is legislative power which passes a bill, and the whole legislative power is vested by the Constitution in Congress, and Congress consists of two Houses, the Senate and House of Representatives; and so you are careful to recite in every bill which goes from either House that it is an enactment "by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled." If you were to prefix such a recitation as that to a bill considered by the Senate to-day and sent by and by to the House of Representatives, you would recite a falsehood. Congress is not assembled, and it would not be passed by the two Houses assembled in Congress.

This is the mere constitution of a committee, differing from that great number of committees you constituted yesterday only in the fact that this is a special committee and those are general standing committees. But if you can organize in an executive called session of the Senate committees for general purposes, I cannot understand what reason should be urged why you cannot organize a committee for a special, specific purpose. I shall vote that this resolution is entirely in order, and I wish the Senate would keep that question distinct in its mind from the other question as to whether the resolution is expedient or not. I have as yet heard no reason offered why the resolution should be adopted; but I am just as unable to discover any reason why we should deny to the Senate the power of adopting it if it be a proper one.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, it seems to me that the principles upon which this question turns are very simple. There is no Congress now in session. There is no Legislature of the Union now in session. The Senate when convened in executive session or special session, when the House of Representatives is not in session at all, is not a legislature. It is simply a body to whom the Constitution confides certain duties in connection with the Executive: the power to ratify treaties; the power to confirm nominations; and the power of course to decide upon the qualifications, returns, and elections of its own members. That is necessarily inherent in the Senate, and it has a right to decide any such question at any time; but it has not one particle of legislative power, for it is not a legislature. There is no Legislature of this Government except when both Houses are convened.

Then the question is, does this resolution belong to the category of legislative business? If it belongs to anything that pertains to the treaty-making power, or to the confirmation or rejection of nominations, then all is well; but does it belong to either of these categories or is it of a legislative character? Now let the resolution speak for itself:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of four members of the Committee on Indian Affairs and three members of the Committee on Territories, making seven in all, be appointed to visit the Indian Territory during the recess of the Senate, with authority to inquire into the condition of affairs in that country, the manner in which justice is administered, and the wants and capacities of the lawful inhabitants thereof with respect to self-government; and to report at the next session of the Senate the result of their inquiry and what legislation, if any, is needed.

The resolution in its very terms looks to legislation; there is not one word in it that has any connection with the treaty-making power, not one word in it that has reference to any treaty made or to be made; it is wholly and entirely a resolution looking to legislation, belonging to legislation, and belonging to nothing else.

Mr. President, if you can introduce and pass a resolution of this kind, that is purely legislative in its character, where are you to stop? Why might you not introduce a bill, and, if you cannot pass it, why not read it the first and the second time, refer it to a committee, have a report upon it, read it the third time, and have it up to the point of its final passage when Congress shall convene on the first Monday of December next? If you can do the one thing, where are you to stop? That will not do, Mr. President. We must confine ourselves to that which the Senate sitting alone, when there is no session of Congress, has the power to do, and it has no power whatever to do one single legislative act; no more power than any seventy-four gentlemen of the United States who might get together have power to do legislative acts.

Inasmuch then as this resolution looks directly to legislation and to nothing else, and is a thing, therefore, that it is incompetent for the Senate to act upon, as it seems to me, I think it perfectly proper to make the point of order that it cannot be received. I think the Senator from Connecticut might have objected to the reception of the resolution, and I do not know but that he did at the very time it was offered, as being a proposition upon which the Senate at this session has no right to act. That raised the question of order, and that raised a question of order for the decision of the Senate, because, however the Chair may decide it, there may be an appeal, and the Senate ultimately makes the decision.

I think, therefore, Mr. President, that notwithstanding there are precedents both ways on this question, the true doctrine is that this resolution is not in order, and the objection made by the Senator from Connecticut ought to be sustained.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I do not agree with the Senator from Ohio that this resolution looks to legislation at all. The object is to obtain information for legislation after a while or at the next session of Congress. There is no purpose to bring about any legislation at this session of the Senate. The object of the committee is to obtain information in regard to a very important question, so that the facts elicited, the information obtained by the committee, may be laid before Congress when Congress meets next winter. It does not look to legislation at this time at all. It is true the word "legislation" is in the resolution, but the very language employed excludes the idea of legislation at this called session. It is merely to obtain information, as was done two years ago when a committee was appointed upon transportation. There was no legislation required on that subject at that called session of the Senate. The object was to obtain information to be laid before the following Congress. That committee was appointed at an executive session, and my friend from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] was made the chairman of it. It was appointed at a session precisely like this; but it was not for the purpose of legislation at that session of the Senate, nor does this resolution look to legislation at this time at all. It precludes the idea by its very words. It does say that the committee is to ascertain what legislation may be necessary hereafter; not that that legislation may be performed or done at this session; it is to be done hereafter. The whole object is to obtain information.

Whether it be expedient to pass the resolution or not is another question; but that it is in order it seems to me there can be no doubt. I think it is entirely different from the resolution offered by my friend from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] I think that does look to legislation.

Mr. MORTON. May I ask the Senator whether a question of power under the Constitution is a question of order?

Mr. BOGY. I am not prepared to answer that question. I am not sufficiently versed in parliamentary law to speak as to that. I cannot pretend to be able to answer the question. But looking at this matter as one of mere power, if it be competent to appoint a committee at all, it is competent for us to raise the one now proposed. Why were committees appointed at this session at all? If the Senate has not this power, why has it raised any committees at this session? They are perfectly nugatory for executive purposes, excepting perhaps one committee, the Committee on Foreign Relations, because that committee might be necessary to act on treaties; but in regard to the other committees, they amount to nothing except a few to consider nominations.

As I said, this resolution does not look to legislation. The very idea of legislation is excluded by its words. The object is to appoint a committee to ascertain and obtain certain facts; and while I am up I will say that I do think the resolution ought to pass. The only fear I have is that I might be placed on the committee, and I do not desire to be on the committee. I have been enough in the Indian country in my life, and I do not wish to return there. But when we come to consider the condition of our Indian relations at this day, especially the condition of the country bordering on Arkansas and Missouri, I do think it is of very great importance that a committee be appointed to go down there and ascertain the sentiments and views of those people. It is a question which will come before the next Congress, and it is one of great importance, and we cannot get too much information on the subject. I do think a committee could be employed most usefully in obtaining all the facts belonging to the question.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, what we are told we cannot do we have been repeatedly in the habit of doing. We have done this thing in the last two days. We have raised committees here, which no one has questioned; and this whole question must be after all settled upon the right or power of the Senate to raise committees. We have raised a Committee on Levees of the Mississippi River. What was that committee for? Was it to send Executive communications to? No, it cannot be for that. Was it to consider the confirmation of appointments. It cannot be for that. If it was for anything it was for the purpose of getting information for the benefit of the Senate. We have raised a Committee on Transportation. What was that for? If it was for anything it was for the purpose of getting information for the benefit of the Senate. We have raised a Committee on Railroads. That must have been for the same purpose. We have raised a Committee on Education and Labor. That it seems to me must have been for the same purpose. And so I might go on to enumerate various committees appointed at this session.

This is not a question as to whether the committee when raised shall have power to go here or there; it is a question, can you raise a committee which may investigate questions that may hereafter lead to legislation. This proposition is one for the purpose, if for any purpose, of getting valuable information for the Senate. When? Not now, but hereafter. It may lead to legislation or it may lead to nothing. It seems to me that if you sustain this point of order and decide that this resolution cannot be considered at this time, then you might with equal propriety have raised the same point in regard to nearly all the committees you appointed yesterday.

I did think at one time that I would propose to strike out the few words of this resolution which make it the duty of the committee to report to Congress certain things, and among others "what legislation, if any, is needed;" but I do not think I shall do that. I think I shall allow the resolution to stand. I want to say here again what I said before, that I hope Senators will consider this question as a question of order at this time. If the resolution shall be decided to be in order, then it will be time enough for Senators to say whether the resolution is wise or unwise.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall this resolution be received?

Mr. CLAYTON. I think we had better settle the question by yeas and nays. There may be other resolutions of the same kind.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SARGENT. Upon the point of order I intend to vote that it is within the power of the Senate to receive this resolution. I shall do so because I think the Senate has this power and has exercised it upon a great many occasions, and I should be very sorry to have a precedent deliberately set which would prevent us hereafter from acting upon matters of this nature.

I say that in explanation of my vote upon that proposition; but when the question shall come upon the passage of the resolution, I propose to vote against it. For a number of years past, since the time when perhaps somewhat improvidently large grants of land were made to railroads across this Indian Territory, we have had this question presented to us in divers forms, a continual pressure existing in the halls of Congress and by conventions elsewhere to give effect to those grants and enable the companies to obtain the odd sections in broad belts running in various ways across that Territory. I do not know but that ultimately the original grant of Congress, whether providently or improvidently made, will have full effect given to it; but before that time comes, in my judgment, it is necessary that the Indian question in that Territory shall be in a degree of solution which it has not at the present time.

By many treaties of the United States, we have guaranteed to the Indians the possession and the fee of lands within the Indian Territory. Those treaties and arrangements were made years ago, before the West was settled up, before there was a necessity for commercial enterprise to utilize that land; and consequently those treaties are somewhat inconvenient for railroad companies and others who desire to traverse that territory. I think there is much in the obligation of the Government to protect the Indians in the rights which we have given them, and therefore believe this movement premature. I am opposed to the resolution.

Furthermore, and perhaps as an entering-wedge for the same matter, this resolution embraces the idea of a change in the form of government of that Territory. We very well know that to this the Indians are opposed. With the exception of some few, they have protested against it in every form in which their protests could reach Congress. They have claimed that they are advancing in civilization under their present régime; that by excluding white men from the Territory they are not only learning self-government, but they are protecting themselves from many corrupting influences and many frauds which otherwise they would be liable to. I think there is very much in the protest that is made by these Indian tribes, and I look with some jealousy to any movement in the direction of throwing that Territory open to traversing railroads, of introducing white men among them, or overthrowing the government which at present at any rate is doing some good among them. The time may come when with the further advance of the Indians to a higher state of civilization and by a segregation of their lands so that they will hold them in severalty we may be able, safely to them, to allow the influx of a white population. Certainly that time is not now; but that time will be hastened whenever the railroads can be run through the Territory, for otherwise the railroads will simply run through a tunnel without business or population along their line and without means of support.

For these reasons I shall vote against the resolution; but on the point of order, believing the power is in the Senate, I shall vote that the resolution be received.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from California in his general statement, but not in his conclusion. I am advised that the Indians are opposed to the policy to which he refers. I believe that a committee of Senators going down there will ascertain that fact and report the truth to this body. We have had many conflicting statements. I shall vote for the organization of the committee for the very purpose of getting at the exact truth in regard to the sentiments of the Indians and what will probably be for their best interests.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, I did not think that I should be drawn into any discussion of the merits of this resolution. I did not desire to discuss them at this time. When I introduced the resolution I stated distinctly that it was not my desire in doing so to serve on the committee. I said this morning that it was my intention when this point of order should be decided, to allow the resolution to lie on the table to be called up at some future time. I want it distinctly understood that so far as the introduction of this resolution is concerned, it has no reference whatever to the opening up of that country to white settlemnet. So far as I am concerned, I am satisfied with the lights before us that that thing ought not now to be done.

This question was before the Committee on Territories upon which I had the honor of serving, and it is well known what my views were then. I had the honor of reporting back here from that committee that it was inexpedient to take any action upon the question of opening up that country; but it is a fact to which we cannot shut our eyes that there is a country which is so far as we are concerned almost a terra incognita. They have no newspapers there. It is an encroachment for a white man to go into the country. You get your information from whom? From such persons as assemble here around Congress for the purpose of lobbying through schemes, and perhaps from such persons as are interested in carrying out contracts with the Indians. I think it is time that we should look into these dark places, that we should have some information as to what is going on in these dark corners of this country. For myself I cannot see how any harm can come from a careful investigation by such a committee as the Presiding Officer of this body would select. I believe that if such an investigation could be had, you would find ample field for correction and reform as to affairs in that region. We have means of knowing what is going on in the States. Our newspapers inform us, the telegraphic wires inform us, and we have various other means of information. But here is a vast country nearly six hundred miles in extent with a large population of illiterate people in it, wards of the nation as it were, about which scarcely any man knows anything. It is our duty to know concerning this people and this country, and we have no other and no better way of knowing than by sending an intelligent committee of this body to investigate.

Sir, I shall say no more upon that subject now. I should not have said this much had not it been for the remarks of the Senator from California. I say now, however, once for all, that so far as I am personally concerned, I am not prepared by any means to say that any different form of government should be established in this Indian country than what we have now. But we have heard in both branches of Congress that the marshal's office, the judicial system there, was abused. We have heard of various abuses. We have heard of men hanging around Congress telling us that the Indians wanted this and that the Indians wanted that; that they ought to have this and that they ought to have that. I say we cannot gauge our action by any such uncertain information; but if we would govern these Indians wisely and well, we should first know what they want, we should first know their exact condition, and we cannot know that unless we put the eye of the Senate upon that country and upon that condition. It has often been said that committees of this body were the eyes and ears of the Senate. So they are. They are about the only eyes and ears that we have, especially as it relates to that distant country. I hope, however, that this question at this time will not be considered, but that we shall simply decide as to whether it is within the power of the Senate at this called session to raise a committee which may, in any way, lead hereafter to legislation.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I do not doubt the power of the Senate to raise this committee. I think, however, it would be contrary to the usage of the Senate to do it at a session like this. I think that it would be unwise to change that established usage. I agree with the Senator from Maine in what he so clearly said as to what has been the past usage of the Senate, and I agree with him that the rule ought to be stable, and that we should adhere to it when it is settled.

I remembered that in 1873 at an executive session a petition was offered; a question of order was raised on it; and I turned just now to the RECORD to see what was then said on the subject. In the proceedings of the Senate on the 10th of March, 1873, I find the following:

Mr. FENTON. I present the petition of S. J. Warren and others, praying for the passage of an act for the relief of William Rood, late private Thirty-sixth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers; and also the petition of James W. Ogle and others, praying for the passage of an act for the relief of Charles W. Berry, late a private of the Thirty-sixth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers. I ask that these petitions lie on the table for the present, to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, when appointed.

I desire also to present the petition of Antoine Sontag——

Mr. HAMLIN. I object to the presentation of any petitions of a legislative character at this session. We have no legislative functions whatever. That matter has been discussed and deliberately determined by the Senate, and we may just as well begin precisely as we ought to go on. I object to any legislative business, and this is legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine objects to the reception of any petitions asking for legislation.

Mr. FENTON. I withdraw the petitions.

That action was acquiesced in. A few days after another petition was offered. It was again objected to upon a question of order, and it was ruled to be out of order. Now, without entering at all into the merits of the resolution offered by the Senator from Arkansas, I shall vote against any legislative business at this session. I shall do so because I wish to see uniformity and stability in the action of all rules pertaining to the Senate. I have nothing to say about the resolution. I think the Senate acts in three separate capacities, in its legislative capacity in conjunction with the House of Representatives; in its executive capacity in passing upon treaties and nominations; and in its judicial capacity sitting as a court of impeachment. These functions are all separate and distinct. We are in no sense a legislative body now in contemplation of the Constitution of the United States. That contemplates both the Senate and House of Representatives acting together for the maturing of all legislation. We are called together in a special capacity; that is, to discharge the executive duties which the Constitution of the United States imposes upon the Senate acting with the President in making appointments and in the ratification of treaties.

These are my views. Entertaining, therefore, the belief that our rules should be stable and that the usage of the Senate should not be violated, but that we should have one uniform settled practice, I shall vote that this resolution is out of order. In doing so I do not wish to commit myself upon the question of whether it is pertinent or proper to send a committee to investigate the condition of the Indians.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the Chair would state precisely what is the question now pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The Senator from Arkansas submitted a resolution to the Senate; the question of reception was raised; and the Vice-President has submitted the question of reception to the Senate, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The question is, Shall the resolution be received at this time?

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Chair whether an objection to the reception of a resolution might not be made without raising any question of order, as where it was a matter that the Senate did not wish to consider, even supposing that it had the power? Might not that question be raised?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It could be.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I can feel free to vote against the reception of this resolution. I am not clear by any means that the Senate has not the power in its present session to take any step which it thinks fit to do in respect of acquiring information, either by instructing a committee here to inquire into any subject which may be a proper matter for legislative consideration or otherwise. I am inclined to think we can do it. Of course, legislation does not grow out of it at this session; but I think it would be a little strange to hold that this body being convened as a constitutional body may not exercise its own judgment in respect of what matters it will consider at this present time. When it comes to passing a bill, that is another thing. It may not have the power to do that; but certainly it seems to me that it ought to have the power under the Constitution to deliberate upon any proper topic; and therefore I should have great hesitation in voting that the offering of this resolution is out of order; but I think it much better, except in some strong public emergency, that we should not enter into questions of this kind when we are called together for the purposes that we now are. So that, not being supposed to vote against this resolution on the point of order as the question is now put, I shall vote against its reception.

Mr. CLAYTON. This seems to be a mere proposition to allow a resolution to be submitted, lie on the table, and be printed. It seems to me—and I desire to have the attention of the Senator from Vermont—that if you take from this case the mere question of order and bring it down to the point whether a resolution shall be allowed to be offered, laid on the table, and printed, it would not be a very courteous thing to a Senator to debar him of that privilege. It seems to me that the question of consideration is one that can come up when we propose to take this resolution from the table. If it is not the desire of the Senate to consider the question, all it has to do then is to say so, and that will be the end of it; or if it is not the desire of the Senate to consider it, it can postpone it indefinitely.

I may be mistaken; I may not understand the rules as well as others do; but it seems to me that if this matter comes down to a mere question as to whether a Senator in this body shall be allowed the privilege of introducing a resolution and letting it lie on the table and be printed, or whether it shall be kicked out without that privilege being accorded, then it would not be a courteous thing for Senators to do the latter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I certainly should be among the last persons in this body, I hope, to be guilty of a want of courtesy to the Senator from Arkansas or to any other Senator; but I think that those who have studied the history of this and other legislative bodies will agree that it used to be the constant practice (and a very good one it was, too, in my opinion) to raise the question whether the Senate desired to enter upon the consideration of a particular topic when a resolution was offered or when leave was asked to bring in a bill. In such a case the Senate decides in advance whether it wishes to go into the consideration of that subject or not without any discourtesy to the Senator who may bring it forward. Certainly the Senator cannot have forgotten that in times gone by, and not very long gone by either, it used to be the constant practice on the most important measures that debate would go on for days on the question whether a Senator should have leave to bring in a bill at all; it was not a question of courtesy; and then the Senate would vote not to let a Senator bring it in or to let him bring it in, just as a majority might think it desirable to go on with the inquiry or not. There is no question of courtesy about that; it is a question of the constitutional right of a Senator to ask leave and the equal constitutional right of other Senators to say "we do not think the leave ought to be granted." There is nothing personal about it.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the Senator allow me one moment? I can see a distinction between a resolution of this kind and a bill. I know that it is a rule of this body, one that is not generally enforced, to require unanimous consent to bring in a bill; but there is no such rule as applied to resolutions. If I am mistaken I should be glad to have the Senator correct me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no rule that requires unanimous consent. The rule is that a man must give one day's notice of intention to bring in a bill; and so in effect in respect to resolutions. I have a resolution now, for instance, that I wish to offer. I cannot offer it to-day unless all the Senate are willing that it shall be received. The theory is that every Senator is entitled to have notice in advance of what it is proposed to do, so that he may vote intelligently upon the question whether it is desirable to do anything, even to inquire——

Mr. CLAYTON. Does that apply to a resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It applies to everything. It applies to resolutions under a little different form, but the substance is there.

Mr. SHERMAN. This resolution was offered some days ago.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Arkansas is all right on that point of order; he has given notice enough; there is no doubt about that; but the point I am upon is that I think no Senator has a just right to say that it is any discourtesy to him if the Senate does not choose to receive for consideration a resolution or a bill at any particular time, because the resolution or the bill offered by a Senator is not a personal resolution or a personal bill; it is not a matter which affects the particular Senator; it is a matter which he is interested in for the public good like all the rest of us, so that we stand upon a footing of perfect equality. There is no more discourtesy, therefore, in voting against receiving this resolution than there would be in voting to receive it, or in voting to lay it upon the table, or in voting to pass it, no matter which way.

Mr. HAMLIN. Or raising a question of order upon an amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Or whatever it might be. I am sure the Senator from Arkansas ought to feel that no Senator here would wish to do him a discourtesy; but as a public question, as it is plain to me, and under the rules properly considered, it is right for the Senate to determine whether they desire to go into this inquiry at this time, and it may just as well be determined on offering the resolution as any other way.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think it would be very unfair.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course other Senators think the inquiry should be had. I am doubtful about that. But I do think it is not advisable to take up this resolution or any other resolution of this character except in some case of extreme public importance; so that I hope the Senator will not feel that voting against receiving this resolution is any discourtesy to him.

Mr. CLAYTON. I shall consider it a very unfair proceeding. I offered this resolution several days ago. The Senator from Connecticut raised a point of order, which is to-day before the Senate. I was cut off by that point of order and it is that point of order which is before the Senate now. The Senator from Connecticut raised the point of order that this thing could not be done in order. Now I desire that point of order to be decided one way or the other, and let the question of the consideration of this resolution be another question, to be determined hereafter. I have simply asked to have the resolution printed and let it lie on the table. If it is not in order, of course that is the end of it, and I bow my head as every other Senator must bow his head to the rulings of this Senate; but if it is in order that this resolution can be laid on the table and printed, then I want to have that done, and if I should hereafter desire to call it up it would be an easy matter for the Senate then to say whether it should be called up or not, and if it is not called up that will be the end of it.

Mr. MORTON. The question before the Senate is a question of order, and the vote given by the Senator from Vermont will be upon that question, it will be so recorded, and although his motive may be a question of expediency, yet he can only vote now as a question of order.

Mr. HOWE. I want to say one word more. I understood it to be a question of order that was pending. I understood several Senators on both sides to insist that this resolution is out of order.

Mr. MORTON. The question is to be decided by the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. That question is to be voted upon by the Senate. Old parliamentarians say it is out of order, and when we ask where the authority is which shows it to be out of order we are cited to two different classes of authorities. One reads the Constitution and the other the Globe. I did not suppose the Constitution of the United States regulated exactly the proceedings of the Senate, and I knew the Globe did not. If the Constitution says the Senate cannot entertain and adopt this resolution, then you can only do it by unanimous consent, says the Senator from Connecticut; you can do it, and have done it, by unanimous consent. O, no; not if the Constitution says you shall not do it. It takes a little more than unanimous consent. Whoever consents to it tramples on the Constitution. If it is out of order, I take it, it is because some rule of the Senate or some recognized rule of parliamentary law says so. Where is it? There is none. But the Senator from Connecticut, with whom I heartily sympathize, says that he does not care so much how this question is settled, but he wants it to be settled and to stay settled. I take it there is only one way to effect that, and that is to settle it with egg-shells. He understands it to have been settled and he cites us to the case where in an executive session in 1873 there was a decision of the Senate of the United States upon a question quite similar to this; the yeas and nays were called, and the Senate voted by 31 nays to 20 yeas that it was not in order to offer a petition in an executive session and have it referred to a standing committee of the Senate. Bowing to the authority of that decision of the Senate, I withdrew with alacrity, if not with cheerfulness, the petitions which I had had the honor to offer; and thereupon, in the very next moment of the life of that Senate, I proceeded, with unanimous consent, I suppose, to trample upon this rule by moving the Senate—

That the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate be continued and authorized to sit during the recess of the Senate.

And this body of parliamentary lawyers, which would not allow me to offer a petition, allowed me to make that motion, and the Senate entertained it and agreed to it. But later still a more flagrant violation of this rule of order was attempted and it was debated again, and the Senate divided again upon it. That was when in the same session, on the 26th day of the same month, the first vote having been taken on the 17th, the Senator from Mississippi offered a resolution not in the exact words but of the exact purport, so far as this rule is concerned, of the resolution moved by the Senator from Arkansas—a resolution in these words:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on the Levees of the Mississippi River be authorized to sit during the recess, and to investigate and report upon the condition of the levees of the Mississippi River; also, upon the propriety of the Government of the United States assuming charge and control of the same, with a view to their completion and maintenance; and that they have power to employ a clerk, and that the expenses attending this investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the select committee aforesaid.

Contemplating legislation as broad, if not as important, as that aimed at by the resolution of the Senator from Arkansas. The point of order was raised against that resolution. That was debated. The Senate divided on that, and then the Senate decided by a vote of 25 yeas to 19 nays that this resolution was in order. Now I appeal to the honorable Senator from Kentucky, if he means to stand by the decision, if the rule of stare decisis is what controls him, here is the latest decision, so far as the quotations go down to this hour, and I summon him upon his allegiance to the authority of the decisions of the Senate to stand where the Senate last stood, and let us consider it settled by the authority of this last vote.

Mr. CLAYTON. I would like to remind the Senator from Wisconsin of one other fact connected with the petition to which he referred. That petition was addressed to the Senate and House of Representatives and asked for legislation. It asked for the action of both Houses and was addressed to both Houses. It can readily be seen that is not a parallel case to this by any means.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am opposed to this resolution because I think when the subject it concerns is entered upon, it ought to be more in detail by a concurrent resolution of the two Houses, directing the committee specifically at what points to direct their investigation. As to the point of order I have but a word to say. It does not seem to me that it is exactly a point of order; it is a point of power; and I think the Senate ought to hesitate long before they deliberately come to any determination that restricts their powers. My opinion is very clear that the Senate has a right to obtain information in any way, to pass resolutions, to appoint committees to obtain information. I am very clear that the Senate has a right to give information. It may be very important to certain branches of the Government that an expression of the opinion of this body should in certain emergencies be made, and therefore I am not in favor of taking any action which will restrict the power of this body, while I shall vote against the resolution on its merits.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am fearful that we shall fall into error with reference to the power of the Senate. With the Senator from New Jersey I should be sorry to see this body attempt to curtail its power, but at the same time it is well to ascertain exactly what our power is. We are now convened in extraordinary session, and certain it is that in our capacity as a Senate, convened under the proclamation of the President of the United States, we do not possess the powers which we ordinarily possess when we meet as a legislative body. Our power of legislation is entirely gone. We can only perform the functions pertaining to our character as an executive council. We may deal with questions affecting the constitution of this body, or we may deal with questions which properly can be determined by the Senate in its character as an executive council, but we may not deal, directly or indirectly, in my judgment, with questions which do not pertain either to the constitution of this body itself or to the questions with which it has to deal in its character as an executive council.

Now the resolution of the Senator from Arkansas looks to legislation. With the question of legislation we cannot deal in our present capacity, and the question arises can we legitimately and properly deal with any question incidentally connected with legislation? It seems to me therefore that the point of order is well taken by the Senator from Connecticut. I think it would be wise policy in the Senate at the present session to limit its action entirely to matters pertaining to our duties as members of a Senate convened in executive session, and not to go beyond them and attempt to institute any inquiry in reference to legislation in the future. It would be very unwise policy, and therefore I shall vote to sustain the point of order, and I shall vote against the resolution hereafter if it comes up on its merits. At present I shall vote to sustain the point of order raised by the Senator from Connecticut.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. With the permission of the Senate the Chair will refer to the record and state the precise question before the Senate.

Mr. CLAYTON submitted the following resolution for consideration—

The resolution now pending; the Chair will not read it—

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut, objected to the reception of the resolution on the ground that at a session of the Senate specially called by the President, business of a legislative character, or looking to legislation, cannot be entertained.

The VICE-PRESIDENT submitted the question on the reception of the resolution to the Senate; and

After debate

Ordered, That the further consideration of the question be postponed to to-morrow.

The question therefore before the Senate is the reception of the resolution at this session.

Mr. CLAYTON. Is that a question which can be raised at this stage of the proceeding?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the question before the Senate.

Mr. CLAYTON. Can any one in offering a resolution or bill be cut off by any other question than a question of order? How comes it that the reception of this resolution is stopped unless it be upon a question of order? I was taken from my feet by the Senator from Connecticut on the question of order. If we are not upon the question of order, then was I properly taken from my feet and was this question of the reception of the resolution properly raised?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair can only decide upon the question before the Senate. The Chair understands the question before the Senate is on the reception of the resolution proposed by the Senator from Arkansas. The question is therefore, Will the Senate receive the resolution at this session, on which the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to say a word, not by way of arguing this question but by way of stating the case as I understand the case upon which I am to be called to vote. A Senator offers a resolution. Another Senator raises upon it a question of order. The point presented by the question of order is, that being a resolution looking to the legislative province of one House of Congress, it is not in order at a session like this of the Senate, unaccompanied by the presence of the House of Representatives. I believe the point of order standing alone is well taken; and yet I believe, voting upon the question really presented to the Senate, I shall be constrained to vote in favor of receiving the resolution, and my reason for that I will endeavor briefly to make clear.

If this resolution points to legislative action and to nothing else, the point of order applies to it. If, however, the resolution has anything upon which to stand regardless of the ultimate purpose of employing the information to be gained, or anything else to flow from it, for purposes of legislation, then I conceive in that aspect the resolution is not open to the point aimed at.

Perhaps the distinction is as clear as I can make it by one of the precedents to which my honorable friend from Wisconsin referred. He said, if I understood him, that the Senate having ruled that legislative business was not in order, the Senate unanimously allowed him to trample upon that rule—if that was his expression—by offering a resolution continuing in recess the Committee on Contingent Expenses. It seems to me that he did not trample upon the rule, or depart from it, at all. Why? Because the Committee on Contingent Expenses might be continued, as in truth it was continued, for purposes having necessarily nothing to do with legislation.

Here is a resolution the purpose of which is to acquire information. Whether it be expedient to adopt it or not, I say nothing; but upon the question whether it be admissible at this session, I say this: Suppose the committee were to go, as the resolution suggests, and suppose they were to find that in the administration in the region of country pointed out which should show malversation in office in those performing duties there, what discretion of the Senate would be addressed by that information? The legislative discretion of the Senate? Not at all, but the Senate as it sits as an executive council, acting in conjunction with the President upon the question, among others, whether a given officer should be or should not be continued in his place, whether if a nomination be made to remove him that nomination should be confirmed, the effect of it being to vacate as to him the office he holds. So I can suppose, without being imaginative, many another instance to which the information acquired under a resolution like this might be put.

Accordingly, when the Senator from Connecticut says we must refuse this resolution because we are not a legislative body, I concede his premises, but I deny his conclusion. I say that it is not necessarily a resolution appealing to the legislative power or function of the Senate, and therefore when the question is put, which the Chair is about to submit, being purely a question of order and having as I think nothing to do with the expediency or wisdom of passing the resolution, I shall be compelled to vote that we can, without violating the rules of the Senate, without transcending the attributes of a session of the Senate convened as this is, proceed to consider, if you please, that resolution and to dispose of it upon its merits, whether the disposition be in the affirmative or in the negative.

Mr. CLAYTON. As the resolution has not yet been received by the Senate, I will modify it in the manner I have indicated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be reported as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of four members of the Committee on Indian Affairs and three members of the Committee on Territories, making seven in all, be appointed to visit the Indian Territory during the recess of the Senate with authority to inquire into the condition of affairs in that country, the manner in which justice is administered, and the wants and capacities of the lawful inhabitants thereof with respect to self-government, and to report at the next session of the Senate the result of their inquiry.

Mr. CLAYTON. Now, Mr. President, I think perhaps the Senator from Connecticut will withdraw the point of order. If he has listened to the reading of the resolution he will observe that I have struck out everything which relates to legislation in any way whatever.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Striking out the word "legislation" makes no difference in the character of the resolution.

Mr. CLAYTON. It leaves the resolution in this attitude, then: This inquiry may be directed to the proposition of treaties with the Indians, which is certainly a question that rests with this body; it may be directed to the manner in which the Federal officers there are performing their duties, and that is a question which relates to this body to a certain extent and does not call for legislation.

You will remember, Mr. President, that one of the treaties with the Indians inhabiting that country permits a certain government to be established over them—an Indian government. The provisions of the treaty itself permit that kind of a government; hence you see that that portion of the resolution which refers to self-government does not lead to legislation. There is nothing in this resolution which can be considered now as pointing to legislation or as legislation. I think, therefore, that the objection raised by the Senator from Connecticut might be withdrawn. I think he will withdraw it if he will reflect upon it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I have no desire to make the motion I rise to make so long as any Senator desires to discuss this subject; but if the debate is exhausted, I will, in order to enable us to vote and waiving the point of order, which I think is one of very great importance and requires considerable discussion, move to lay the whole subject on the table. I will withdraw that motion if any Senator desires to discuss it.

Mr. CLAYTON. I rise to a point of order. Can you lay this resolution on the table before it is before the Senate? It has not been received yet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas raises a point of order. The Senator from Rhode Island has moved to lay the whole subject on the table, which covers the question of reception. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is to lay the motion of reception on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better take the question squarely.

Mr. ANTHONY. But if we take it squarely, which question do we take it on, the point of order, or the merits of the case?

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us take it on the point of order.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have distinctly stated that I did not propose to call up now the merits of the case at all. My proposition is to allow the resolution to lie on the table. It is merely a question of order that is now raised. When this resolution was introduced three or four days ago the Senator from Connecticut raised the point of order that it could not be received. Now we are only undertaking to settle that point of order; and if that shall be settled so that the resolution can be received, then I shall ask that it be laid on the table.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I think I shall have the benefit of the vote of the Senator from Arkansas on my motion to lay the whole subject on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island moves to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. CLAYTON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Chair be kind enough to state the precise question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution of the Senator from Arkansas for reception is before the Senate. On its presentation the Senator from Connecticut objected to its reception. The question then was will the Senate receive the resolution at this session, upon which the Senator from Rhode Island rose and moved to lay the subject of reception on the table. The question now before the Senate is, will the Senate lay the subject on the table.

Mr. BAYARD. That carries the whole question.

Mr. CLAYTON. Now I want to understand this thing——

Mr. HAMLIN. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not propose to debate it. I want information. ["Order," "Order."] The proposition——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the Senator from Arkansas making an explanation? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLAYTON. The proposition of the Senator from Connecticut is that this resolution is not in order, as I understand, and he makes the proposition——

Mr. THURMAN. I call the Senator to order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is not debatable. The motion is to lay on the table.

Mr. ANTHONY. If I can do so after the yeas and nays have been ordered, I am willing to allow my friend from Arkansas to speak on the subject. I did not make the motion to lay on the table in order to cut off debate, and I will withdraw it if he wishes to speak.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not want to debate. I want information. It seems to me if you undertake to lay this question on the table——

Mr. EATON. Order! I call the Senator to order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is to lay the whole subject on the table. That motion is not debatable.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 40, nays 22; as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bogy, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry of Michigan, Hitchcock, Howe, Logan, Mitchell, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Robertson, Sherman, Spencer, and West—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Davis, Hamilton, Harvey, Jones of Nevada, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Paddock, Ransom, and Wadleigh—10.

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. THURMAN. Before I vote on that motion I should like to know of my friend from Kentucky [Mr. McCREERY] whether he prefers to speak to-day or not. He is entitled to the floor on the unfinished business.

Mr. McCREERY. I believe I would prefer to wait till to-morrow, as I do not feel very well to-day.

Mr. MORTON. Before the motion is submitted I desire to suggest to my friend from Pennsylvania that there may be other Senators here prepared to go on with the debate, and these early adjournments are protracting the discussion too long. I hope we shall stay here longer each day and finish the discussion within some reasonable time.

Mr. McCREERY. I suppose we shall take the vote on the motion for an executive session.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania withdraw the motion long enough to enable me to offer a resolution?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

SEAL FISHERIES OF ALASKA.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That six hundred additional copies of the report of Henry W. Elliott on the seal fisheries of Alaska, with illustrations, be printed for the use of the Senate.

FISH AND FISHERIES.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That six hundred additional copies of the third report of Professor Spencer F. Baird, Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, with the accompanying documents, be printed for the use of the Senate.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. BURNSIDE, it was Ordered, That the heirs of General William Gates, deceased, have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate their petition and papers, on leaving copies of the same.

Mr. CRAGIN. I wish to inquire where the Senators are who think this business is all out of order? [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not hear the remark of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CRAGIN. I simply wished to make an inquiry whether the order just made and the resolutions offered by the Senator from Rhode Island were not as much out of order as the resolution offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. HAMLIN. They are precisely of the same character.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That matter is beyond the control of the Chair.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. When I moved to go into executive session, I was not aware that the Senator from Kentucky desired to speak.

Mr. THURMAN. He does not wish to speak to-day.

Mr. MORTON. There are other Senators who are prepared.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. We have some very important business in executive session which we may dispose of to-day. I think we had better do that. Therefore I insist on my motion.

The motion was agreed to, there being on a division ayes 29, noes 21; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and forty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at three o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 12, 1875.

JOHN B. GORDON, a Senator from the State of Georgia, appeared in his seat to-day.

Prayer by Rev. JOHN W. CHICKERING, D. D., of Boston, Massachusetts.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 15th of January, 1874, a history of the yellow-fever epidemic of 1873; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

COLUMBIA HOSPITAL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. SARGENT as director of the Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum.

PETITION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented the petition of the heirs of the late William K. Sebastian, late Senator from Arkansas, accompanied by certain depositions, praying that the Senate will recall, annul, and forever revoke the act of expulsion of Senator Sebastian in July, 1861, and restore and re-establish his good name as a true and loyal Senator; which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

DISTRIBUTION OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be distributed pro rata to the Senators who were not members of the Forty-third Congress the same number of copies of the Revised Statutes of the United States as were distributed to the Senators of that Congress.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. MORTON on the 5th instant:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback be admitted as a Senator from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years, beginning the 4th day of March, 1873.

Mr. MCCREERY. Mr. President, the subject is threadbare. This discussion has been continued so long and the argument has been so exhaustive in its character, that vanity itself might despair at the prospect of offering anything that is new. If I am capable of answering the positions taken by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] I have done it on a former occasion, and if I am incapable of accomplishing such a result it would be a needless waste of time to expose my weakness. Any anxiety, however, that I may have felt in that direction has been put to rest by the conclusive refutation of the able Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.] I shall make no attempt to divide the honor which he has won so fairly.

In hinting or intimating that I may have replied, or attempted to reply, to the positions taken by the Senator from Indiana, let it be distinctly understood that I make no reference to the "blood and thunder" part which he at this time holds in reserve and which will be poured like melted lava upon us at the conclusion of this debate. That never has been answered, and never will be. There is too much eloquence and too much passion in it for any logical analysis. Aristotle, Archbishop Whately, and the great masters of the art of disputation, have clearly laid down the rules of correct reasoning; but as to the best method of combating a paroxysm, they have left us completely in the dark. I here in my place, with all the responsibilities of a Senator resting upon me, and without the fear of successful contradiction, declare that the Senator from Indiana is the ablest man on the subject of outrage now living in the world. [Laughter.] He may be a little imaginative, it is true, but still he is excessively able. I make these remarks in imitation of his example for the benefit of the new Senators. [Laughter.]

I took occasion during the last Congress at considerable length to present my views on Louisiana affairs. I appreciate too highly the respectful attention with which my remarks were received by the Senate to think for a moment of entering upon their repetition. Indeed, the facts and figures collected in the voluminous record have somewhat faded from my memory, and I could not reproduce them if I desired.

I confess my surprise at the course pursued by the honorable Senator from Indiana, for if I recollect aright the identical proposition contained in his resolution was under consideration when he moved a reference for the purpose of inquiry concerning certain charges of corruption which had reached his ear. I took it for granted that something had come to the knowledge of the Senator which amounted to a prima facie presumption of corruption, or he would not have taken the responsibility of so grave a charge in this presence. Supposing, therefore, that his mind was greatly perplexed by the opposing forces of two prima facie presumptions which were in direct and positive antagonism, I naturally concluded that the country might expect a little repose on this vexed question, and that Louisiana, despoiled, throttled, and prostrate as she is, might escape the humiliation of having her wrongs paraded before a tribunal which is called upon to sacrifice her dearest rights on the altar of a prima facie presumption!

It has been repeatedly insinuated, if not directly charged, that the democratic members of this body are encouraging by their silence the outrages alleged against the southern people; that they have it in their power to restore peace by an open avowal of their disapprobation of violence; that one word will allay all strife, heal all dissensions, and establish confidence and good-will toward all men. While our counsels and our admonitions are persistently spurned, we do not very clearly understand the large amount of influence for good or for evil that is ascribed to us. Our principles, as well as our interests, make us the fast friends of peace, and the steadfast, uncompromising foes of violence and fraud. We have no armies to fight our battles, and we want none. Our triumph, if it comes at all, as we believe it surely will, must be achieved by the quiet and enlightened agency of public sentiment as expressed through the ballot-box. Since we have been charged with being the aiders and the abettors of violence and outrage, I may embrace this opportunity of declaring myself the inveterate enemy of all criminals and of all crime. From the ruffian who in his brawls will assault peaceful and quiet citizens, ascending through all the degrees of homicide or of shooting or stabbing with intent to maim or kill, to the belted knight who, without legal or constitutional warrant and in defiance of both, stalks into a State-house and at the point of the sword organizes a Legislature according to his own or his master's will, I condemn and denounce them all. I contend that there is not a citizen of Louisiana, black or white, who had not a better right to a place on the floor of the house of representatives than General De Trobriand. It is conceded on all hands that the order given by him was without authority and void. If then the expelled members or citizens had chosen to remain in the hall in contempt of the order, as they had a perfect right to do, and lives had been lost in the struggle, would that officer have been condemned and executed as a murderer, or would it have been characterized as a conspiracy of the White League to overthrow a State government? A willful and deliberate murderer forfeits his life as an atonement for his crime. What atonement then should be made by an officer who invades the halls of legislation and aims a deliberate blow at the guaranteed rights of every American citizen? Who is it, I would ask, that is silent when outrage and wrong are perpetrated in our midst?

As a foundation for the few remarks that I propose to submit, I shall refer to a passage in the last annual message of the President of the United States. After a discussion of the Louisiana question and some general and special observations upon southern affairs, the President says:

> I sympathize with their prostrate condition and would do all in my power to relieve them—acknowledging that in some instances they have had most trying governments to live under, and very oppressive ones in the way of taxation for nominal improvements not giving benefits equal to the hardships imposed—but can they proclaim themselves entirely irresponsible for this condition? They cannot.

This is a pregnant sentence, full of meaning from beginning to end. It shows that he understands the tyranny and oppression of their governments, that he realizes the spoliation and robbery which, under the guise of taxation for nominal and worthless improvements, have brought starvation to their doors. His bosom swells with emotions of pity as he beholds widowhood and orphanage the innocent and helpless victims of ruthless despotism vainly struggling under a load which would crush manhood in its prime. The people of Louisiana may be inclined to thank the President for the expression of his commiseration; but they can scarcely fail to ask the question, "Why is it that his sympathetic heart has never suggested anything in our behalf?" "How is it whenever his arm has been raised that we have been the sufferers?" The President has very properly raised the question of responsibility, and it is accepted as an invitation to the inquiry. Speaking, then, with especial reference to the complications in Louisiana affairs, I propound to the President the same interrogatory put by himself to the southern people, "Can he proclaim himself entirely irresponsible for their condition?" and an honest, impartial public, in view of the facts, will answer the question.

Probably the first authoritative intimation of a design on the part of the Federal Government to interfere in the affairs of Louisiana may be found in the following dispatch:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 3, 1872.

S. B. PACKARD, Esq.,
United States Marshal, New Orleans, Louisiana:

You are to enforce the decrees and mandates of the United States courts, no matter by whom resisted, and General Emory will furnish you with all necessary troops for that purpose.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

The tone and temper of this dispatch is certainly spiteful, if not positively belligerent. Had the marshal been faithless in the discharge of his duty? Had anybody resisted or attempted to resist the process of the courts? Had any person who was authorized made a requisition for troops? There is no pretense of either. The hot and unseemly haste of this appeal to arms would have remained forever a mystery in the minds of men had not subsequent events connected its author with one of the most flagrant judicial usurpations ever known in our country.

At the November election in 1872 W. Pitt Kellogg was a candidate for governor of the State of Louisiana, and was defeated by the decisive majority of 9,606 votes, as shown by the official returns which were compared by the board and afterward underwent the inspection of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate. Kellogg's bill to perpetuate testimony was pending before the circuit court of the United States for the district of Louisiana, and about midnight on the 5th of December Judge Durell prepared and signed an order at his lodgings not to perpetuate testimony according to the prayer of the petitioner, but to seize and hold the State-house. If there can be a doubt that these steps were taken with the knowledge and approbation of the Administration, that doubt is dispelled by the fact that about that same hour Captain Jackson, with his battery and his soldiers, arrived from Fort Barancas, in Florida, and proceeded at once to execute the order.

This order was condemned at once by all men of sense of all parties as utterly void in law; but neither the President nor any member of his Cabinet made any effort whatever to check the usurper in his lawless course, but for forty days the military held absolute sway over the capitol of Louisiana. During this military occupation Judge Durell proceeded step by step until he had revolutionized the civil administration of that State. Instead of the enthusiastic greeting and the loud acclaim of freemen which usually attend the inauguration of a new administration, the batteries are charged, the sabers are drawn, the bayonets are presented, and the ranks are closed while the appointees of the Federal court go through the solemn mockery of kissing the holy volume in token of their sworn allegiance to the constitution! Hardly had the oath of office been administered before the pretended Legislature, the pretended governor, and the collector of customs, with one accord and in full chorus, cry out to the President, "We are behaving with great discretion; send us troops! troops! troops!"

The people of Louisiana stood bewildered and appalled at the spectacle. The governor elected begged the President in the name of justice to suspend recognition until the facts could be laid before him by a committee of many of the best citizens who were then on the eve of departure for Washington, and expressing the belief that they would not be condemned unheard. The sacred right of petition was violated although the petitioners only asked the privilege of submitting the facts necessary to a just decision of their cause. The Czar of Russia in the plenitude of his power probably never returned a more imperious and supercilious answer to his conquered subjects of Poland than that made by the Attorney-General to the humble petition of the people of Louisiana. After taking a day for reflection, the decision of the Chief Magistrate is summed up in the following telegram:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 13, 1872.

Hon. JOHN M CENERY,
New Orleans, Louisiana:

Your visit with a hundred citizens will be unavailing so far as the President is concerned. His decision is made and will not be changed, and the sooner it is acquiesced in the sooner good order and peace will be restored.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

It will be remembered that the Committee on Privileges and Elections condemned this order of Judge Durell in every form of expression that could indicate their disgust and contempt of the proceeding; that the Senator from Indiana could apply no milder term to it than "gross usurpation;" and that the Judiciary Committee of the House after a patient and laborious investigation declared that such outrages, such unwarranted assumptions of power should be brought to condign punishment, and that Edward H. Durell be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors in office.

Can it be that the first-born son of all these daring and devilish machinations against the very existence of a State in this Union is entitled to a prima facie recognition because he presents a commission signed by a man who was himself the prime mover and chief instigator of the crimes and misdemeanors that have driven the Federal judge in disgrace from the bench? Judge Durell has lost that which a lawyer prizes higher than all earthly considerations—the respect of his profession; but, fallen as he is, I would not add to the bitterness of his anguish by dragging him down with one hand while with the other I was exalting the partners and beneficiaries of his usurpation. There is not an intelligent man in the United States who does not know with positive certainty that but for the midnight order of Judge Durell, Kellogg and his associates never would have been installed into office, but that McEnery with his colleagues would have been inaugurated and proceeded peacefully and quietly in the discharge of their duties; nobody would have been injured; the people of Louisiana would have been satisfied, and universal harmony would have prevailed.

But if Durell and the Army undertook to bestow that which did not belong to them and over which they had no control or jurisdiction, if the midnight order was an absolute nullity in every sense of the word, is it not equally true that all franchises, offices, or emoluments, held or acquired by, through, or under that order, are absolutely null and void? If a robber at the hour of midnight invades your premises and seizes and carries away your property, and the facts are established, will his possession be regarded as presumptive evidence of title, or would the receiver, with a knowledge of the facts, acquire more right or occupy a better position than the principal? Would you condemn to disgrace the principal and allow the receiver to hold and enjoy the property? If a citizen or a State is wrongfully deprived of anything that belongs to either, there should be an immediate, a full, and a fair restitution. I am opposed to making Durell the scape-goat to bear the sins and manifold iniquities of those who besieged him from morning until night with all manner of applications and petitions, who surrounded him with soldiers, enlisted him in their ambitious schemes and enterprises, dazzled his understanding by the very audacity of their movements, led him far away from the pathway of duty, until at last in their own behalf and for their own selfish purposes they have sunk him under a load of obloquy, misdemeanor, and crime. These are the men that Senators expect to advance by talking about State rights and prima facie presumptions! Unless they are wholly lost to every sentiment of self-respect I do not see how any one of them, from Kellogg down to the lowest forger of their certificates, can pretend to hold their places, when the whole judicial machinery by which they got them is known and understood to be nothing more and nothing less than an unqualified and an unwarranted usurpation.

I return to the question propounded to the President; can he proclaim himself entirely irresponsible for their condition? Candidly speaking, I do not think he can. It has been contended by some that the President and the marshal are bound to follow the judgments and decrees of the courts, right or wrong. If this is true, the President is not only bound to see that the laws are faithfully executed, but he is equally bound to see that they are faithfully violated in case any of the inferior courts shall so adjudge and decree. The law in this important matter has not left the President to grope his way in darkness, but has provided him with a legal adviser who is presumed at least to understand the difference between right and wrong, the difference between law and the violation of law. This may be a violent presumption in some cases; but such, I understand, to be the theory of our Government. If the Attorney-General advised the course pursued by the President with reference to Louisiana affairs, then it is clear that he is worse than no Attorney-General at all. He gave bad counsel; he placed the President in an unfortunate position, where he appeared to be the friend and the ally of the usurper as well as an active supporter of the usurpation. A good Attorney-General would have advised the President not to be too ready with his troops, and by all means to wait until there was a distinct call for them from the proper authorities; not to make himself the partisan of any upstart whose "vaulting ambition" would override Constitution and law to reach some office in the immediate neighborhood of the State or Federal Treasury; but to rise to the level of his high mission, take a broad view of the whole Union, regarding every man and every State as the equal in point of right with every other man and every other State, and dealing out equal and exact justice to every section, North and South, East and West.

Federal interference and Federal intermeddling with matters purely of State concern and State jurisdiction ought to be stopped at once and forever. It irritates and exasperates the people, and brings about the very excesses which it professes so much zeal to extirpate and destroy. The perpetual marshaling of troops and the arrest and detention of citizens under military orders unhinges the frame-work of society, paralyzes industry, and eventually produces a state of desperation which counts not the cost but hazards the issues of life and death with an utter indifference as to whether they are won or lost. Logan, the Indian chief, contemplating his ruined race, said that he would not turn on his heels to save his life.

Siberia may swarm with Poles, and exiles of Erin may wander in every land; but until England and Russia shall extend to the Irishman and the Polander every right, every franchise, and every immunity enjoyed by every other subject, the blood of Emmett and Kosciusko will mantle the brow and nerve the arm which will put the torch to the slumbering volcano, although life, fortune, kindred, and home should perish in the fire. Ten centuries of despotism, fraud, and force will never reconcile them to such degradation. The people of Louisiana believe that by the arbitrary power of a Federal judge, encouraged by Federal officials and supported by Federal bayonets, they have been forced under the control of a government not of their choice. They do not believe that the same fraud and force would have been employed in any northern State to defeat the popular will. They know that in the gubernatorial election in Ohio, where the vote was much more equally divided than in Louisiana, and where the result too was adverse to the Administration, the judiciary and the Army did not intervene, nor do they believe that such intervention would have taken place if Allen had carried the election by a single vote.

Recent events have satisfied them that their returning board is a fraud organized to perpetuate the Kellogg dynasty. Grievous have been their afflictions and great must be their indignation; but violence would be no remedy for their sufferings.

I have been devoted through life to peaceful pursuits. I abhor ruffianism, strife, and bloodshed, and would do all in my power to repress them. I deplore the fact that there seems to be a perfect carnival of crime throughout the length and breadth of our country, and that the larger portion of the biggest criminals "go unwhipped of justice." Some men talk of southern outrages, as if there were no northern outrages or eastern outrages or western outrages. All violations of law and all combinations to violate the law are outrages, whether they are perpetrated by Ku-Klux, vigilance committees, or Molly Maguires. How many men, I would ask, have been slaughtered in cold blood by the Molly Maguires of Pennsylvania, and how many of those guilty wretches have been brought to justice, and what number of United States troops have been sent into that quarter to quell the disturbances? How many men have been put to death in open day in the States of Illinois, Iowa, and California without even the pretense of a judicial investigation? The Senator from Indiana is generally loudest in his condemnation or denunciation of southern outrages, but it will require no great stretch of his memory to recall the time when his neighbors and friends of his own State took out helpless negroes by the quarter dozen and hung them up like dogs, torturing them in their dying moments by the application of fire and red-hot irons to their naked bodies, and leaving them to swelter and sodden in the sun; when armed bands of marauders sallied forth at midnight, dragging prisoners from their dungeons and suspending them to the cross-bars of the bridges. These things are too shocking and too near to his home to suit his taste. He may like better to select some spot remote from him and his, and, carefully excluding all chances of negligence or accident, calmly contemplate the remorseless incendiary as with torch in hand he takes his stealthy step in the direction of the doomed dwelling. Fancy paints the blazing rafters, and he hears the cries of the terror-stricken family as they fly to the woods or the swamp for a hiding place.

But we are on Louisiana affairs, and the issue is too momentous for the indulgence of any little flings in the way of crimination or recrimination.

The dial upon the wall may soon indicate the hour at which one of the States of this Union is disfranchised, the hour at which the usurpations of Durell receive the full and complete ratification of the American Senate. Before the deed is done I wish to ask Senators if they have carefully examined the evidence collected by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, if they have seriously considered the dark catalogue of perjury and forgery developed in the volume, and can they give it the sanction of their votes?

To Louisiana, prostrate, powerless, and manacled as she is, I would say one word of encouragement. A bright career of prosperity and progress lies before you. The orange and the magnolia will send their fragrance over your valleys when your oppressors are forgotten. Bide your time; wait with patience and witness the revelation of the centennial of our national independence. The flag under which Jefferson and Jackson marched will be unfurled; the faith of our fathers will be restored; every State from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the lakes to the Gulf will rejoice in the knowledge that she is, and of right ought to be, a sovereign under the limitations of the Constitution.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, my friend from Kentucky has spoken his piece and I suppose feels better. He said at the outset of his speech that he did not intend to make an argument on the question involved here, and he kept his word, for he did not. He said that about a year ago he made a speech in which he had answered all the arguments that had been recently advanced. I never understood that that speech was regarded in the light of an argument, but that the Senate regarded it in the light of a pastoral poem, somewhere between comedy and tragedy, its exact position not well defined.

He talked about "blood and thunder" and "the outrage business." Before he concluded he referred to the murder of negroes in Indiana—rather an unfortunate reference. There were some negroes brutally murdered in Indiana in a democratic county, and the murder understood to be committed by those who hated negroes—not by republicans. The reference to murder is not a pleasant one to any person who occupies the position of the Senator from Kentucky. When we consider that Louisiana has been deluged with blood and the blood of republicans for political purposes, it is not to be wondered at that the Senator from Kentucky should endeavor to make sport of it and turn it aside by a jest.

Mr. President, I do not propose to follow the Senator from Kentucky in his narrative. It is the old story. I think I have heard him go over it before substantially; at least it has been recited many times; and while my friend regards it as history, I beg leave to say that a great part of it must be regarded simply as poetry.

The main questions involved in this case are law questions upon facts which are confessed by all; the law arising upon the decisions of the courts, upon the decision of the returning board, upon the decision of the State authorities of Louisiana, upon the recognition by the President of the United States and by the House of Representatives; and in regard to these questions the Senator from Kentucky has not one word to say. He recites the old story, which has no bearing whatever upon the question before the Senate of the United States; and when the Senator from Kentucky gives all these questions the go-by, it is a confession on his part that he cannot answer them. He said that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] had answered. I think the speech of the Senator from North Carolina, although it was undoubtedly able, was not regarded by anybody as a satisfactory answer. No, Mr. President, the questions of law which I discussed have not been answered, and I venture the assertion they cannot be answered. Senators will fly back to a part of the history of the election in Louisiana in 1872, leaving out the most material parts of that story.

But, Mr. President, it is not my intention now to argue this Louisiana question. If there are other Senators who desire to speak I will yield the floor. In the conclusion of the debate I may have something to say. I do not find anything in the speech of my friend from Kentucky, aside from its studied humor, to require an answer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I had not expected to submit any remarks to the Senate on this question this morning, nor indeed until within the last half hour had I determined to participate in the discussion at all. Regarding the question, however, as one of very great importance, I cannot consent that the vote shall be taken on the resolution without at least interposing a very few words expressive of my opinions upon the questions involved in the proposition under consideration.

The Senator from Indiana who offered this resolution and who so earnestly and eloquently urged its adoption placed the right of Pinchback to a seat on this floor primarily upon the presentation of his certificate, regular in form, claiming that such certificate of election establishes a prima facie case, which entitles him to a seat as a member of this body.

Now, it may be well for us to inquire what has been the practice of the Senate in cases of this kind. It has been alleged by the Senator from Indiana in this debate that it has been the custom, the practice of the Senate, upon the presentation of a certificate of election signed by the governor of a State and attested by the great seal of the State, to admit the person whose election has been thus certified as upon the prima facie case thus made out to a seat, subject to contest upon other grounds thereafter. I am willing to concede that such has been the practice of the Senate, as a general rule. I am aware that when a certificate signed by the governor of the State certifying the election of a person as a Senator by the Legislature of a State has been presented it has been the general practice of the Senate upon such proof to admit the party, because the evidences thus furnished, if unimpeached, entitled the party to a seat upon the floor of the Senate. But that has not been the invariable practice of the Senate. One of the cases to which reference was made by the Senator from Indiana—the case of Mr. Goldthwaite, of Alabama—was an exception to that rule. So far as the case of that gentleman was concerned there was no question but what the certificate was signed by the governor of Alabama, and yet that gentleman was not admitted immediately nor for several months after his term commenced.

The cases of Mr. Spencer and Mr. Shields were also referred to by the Senator, but those cases are distinguishable, in fact they are essentially different, from the case presented by the certificate signed by Kellogg certifying to the election of Pinchback as a Senator. In all these cases, that of Mr. Goldthwaite and of Mr. Spencer and also of Mr. Shields, there was no question whatever that the party making the certificate was the legal governor of the State; but the moment the certificate of Kellogg certifying the election of Pinchback is presented the question arises, who is Kellogg? We are driven at once to inquire into his official character. We are forced to this inquiry from facts in the possession of the Senate itself. We are forced to this inquiry from facts revealed by the records of this body. We are forced into the inquiry as to whether Kellogg is in fact and in truth the governor of Louisiana. We cannot escape such inquiry without assuming that to be true which we are satisfied from evidence in the possession of the Senate is not true, without ignoring facts within the knowledge of every Senator on this floor.

So that the case of Pinchback is essentially different from the case of Mr. Spencer to which reference was made, or to the case of Mr. Goldthwaite, and I believe it is essentially different from any other case to which reference has been made by the Senator from Indiana in this debate. In fact, with what we all know, with the information we now possess, with the facts which are revealed by the records of this body, I may be permitted to say that I was amazed, nay, I was astonished, that the Senator from Indiana should attempt to argue that Pinchback had presented a prima facie case entitling him to be seated as a Senator in this body. The resolution before us necessarily involves the consideration of the whole question of the condition of public affairs and the character of the government in Louisiana. We cannot seat any man as a Senator from that State without taking cognizance of the real condition of affairs there and without making inquiry in reference to the character of the government of that State. We are driven ex necessitate into this inquiry in considering the resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana to seat Pinchback as a Senator as fully and properly as we would be in the consideration of the other resolution which he offered at the same time for the purpose of inquiring into the character of the government in the State of Louisiana. I propose in the few remarks that I submit on this resolution not to be confined to the mere question of a prima facie case, but I propose to go further and inquire into the character of the government over that State in order to ascertain whether such government is entitled to be represented in the Senate.

Before passing from this point I wish to call attention to facts necessary to entitle Pinchback to a seat upon the certificate presented. First, the certificate must be made by a party rightfully exercising the office of governor, one who is the legal governor of the State or who is in the exercise of the functions of that office by color of some right or title to the office. In other words, he must be either de jure or de facto the governor of the State. Then let us inquire whether Kellogg, who makes this certificate, is in the office of governor by virtue of any right and title which constitute him governor de jure. What is necessary to confer upon him such right to the office? In the first place, in order to constitute him the lawful governor of the State he must be in the office by virtue of an election by the people, and in the second place the result of that election must be legally ascertained according to the constitution and laws of that State. It cannot be contended that any man is the rightful governor of any State unless he comes in possession of the office by virtue of an election of the people, and even if elected it is also necessary and essential that the result of that election should have been ascertained according to the mode and manner prescribed by the constitution and laws of the State.

Is there a single Senator on this floor, in view of the information which has been furnished by an inquiry into that matter by the Senate itself, who can to-day assert or who to-day believes that Kellogg is governor of Louisiana by virtue of any election of the people of that State? I say without fear of successful contradiction that there is not a Senator on the floor of the Senate to-day who believes that according to the votes actually cast at the election Kellogg was elected governor of the State in 1872.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator must correct his statement a little. There is one Senator on this floor, if no more, who believes that precisely.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Do I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to say that he believes from the votes actually cast at the election Kellogg was elected governor of that State?

Mr. HOWE. I believe that as much as I believe the Senator from Delaware is speaking on this question. I do not know it so certainly, but I believe it as implicitly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I would now inquire, as I have been interrupted by the Senator from Wisconsin, whether he believes that from any evidence in the possession of the Senate or whether it is an arbitrary conclusion of the mind formed without evidence before it.

Mr. HOWE. I believe it from circumstantial evidence laid before the Senate and which for two years has been before the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am very happy to inform the Senator, to inform the Senate, and to inform the world, that I arrived at exactly a different conclusion from the Senator from Wisconsin. I only regret that the Senator from Wisconsin has not been enabled to look at this question calmly and dispassionately; that he has not been enabled to arrive at a conclusion divested from every other consideration except a fair inquiry into the fact. I allege here that no man can examine carefully the evidence submitted to this Senate in reference to the election which occurred in 1872 fairly and dispassionately without reaching the conclusion that Kellogg was defeated. I know the weakness of human nature, and I will not attribute to my friend any greater weakness on this point than I am willing to accept for myself; but I know how our judgments are frequently warped by party interests and party feeling, and my honorable friend will pardon me if I say that he is not an exception to this rule.

A careful examination of the evidence ought to satisfy every one who examines it fairly that Kellogg was defeated in the election by not less than somewhere in the neighborhood of 10,000 votes. That was the conclusion of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. That committee was composed of gentlemen who investigated the subject, who heard the witnesses on that point, who examined the returns made according to the laws of the State, and who came to the conclusion and placed it here in their written report that Kellogg was defeated, and that the majority against him was nearly 10,000 votes. Who were the gentlemen who made that inquiry? The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] was chairman of that committee. I have his separate report here, and I assert that neither he nor any Senator on this floor can point to a single expression in the report of the Senator from Indiana or in the report of the committee which intimates that Kellogg was elected by the votes actually polled at the election. The late Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. Carpenter, the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] the late Senator from Illinois, Judge Trumbull, the late Senator from Georgia, Mr. Hill, and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. ALCORN] examined this question, and not one of them denies the proposition that Kellogg was defeated by a large majority. Now let me read what they have said in reference to that point, for I wish to direct attention to the language of that committee. Here is what Judge Trumbull said; and let me remark in reference to Judge Trumbull that he was not a democrat. He claimed no affiliation with that party. He stood at the very head of the Senate for years, and he was a republican in association and attachments, but when called upon to examine the testimony in this case he came to the conclusion that Kellogg was overwhelmingly defeated and put it in his written report submitted to the Senate over his own signature. Here is what he says:

According to the official returns, the fusion State ticket, headed by McEnery for governor, received an average majority of about ten thousand votes, and a large majority of the persons elected to the Legislature were of the same party; and but for the illegal interference of the United States authorities, as is stated in the report of the majority, the McEnery government would have been peacefully inaugurated.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. What were the returns which showed that result, will the Senator be good enough to state?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir; the returns which were laid before the De Feriet board, and by which they declared the result of the election.

Mr. HOWE. Does not the Senator from Delaware know that those returns did not embrace six parishes in the State?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understand that some of the parishes were thrown out; but I now will read to my honorable friend, for I speak by authority, what Judge Trumbull said on that point.

Mr. THURMAN. Will my friend allow me to ask a question there of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he does not know that those parishes said to be thrown out would have increased McEnery's majority instead of decreasing it?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir; I do not know that. Does the Senator from Ohio know it?

Mr. THURMAN. I think it appears from the testimony there to that effect.

Mr. HOWE. I think the Senator from Ohio is mistaken.

Mr. LOGAN. I think I can settle this dispute, if the Senator will allow me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I prefer to make my own speech and not have other Senators make it for me. They can make their comments after I get through.

Mr. HOWE. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to read just a paragraph of the report signed by the majority of the committee?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir; I will.

Mr. LOGAN. I read from page 44 of the report:

The election was generally conducted in quiet, and was perhaps unusually free from disturbance or riot. Governor Warmoth, who was the master-spirit in the whole proceeding, seems to have relied upon craft, rather than violence, to carry the State for McEnery. In the canvass of votes—

Mark the language—

In the canvass of votes which determined the McEnery government to be elected—

That is the basis on which we made this report—the votes of several republican parishes were rejected.

The inference is that if these were returned he could not have been elected.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator from Illinois be kind enough to send me that book?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am perfectly willing to permit my friend the Senator from Illinois to interpose occasionally for his own relief, if he sees proper, any remarks which can vary the force and effect of the very report to which he appended his name.

Mr. LOGAN. I have never backed from anything I said in that report. I only called the Senator's attention to the fact that in determining the legal question they threw out these parishes, and we agreed they had a right to do it, which elected McEnery; that is all.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am very certain that my friend the Senator from Illinois, could not have come to the conclusion which he did come to unless he had supposed they had a perfect right to throw them out. I propose now to read a paragraph from the report to which he appended his name.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator wishes to read the paragraph which declared McEnery elected I will show it to him.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have it here. The Senator from Illinois together with the late Senator from Wisconsin, (Mr. Carpenter,) the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. ALCORN] appended their names to this declaration:

But for the interference of Judge Durell in the matter of this State election, a matter wholly beyond his jurisdiction, the McEnery government would to-day have been the de facto government of the State. Judge Durell interposed the Army of the United States between the people of Louisiana and the only government which has the semblance of regularity, and the result of this has been to establish the Kellogg government, so far as that State now has any government. For the United States to interfere in a State election, and, by the employment of troops, set up a governor and Legislature without a shadow of right, and then to refuse redress of the wrong, upon the ground that to grant relief would be interfering with the rights of the State, is a proposition difficult to utter with a grave countenance.

Human language cannot denounce more strongly the Kellogg government as a usurpation than has been done in the report of that committee. Now, I ask, with what consistency can the Senator from Illinois or the Senator from Rhode Island or the Senator from Mississippi, after appending their names to a report which declares that Kellogg and his Legislature were not elected and that but for the interference of Federal authority the McEnery government would have been the government of the State, after having denounced in such withering terms the interference of Durell and the order which he promulgated, and after they had expressed their regrets at the interference of the military power under the direction of the President of the United States to defeat the will of the people of Louisiana, how can they now, either directly or indirectly, by their votes recognize the Kellogg government, whether such recognition be by expressly declaring that it is the legal government, or indirectly by seating Pinchback as a Senator from that State elected by a Legislature which had no more claim to legality than Kellogg, who ran on the same ticket?

So far therefore as any right or title to this office is concerned, I repeat, I cannot conceive how any Senator or any other person who will examine the evidence submitted to the Senate by its own committee can arrive at any conclusion that Kellogg is in office by virtue of an election of the people. He is not therefore de jure governor; and therefore when he appends his name to the certificate that Pinchback has been elected it carries with it no authority, because he has no title to the office derived from any election by the people of the State. It may be said that he is de facto governor; but the very same objection to his character in that capacity arises that arises to his character as the de jure governor, because he cannot be governor de facto unless he is in the office under color of right. I use the term de facto not in the common but in the legal acceptation. That term is sometimes very improperly in common parlance applied even to the most notorious usurper, but in a legal sense it is only applicable to an officer having color of title as contradistinguished from a mere usurper. This is a familiar question to every lawyer. A man indeed may sometimes be in office without having been rightfully inducted into office, and yet having color of right he is recognized as a de facto officer, and his official acts as such become valid so far as third parties and the public are concerned. But when he enters his office as Kellogg entered upon the office, without any election or without any color of title whatever to office, he becomes a usurper and not an officer either de jure or de facto, and the acts of a usurper are void ab initio. He can perform no duty appertaining to the office, and none of his acts can or will be respected save only where his power is sufficiently strong to command submission and acquiescence. If Kellogg is neither governor by virtue of an election nor in office under color of title to the same, the certificate which he makes of Pinchback's election carries with it no authority, establishes no fact which it asserts, and indeed is not evidence for any purpose; certainly is not entitled to any respect in this Senate.

We must go behind that certificate to determine the right of the claimant to a seat in this body, and I say that involved in this inquiry as to the right of Pinchback to a seat is the consideration of the condition of affairs and the nature of the government in Louisiana. And now, how did the Kellogg government come into power? A recitation of the facts, though they be familiar to the Senate, cannot be too often made. How did that government come into existence? It is not there by virtue of an election, as has been declared by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, authorized and specially directed to inquire into that matter by the Senate. That government, I repeat, is not to-day over the people of Louisiana by virtue of any election by the people. How then did it come into existence? Sir, it is a painful chapter in the history of this country, and I repeat that it cannot be too often presented to the people, if happily it may arouse them to a sense of the dangers that threaten our free institutions.

In the fall of 1872 an election was held in the State of Louisiana. Prior to that election H. C. Warmoth was the governor of the State. He had always been a republican. He had been clothed by the Legislature of Louisiana with almost unlimited powers over the machinery and management of elections. Such was the implicit confidence of the republican party in Henry C. Warmoth that they clothed him with vast and excessive powers, I admit, over the management and regulations of elections in that State. It so happened that in 1872 he differed with his republican friends. He took issue with them upon the presidential nominee; he became the advocate of Mr. Greeley for the Presidency. Of course he lost favor with the Executive, he lost favor with the republican party; but he was the governor at the time the election took place in 1872, rightfully in the possession of his office. That election passed off quietly, peacefully, was more orderly than elections usually had been in Louisiana, according to the accounts that were published to the world at that time. The election was admitted to be a fair election; there was but very little disturbance. It was conceded that that election was unusually quiet and unusually fair, and the result of the election, permit me to say, demonstrates clearly that such was the fact, because at that election there were 20,000 more votes polled than had been polled at the election preceding, evidencing conclusively that the election was conducted fairly, peaceably, and quietly, and that all parties entitled to vote had unobstructed access to the polls, and availed themselves of the opportunity thus offered to deposit their votes.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Delaware says that the election was regarded as fair. Will he permit me to quote a passage from the report upon which he relies on that subject?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I said that such was the report at the time of the election.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator has quoted from the report of Mr. Carpenter. Will he allow me to read a passage?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly. I know all that is in the report and the Senator will not interrupt me, for I have no prepared speech, but I have I think possession of my subject. The Senator may read.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. Carpenter and those who united with him reported:

> The testimony shows that leading and sagacious politicians of the State, who were acting with Warmoth, entertained the opinion before the election that Warmoth's control of the election machinery was equivalent to 20,000 votes; and we are satisfied by the testimony that this opinion was well founded.

And other testimony shows that the democratic politicians of Louisiana formed a coalition with him expressly upon the ground that his control of the election machinery was worth 20,000 votes and that he would give them the benefit. The report goes on to say:

> We believe that had registration been accessible to all, and polling places been properly established, the result of the election would have been entirely different. And although we cannot approve of such a canvass as that made by the Lynch board, who seem to have acted upon the principle of "fighting the devil with fire" and circumventing fraud by fraud, and cannot say that Kellogg's government was elected, nevertheless we believe that Kellogg's government was defeated and the popular voice reversed by the fraudulent manipulation of the election.

And in other places the committee say that the election was "an organized fraud."

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am aware of all that; but let me say that that is mere opinion, based upon the fact that Warmoth was clothed and had been clothed by the republican Legislature with power over the registration and management of elections. The republican party, knowing that Mr. Warmoth perhaps had used the power with which they had clothed him to their advantage in the past, supposed the moment that power was withdrawn and not used for their benefit, even if no undue advantage should be given to the democratic party, yet the very fact that he had ceased to exert the power with which he was clothed in their behalf was of itself an advantage of 20,000 votes to the democratic party. I have no doubt it was. I have no doubt that Henry C. Warmoth was thus clothed by a republican Legislature with vast and excessive powers over the election and registration for the purpose of aiding the republican party, and when he broke with that party, when he ceased to exercise the power with which he had been clothed in their behalf it did inure to the benefit of the democratic party by 20,000 votes. That is the true answer to the suggestion of fraud of the Senator from Indiana; but I have not done with the answer to the Senator yet. I want to answer further before the Senator interrupts me again, as I see he proposes to do. But suppose the committee have so believed and so declared, it is but mere opinion. Are you to determine the legality and the results of an election by opinions and not by facts? Where are the facts revealed by this committee to show that their conclusions or opinions as to frauds were right?

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator if that report is any more opinion in that part of it than it is in the other part on which the Senator relies?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think it is, because the facts are given which lead them to the conclusion that McEnery and not Kellogg was elected. The returns were before them and were examined by them. I will, however, meet the very point raised by the Senator from Indiana by what was said by the then Senator from Illinois. I read now from the separate report made by Judge Trumbull in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana. Judge Trumbull says:

> If it were admitted, as it is not, that Congress has authority to inquire into the fairness and regularity of a State election, it is denied that there was any such fraud in the late Louisiana election as would justify setting it aside. It was confessedly one of the most quiet and peaceful elections ever held in the State, and the evidence shows that it was substantially free and fair.
> The vote polled was twenty thousand larger than ever before cast in the State, and against more than two-thirds of it no complaint of unfairness is even alleged.

And then he details the testimony of Marshal Packard, who had been called to the stand to prove these frauds, and he could point out but some six or seven parishes in which there was even alleged unfairness. No, sir; this question of fraud, this question of violence, this question of intimidation is brought up to relieve the action of the President of the United States and of those who sustain him in forcing over the people of Louisiana a usurpation that is devoid of any color of title either by virtue of an election or of having come into power according to the law and the constitution of the State.

But when I was drawn off from the line of remark I was pursuing I was about to narrate succinctly the facts connected with the election in Louisiana and the subsequent events that transpired. I say, according to the reports and rumors at the time, that election was very generally free and fair, and in its result it was decidedly in favor of the democratic party. That was the general understanding throughout the country, and was so stated in the papers of New Orleans, the republican papers as well as the democratic papers, that such was the fact. It was accepted as such by the country, and the popular heart throbbed with joy and hope at the prospect that the condition of affairs in Louisiana was at last to be intrusted to honest hands.

But then came the machinations, then came the conspiracies, the plotted treason against Louisiana; conspiracy against the will of the people of Louisiana, conspiracy and treason against the peace of Louisiana, conspiracy against the prosperity of Louisiana. Kellogg sought the courts. He found in Durell a willing tool. Durell, whose name is connected with infamy, whose name will go down to posterity the synonym of judicial prostitution to power, and who will meet the condign judgment to which an act of perfidy entitles him—Durell, at the hour of midnight on the 5th of December, as was said by my friend from Kentucky this morning, in his own chamber, without a case before him, as an accomplice to a conspiracy to defeat the popular will of the people of Louisiana, promulgated his nefarious order. Sir, I will not seek to connect any person with that conspiracy who is not legitimately connected with it by the proof in the cause; but I ask was there not a singular coincidence in the fact to which reference was made by my friend from Kentucky this morning, that on the 3d of December, 1872, a telegram was sent from the Attorney-General to Marshal Packard to enforce the decrees of the Federal courts and the opportune arrival of troops on the 5th to enforce Durell's order? Who had called upon the Attorney-General in reference to that question? Is it not a plain inference that the design was then concocted, that the determination was then had to make such an order, provided it could be sustained by the powers at Washington? That is the natural and only legitimate inference deducible from that telegram and the facts which subsequently occurred? Why should Attorney-General Williams send it? It may have been that that conspiracy may have been concealed from the Attorney-General and he may have sent the telegram in perfect ignorance of what was contemplated by Pinchback, by Kellogg, by Packard, and by Durell. I have no proof that the Attorney-General was in complicity with such a scheme and I will not impute such a motive. He may have been in profound ignorance of the design of the conspirators in Louisiana, and he may have sent that dispatch without expecting that such an order as that of Durell's would be made; but it was very unfortunate for the interests of the country, very unfortunate for the people of Louisiana, I may say it was very unfortunate even for the reputation of the Attorney-General himself that a telegram of that character should have been sent almost at the very time of the promulgation of the order and the arrival of troops to enforce it.

That order was enforced. I shall not dwell upon the fact that Captain Jackson came opportunely on the very evening it was made and was called upon to enforce it, and by reason of the enforcement of that order by the military power McEnery and the Legislature that was elected with him were kept out of power, and Kellogg, who had not been elected but who had been defeated by 10,000 votes, and the Legislature defeated with him by the same number of votes were installed in power. Such was the result of that order and its enforcement by the Federal military power. There is the origin of the Kellogg usurpation.

But, Mr. President, after the usurpation had been installed the conspirators and usurpers felt uneasy in the possession of the power with which they had been clothed by the Federal military authority of the country. They wanted the recognition of the President of the United States; they wanted the moral effect which the recognition of the executive department of the Government would give to their usurpation and the guarantee of military power for its support, and then came the series of telegrams from Packard, from Pinchback, from Kellogg for recognition by the President. They appealed to every consideration; they appealed to his party instincts and party feelings; they told him that the interests of the republican party required his recognition. I shall not say in this connection that that was the motive which prompted the recognition of the President. I only speak of the fact that that was the appeal which his friends made. How far it influenced the action of the President I shall leave for the country and the judgment of mankind to determine. I speak of the acts and not of the motives of the President; I could wish the former could have been less liable to animadversion and the latter more free from all suspicion.

The parties who invoked the interference of the Federal court over which Durell presided and subsequently invoked the aid of the President were political adventurers who had been defeated at the polls, and the aid granted by the President inured to the benefit of the political party to which he belongs. He may disclaim all intention to interfere in a mere political contest, but, unhappily for his fame, mankind will draw their own conclusions from his action and not from his protestations.

It has been stated in debate that there were precedents for the interference of the Federal power in such cases. Especially have these precedents been invoked to justify the recent interference with the organization of the Legislature of Louisiana. I do not admit that the matters referred to are precedents, but I will refer to one precedent which the President would have done well to follow.

I call attention now to the action of a democratic President when called upon to interfere in a political contest in a State not very dissimilar from that in Louisiana in December, 1872. I refer to the action of President Van Buren when called upon by the governor of Pennsylvania to interfere in what is generally known as the buck-shot war in that State. The facts simply stated were these: There was a determination on the part of the whig party to get control of the two houses of the Pennsylvania Legislature, and returns were sent up from Philadelphia giving to the whig members from that city the certificates of election on a return by a minority of the returning board. The attempt was made to seat them upon these returns by a minority returning board, whereas a majority of the board being democratic returned the democratic members elected from the county of Philadelphia, one or two senators and eight or ten members of the house of representatives of the Legislature. These are the facts succinctly. The respective houses of the Legislature met and attempted to organize; the whigs attempted to organize the house upon the returns that had been made by a minority of the board. Great excitement ensued. It may be well in this connection to read something as to the excitement that existed in Harrisburgh at that time. Here is a contemporary account of the scene that transpired.

I am indebted to Hon. Charles Brown, of my State, then a citizen of Pennsylvania and one of the senators from Philadelphia attempted to be excluded by the minority, for the extract from which I read:

When the hour for the meeting of the house had arrived, every available inch of room in the gallery and lobbies was occupied.

Mr. Hill, of Westmoreland, the oldest member present, according to prevailing custom, called the house to order, and moved that the clerk proceed to open and read the returns of the election in Philadelphia City and of the different counties in the Commonwealth; which was agreed to.

At this juncture Mr. Burrowes made his way through the crowd and presented the official returns. The clerk opened them, and read the returns from the city, and was about proceeding to read those which returned the anti-masons, when Charles Pray arose and inquired by whom the returns were signed.

The clerk read the names of seven return judges appended thereto.

Mr. PRAY. They are not the correct returns. Here is a copy of the correct returns, signed by a majority of the return judges, certified by the prothonotary of the county of Philadelphia.

Loud and prolonged applause followed Mr. Pray's remarks, and they were of such a character as to leave no doubt as to where the outsiders stood upon this question.

After some little debate, the clerk inserted the names of the democratic members from the county upon the roll, and both parties proceeded to organize by the election of a speaker. The anti-masons nominated Thomas S. Cunningham, voted for him, and declared him elected, which proceeding was accompanied by hisses and groans from the gallery. The democrats nominated and elected William Hopkins, who was also sworn into office, and both speakers occupied chairs upon the rostrum. The anti-masonic party appointed committees to wait upon the senate and governor, and adjourned. The democratic party continued in session and appointed similar committees, and also nominated candidates for clerk and sergeant-at arms, after which it adjourned until ten o'clock next day.

The senate met at three o'clock, and was called to order by C. B. Penrose. The excitement of the house was transferred to the senate chamber, as it was known that the secretary would hand in the return of the minority judges instead of the majority, which would elect James Hanna and William Wagner, instead of Charles Brown and S. Stevenson, who were legally elected.

The galleries were filled with an excited crowd; and when the minority return was read there was a strong demonstration made in the senate, and after Hanna and Wagner were sworn in Mr. Brown arose and asked permission to address the senate, which he did amid boisterous applause. At this juncture Mr. Penrose, evidently under the impression that a crisis had arrived, called General Rogers to the chair, went into the recess back of the chair, ingloriously jumped out of the window, and made his escape to Wilson's Hotel; and while Mr. Brown was still speaking the rest of the anti-masons followed Mr. Penrose out of the back window and the senate broke up amid wild confusion.

This account shows that there was much more serious trouble to be apprehended than existed in New Orleans in January last, or when the military took possession of the State-house in that city in December, 1872, and excluded the McEnery legislature under the order of Durell.

Then Mr. Penrose addressed to the governor a letter, (which I will not take time in reading,) detailing that the lives and safety of the members of the senate were put in jeopardy, whereupon Governor Ritner directed that the military forces of Pennsylvania attend, and, not satisfied with that, he made a call on General (then Captain) Sumner, stationed at the barracks in Carlisle, and I want to read now what Captain Sumner said in reply to that call of Governor Ritner. Here is Governor Ritner's letter:

HARRISBURGH, December 5, 1838.

SIR: An insurrection having broken out at this place, by which the regular functions of the State government have been completely interrupted and the State capital thrown into the possession of a lawless mob, to the exclusion of the Legislature, I hereby request you forthwith to march the troops at your command to Harrisburgh for the protection of the constituted authorities of the Commonwealth, for the suppression of the insurrection, and for the preservation of our republican form of government, agreeably with the Constitution of the United States.

I am, sir, &c.,

JOSEPH RITNER.

Captain SUMNER,
Of the United States Dragoons stationed at Carlisle.

To that letter Captain Sumner replied as follows:

CARLISLE BARRACKS, December 5, 1838.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date, and I hasten to reply to it. As the disturbance at the capital of this State appears to proceed from political differences alone, I do not feel that it would be proper for me to interpose my command between the parties. If this riot proceeded from any other cause, I would offer you the services of my command before you will receive this letter.

I am, sir, with high respect, your obedient servant,

E. V. SUMNER.

Captain Sumner communicated to the War Department his reply to Governor Ritner. The Secretary of War replied:

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 8, 1838.

SIR: The Department approves of your reply to the requisition of the governor of Pennsylvania. In doubtful cases similar orders must be transmitted by direction of the President of the United States; and in all cases where the seat of government is near the theater of the disturbance the necessity must be very urgent and palpable to justify an officer commanding a detached post in marching his forces to repress an insurrection without authority to do so from this Department.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. R. POINSETT.

Captain E. V. SUMNER,
Carlisle, Pennsylvania.

Then Governor Ritner wrote to the President of the United States asking his intervention. I will not take time to read his letter to the President and the President's reply. Suffice it to say that President Van Buren directed the Secretary of War, Mr. Poinsett, to inform Governor Ritner that the question, being a question between political parties, was not such as it was contemplated by the Constitution required the interference of the Federal authorities.

I will read an extract from the letter of the Secretary of War sent by direction of President Van Buren to Governor Ritner in reply to his request for Federal interference, showing what was thought at that time by a democratic administration in reference to interfering in contests between political parties in a State. The views contained in the extract which I shall read are wise and statesman-like, and if they had been observed by President Grant and his administration he would never have committed the great error of lending his aid in placing in power the usurpation in Louisiana and sustaining it over the people of that State. I will read the extract that the contrast between the action of a democratic and republican President under very similar circumstances may be seen. The Secretary of War, Mr. Poinsett, says:

The commotion which now threatens the peace of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania does not appear to arise from any opposition to the laws, but grows out of a political contest between different members of the government, most, if not all, of them admitted to be the legal representatives of the people constitutionally elected, about their relative rights and especially in reference to the organization of the popular branch of the Legislature. To interfere in any commotion growing out of a controversy of so grave and delicate a character by the Federal authority, armed by the military power of the Government, would be attended with the most dangerous consequences to our republican institutions.

Such were the views expressed by Mr. Van Buren when applied to for help by the governor of Pennsylvania. But President Grant, upon the application of a set of conspirators to overthrow and defeat the will of the people of Louisiana, interposed the military power of the Government, whereby the usurpation of Kellogg was inaugurated and has been sustained over that State.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I only want, for the credit of the State of Pennsylvania, to say a word in reply to what the Senator from Delaware has just now said.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall be glad to hear what the Senator from Pennsylvania says.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. That scene which the Senator has described was merely in the imagination and fears of good old Governor Ritner and a few people around him. There was no war in Pennsylvania. There were not a thousand people in the town outside the regular population; I do not think there were five hundred. A few persons took it into their heads that they could prevent Governor Porter from taking his seat, though he had been elected by some four or five thousand majority in the State. The whole thing was an act of that great and eccentric man Thaddeus Stevens. The election campaign preceding that December was conducted on one side entirely by Mr. Stevens, who had control of the canal funds and who risked everything upon the re-election of his patron and friend, Governor Ritner. He failed because a majority of the people were opposed to him. Mr. Penrose was one of the ablest and purest men that ever lived anywhere, but he had not quite as much pluck as the Senator from Delaware has and would have on an occasion of that kind. Somebody told him that his life was in danger, and unfortunately for himself he jumped out of the window and Thaddeus Stevens jumped over him. Both of them were a little hurt by the fall, but if they had remained there nobody would have disturbed them.

It is a good deal like the old whisky insurrection in Pennsylvania. There is a great deal said about that. That was a mere émeute out in the western part of the State, a little quarrel about whether whisky should be transported in barrels or whether the rye out of which whisky was made should be carried down the river. That was the whole of it. But this buck-shot war was a ridiculous affair from beginning to end. I am only sorry that the use of types has carried the history of it down to this time. Everybody laughed at it. I was in Harrisburgh at the time and I was rather friendly to old Ritner, but nobody disturbed me. I am sure that no man of the least courage in the world would have jumped out of the window on that occasion.

Mr. SAULSBURY. However trivial the circumstance may now appear to the Senator from Pennsylvania, it is certain that the governor of the State at the time thought it a very serious matter, for he issued his proclamation calling out the militia of the State, and wrote a second time to Captain Sumner imploring his aid; and in one of his letters to the President states that he deemed it unsafe to go to the state department. Mr. Penrose and Mr. Stevens were apprehensive evidently; and from the statements of the affair published at the time and now before me I have no hesitation in saying that there was far greater reason to apprehend riot and disturbance than existed in New Orleans on the 6th of December, 1872, or on the 4th of January last, when the President interfered in the domestic affairs of the State of Louisiana. The Senator from Pennsylvania, however, may be right in regarding the buck-shot war as only a big scare.

Mr. President, I referred to this incident for the purpose of showing the great contrast between the action of a democratic administration under circumstances very similar to what occurred in New Orleans two years ago and the action of the present Administration; and I stand here to say that after the lapse of more than thirty years the judgment of the country is that the action of the administration of President Van Buren was perfectly right. His failure to respond to the application of the governor of Pennsylvania for the purpose of giving advantage to one political party over another will be justified and commended as eminently proper and wise. I will not say what will be the judgment of posterity in reference to the action of the present Administration in using the military force of the country for the purpose of placing in power his own party in Louisiana, which had been defeated by the popular will, under the excuse, I will not say pretense, of enforcing an illegal and void order made by a Federal judge.

Sir, I would not pluck from the President one laurel which he won upon the field of battle. I would have been glad if he had transmitted his honors unimpaired by his civil life to posterity; and I exceedingly regret that in an unfortunate moment the President, from whatever motive he may have been actuated, indorsed the sending of a telegram which announced his recognition of a usurpation, a usurpation that exists to-day over Louisiana, and that was placed there and is sustained there wrongfully by Federal bayonets.

Mr. President, I shall not now go over what the Committee on Privileges and Elections said in reference to this matter. That is too familiar to the Senate to need repetition again. But I desire to call attention to what was said in debate upon the report of the committee by some Senators on this floor as showing the judgment of the Senate in regard to this usurpation at that time. Here is what Judge Trumbull said in the debate which ensued on that report, or rather upon the bill providing for an election in Louisiana which accompanied the report of Mr. Carpenter:

Sir, there never was a more monstrous case of usurpation than the setting up of this Pinchback government. The history of it is startling. And what did it do? It convened on the 9th day of December in pursuance of a proclamation issued by Governor Warmoth, the admitted governor of the State at the time, who called the Legislature together in extra session. When the day arrived these soldiers stood at the State-house door guarding it; the United States marshal was there under orders to allow nobody to take part in the Legislature except those returned by the Lynch board, who had never had an official return before them. The persons thus designated by Lynch and his associates assembled together, and claiming to be a Legislature, within the space of five hours, in violation of the statutes of Louisiana, without trial and without preferring articles, declared Governor Warmoth impeached and suspended from office, and installed Pinchback as governor in his place, and in all this they were backed up by the bayonets of the United States.

That was the language of a Senator on this floor whose history is known to the country. He was not a democrat, he was a republican, and at one time stood high in republican counsels; and yet the honest indignation of his soul gave utterance to the scathing language which I have read in condemnation of that usurpation which has been sustained for the last two years by the Federal Executive and the Administration party. Now listen to what was said by Mr. Hill, the late Senator from Georgia, a republican too:

These returns have been in the possession of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. They have undergone some examination, and taken with the testimony of persons who are familiar with them, some of whom stated that they had counted them by direction of the governor, the committee were forced to the conclusion that they disclosed the fact that McEnery was elected governor of Louisiana by five or six thousand majority, and that the general ticket known as the fusion ticket in the State had been chosen, some portions of it, to wit, the lieutenant-governor, by a larger majority than the governor himself. It is not my purpose to gloss over this election, to justify any fraud, because I think it was developed before the committee that in a few parishes there were irregularities, and that there had been advantages taken, not illegal advantages however, but advantages such as were allowed by the law, by the executive of the State in the appointment of registrars, and perhaps in the direction as to who should be appointed managers of the election by those registrars; and not only that, but that inconvenient places of voting had been created, and in some of the parishes a diminished number of polling places had been directed.

The language of the Senator meets the question of fraud. He says there was no proof that any illegal advantages were taken but only the exercise of the powers by the governor of the State with which he had been clothed by a republican Legislature which enabled him to appoint registrars, which enabled him to designate to a certain extent the places at which the election should be held. He concedes that there were some irregularities, but he says they were not illegal but such as were authorized by the law; and they have been magnified into frauds such as should vitiate an election by the Senator from Indiana and by gentlemen who support the Administration in sustaining the usurpation over Louisiana.

Now I wish to read from what was said by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN:]

While I am upon the floor I desire to say, in justification of the motion made and in justification of the taking up this proposition to consider the bill now before the Senate, that there has been a pretended government set up in the State of Louisiana by force and by fraud no man can for one moment deny. That to-day the government there exists in fraud, and in nothing else, no man who knows the facts will deny.

That is what the Senator from Illinois said in reference to that government. "That to-day the government there exists in fraud, and in nothing else, no man who knows the facts will deny."

That is very emphatic language.

That a pretense, an attempt was made to establish a different government in the same way is true. That the election was a fraud, that the whole thing was corrupt, that there was a combined effort on the part of certain men to perpetrate frauds and deprive the people of their rights and their privileges as citizens, no one can deny. That there was an organized fraud for the purpose of electing McEnery the evidence is plain and clear. That returns were forged for the purpose of accomplishing that result no man will deny.

I read that so that the views of the Senator two years ago in reference to both governments may be understood, and I call attention to the fact that he says in that debate that it cannot be denied that to-day the government there exists in fraud, in nothing else.

That there has been a pretended government set up in the State of Louisiana by force and by fraud no man will deny.

That is the government of Kellogg which it is proposed to recognize by the admission of Pinchback. Now I wish to read what was said by my friend the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. ALCORN.]

The Congress of the United States passed a law by which the district court of the United States in certain cases was entitled to assume jurisdiction in cases of election belonging to the States—State elections. Under a law like this a district judge in Louisiana assumed jurisdiction of a case in which he had no jurisdiction legally. That judge organized a Legislature in Louisiana and installed a governor in the State of Louisiana. It is not the Legislature of the people, it is not the governor of the people that to-day presides over the destinies of the people of the State of Louisiana. I am one of those who believe that if the voice of the people had been heard at the ballot-box the republican governor and the republican legislature would have been elected, and I believe if the opportunity is given the people to-day they will record their votes in favor of a republican government in that State.

I call attention to that as the opinion of the Senator from Mississippi, that the government which exists there exists not by virtue of any election but is a usurpation set up and maintained over the people of Louisiana. This discussion occurred on a bill reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections providing for a new election, and so fully satisfied were our republican friends that Kellogg's government was a usurpation and not a lawful government that a large majority of them were in favor of overthrowing it and holding another election under authority of Congress; but to-day they propose to seat Pinchback in this body as the representative of that usurpation. I could quote the language of other Senators, but it is unnecessary.

Mr. President, I might dwell upon the results which have followed this usurpation; I might speak of its effects upon the material prosperity of that State, and show that that State, one of the richest in soil, one of the best in reference to climate, possessing more natural elements of wealth and prosperity than almost any State in this Union, has been ruined and the material interests of the State destroyed by this usurpation that has been set up and maintained over the people. But why consider the destruction of material interests which the people have suffered when they have been deprived of their liberty? While they have been and are treated as serfs, while they have been and are wronged in the tenderest point, while the very liberties of that people have been taken away from them, why speak of the destruction of their material interests? What is wealth, what is prosperity even, if these could exist in Louisiana while her people are slaves and wear day by day the badges of their degradation? What though the sky be bright above them and the balmy air be freighted with the perfumes of richest flowers, the proud spirit of freemen cannot be content to wear the chains of slavery. They prize their liberty far, far above all else. Let me ask you, Senators, do you further propose to add to their humiliation and degradation by admitting to this body as a Senator from that State a man who has assisted to rob them of their rights and their liberties? Do you propose further to afflict them by declaring in the admission of Pinchback that Kellogg is their rightful master and that they must continue to be his slaves?

I might speak of the disadvantages which the people of this whole country have suffered, because I lay it down as a general proposition that the people of this country cannot be injured in any part of the country without its reflecting to some extent its influence upon the whole country. Sir, that State which was once a large customer in northern markets has been denied the ability now to come North and purchase in New York and Boston and in other commercial cities of the country; so that the very disadvantages which that people have felt are beginning to be felt in the northern section of the country. Her material interests have been blighted and the liberties of her people destroyed and the whole country is beginning to feel to a certain extent the injury which has been inflicted upon a sister State. Now we are called upon, after the great wrongs that have been perpetrated, to indorse by our action, by our recognition of that government, in granting a seat to Pinchback in this Chamber—we are called upon to give our recognition and our indorsement to—I had like to have said to connect ourselves with the conspiracy to overthrow the liberties of the people of Louisiana. I hope the Senate will not do it.

There are reasons which I have not assigned pertaining to the applicant himself; and perhaps I ought to say that he was one of the chief plotters in the treason against the liberties of the people of Louisiana; and if there were no other consideration to influence our action on this resolution, the judgment of this Senate should be what the judgment of any fair court would be, that he should not take advantage of his own wrong. You threatened to unseat and drive from this Chamber two years ago a member charged with obtaining a seat in this body by bribery and corruption; but how infinitely greater the crime of the man who aids in the subversion of the liberties of a whole people, and how infinitely less worthy of admission into this Chamber as a Senator from the State over which he has assisted to set up and perpetuate the most flagrant usurpation and tyranny.

But aside from all personal objection to the applicant I insist, what perhaps is designed to be accomplished, that the admission of Pinchback will to a certain extent be the recognition of the Kellogg usurpation, and that the character of this Senate demands that it shall never become a party to such an outrage upon public liberty. Why, Mr. President, what is there and what can there be more dear to the people of this country than the preservation of republican government in the spirit in which it was formed? Shall we be false to the trust reposed in us? Shall we by the recognition of the Kellogg usurpation in any form, directly or indirectly, put our approval upon acts which have led to that usurpation? If we do, the judgment of posterity, the judgment of the world will condemn our act.

In vain may the recognition of the usurpation by the State courts of Louisiana, owing their existence to the will of the usurper, be pleaded as authority for the recognition of the Senate. Courts have too often obeyed the behests of tyrants, even if judicial determination could rightfully influence our action in a matter over which the Senate has exclusive jurisdiction—the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. In vain may the support given to Kellogg and his government by the President be invoked as our guide. His action ought not to influence our judgment, nor, indeed, the action of any or all the co-ordinate departments of the Government. Our duty is to rebuke not approve of usurpation; to maintain the liberties of the people, the rights of the States, and our form of free government unimpaired; to maintain the Constitution of this land and secure the protection which it promises to each and every State of the Federal Union. We may not fail in this high duty at the bidding of courts or Presidents or any other power whatsoever.

We all remember a few years ago when the vandalism of the communists struck down the Column Vendôme in Paris that it sent a thrill of horror and indignation throughout the civilized world. But what is a mere creation of art compared with the system of republican government bequeathed to us by our fathers? Shall we, more ruthless than the communists of Paris, by the recognition and support of a gross usurpation, strike down the very Constitution of the country which secures to us our liberty? I hope not.

I shall record my vote not only against the resolution to seat P. B. S. Pinchback as a Senator on this floor, but against every resolution which directly or indirectly recognizes the rightful existence or the legality of the Kellogg usurpation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, I rise not for the purpose of making a speech or entering into any extended argument on this question, but to explain some of the grounds upon which I shall give my vote. It has been so long discussed that all Senators, I suppose, are now familiar with it. Not having been in the habit for the last eighteen years of oral discussion, but accustomed to express myself somewhat carefully, and being able to condense better by submitting what I have to say in writing, I have done so in this instance; and I beg the indulgence of the Senate while I proceed to read my views, promising that hereafter I shall seldom offend in that way.

The question we have before us upon the admission of Mr. Pinchback, as has already been well remarked, is not a mere partisan or political, but a legal and constitutional question, depending, however, as all legal questions do, upon the facts to which the law is to be applied.

What are these facts in the present case? It is conceded that the Legislature by whose votes he claims to have been elected, and the governor whose certificate he holds, were elected, if elected at all, in November, 1872. The Senator from Indiana, who has argued this question with his usual and acknowledged ability and adroitness, and who has placed the right of Mr. Pinchback upon the grounds upon which it must stand, if it can stand at all, in one, and, as I think, the most important—branch of his argument claims that the only fact material to the question is the certificate, in due form, from Kellogg, purporting to be the governor of Louisiana, and under the seal purporting to be the seal of that State, of Mr. Pinchback's election as Senator; that this constitutes a prima facie case, and entitles the applicant to admission as a member of this body and to be sworn in; and that if the body purporting to be the Legislature who elected him, or Kellogg, who signed his certificate, was not legally elected, and the election did not make the one a Legislature nor the other governor, these facts can only be shown after Pinchback's admission here, for the purpose of expelling him.

Where the legal existence of the Legislature purporting to make the election is conceded or not seriously questioned, and the point of contest is whether they have proceeded regularly or by a sufficient vote, or whether the person elected is eligible to the office, I concur fully in this rule, that the certificate in due form entitles the person in whose favor it is issued to his seat, subject to be expelled upon subsequent inquiry into the facts. And it is to cases of this kind that the precedents establishing the rule mainly and almost exclusively relate.

But when there is a serious doubt whether the body purporting to be the Legislature making the election, and the governor certifying it, had any existence or power to act, the question stands upon a somewhat different principle and is much more analogous to a question upon the genuineness of the papers. And in such a case, while I do not question the power of the Senate to treat the certificate as prima facie evidence for the time being, yet I think it would be much more in accordance with just, logical, and legal principles first to enter upon the inquiry whether there was in fact or in law any such Legislature having the right to make the election, or any governor entitled to give the certificate. And, certainly, there can be no good reason to doubt the right of the Senate, in its discretion, to enter upon this inquiry in the first instance, instead of waiting till after the admission, and then going over the same ground for the purpose of turning him out.

But in either case or both the classes of cases to which I allude the rule which makes the certificate prima facie evidence of the election must rest upon the presumption that things are properly and legally in their existing state until the contrary is shown; and when the contrary is shown the presumption ceases, and the prima facie case falls with it.

Here the Senate have already investigated the whole question of the existence or non-existence of the Legislature which has assumed to make the election, and of the governor who gave the certificate; and the facts upon which the question depends, whether in its de jure or de facto character, are all before us by a report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of this body, accompanied by all the evidence, consisting of eight or nine hundred pages.

This committee, in January, 1873, was directed to inquire and report whether there is any existing State government in Louisiana, and how and by whom it is constituted. This was the government, if any, (Legislature and governor,) by which the election was made and certificate given.

This evidence was taken after Mr. Pinchback's election purports to have taken place. He was present at the taking of that evidence, took part in it by suggesting and asking questions, and producing evidence; and, finally, was himself sworn and testified at length upon the very facts upon which the validity of his election depended. His right was therefore fully investigated in a proceeding to which he was virtually a party. It was in effect a proceeding in rem in which he came forward and intervened. That testimony is all before us, and has been repeatedly discussed and considered by the Senate. I am not now about to go into that evidence. I have read most of it carefully, and the rest cursorily, enough to see that the able report of the majority, presented to the Senate by Senator Carpenter, contains the fair result of the whole evidence, and draws the correct legal conclusion, that there was no legal election and no legal government; that the election, the canvass of the votes and the pretended installation of the officers claiming to be elected were equally void, both as to McEnery and his legislature and Kellogg and his legislature.

This report was drawn by no unfriendly hand, so far as the Kellogg government is concerned. It may in some slight degree extenuate, but it "sets down naught in malice." It is an able, statesmanlike and fair report, and I adopt it by reference without repeating its contents. Looking into that mass of testimony, what does it exhibit as to the nature and validity of the election, or any government claiming to rest upon it? A formless chaos of plots and counterplots, of seething passions, of inconsistencies, incongruities, and absolute nullities, with nothing real, nothing tangible, but fraud and force.

Concurring, therefore, with the conclusion of that report, that the election was utterly void, I must also hold that neither the Kellogg government nor the McEnery government can be recognized as a government de jure: and this I think ought to dispose of the question of Pinchback's right under an election resting upon the validity of that government.

I deny the right of any one to claim admission here on the ground merely of a de facto State government which is found to be without legal authority.

The effect of the judicial decisions of that State upon the question of the de jure character of that government will be considered when we come to consider the nature and origin of that government. But before proceeding to consider the de facto character of the State government, since all the evidence is before us bearing upon the question of Pinchback's right, which the majority of the committee believed showed that there was no legal government—and the majority of the Senate may draw the same conclusion—what becomes of the prima facie case, resting upon the presumption arising from the certificate? Is not the evidence now to be considered upon the merits?

For illustration, take the strong presumption in favor of innocence in a criminal case. After evidence has been introduced tending strongly to prove guilt, and from which the jury might properly find a verdict of guilty, what would be thought of the judge who should hold and instruct the jury that, no matter how strong the evidence, or whatever it might be, they must disregard it, because the law presumes innocence, and they must act upon that presumption alone, and acquit?

I now come to the question whether Kellogg and his Legislature constituted a de facto government which, by any recognition it has received, has so far grown into a legal or legitimate government that its acts in electing Pinchback have become binding upon us, so as to require or properly authorize us to admit him to a seat here.

Had Kellogg and his legislature already been in the possession of power, and in the actual exercise of the offices they claimed, and in the actual government of the State, without any act of the Federal Executive to place them in that position; then, whether this or the McEnery government was actually entitled by the election which had taken place, I can readily understand that the President might, and that it might be his duty to, recognize the government thus already in the actual exercise of power, as a de facto government, until the question of right could be properly decided, or until a proper election could be had, and that such a recognition, so far at least as the executive of that government was concerned, might very properly be followed by, whether binding or not upon, both branches of Congress.

I concede also that at the time of the senatorial election the Kellogg government (the governor and Legislature) constituted in one sense a de facto government; that is, it was in the actual possession and exercise of the governmental powers over that State. But how did it obtain the possession of this power, and who gave it this de facto character?

It did not obtain possession of the government for itself, by its own acts, nor by the acts or the will of the people of Louisiana. Left to themselves and the people of the State, it is admitted on all hands, Kellogg and his legislature could never have become a de facto government, or a government of any kind; and it is perfectly evident from the testimony, that McEnery and his legislature, which had more of the forms of regularity about it, and probably the majority of votes, though reeking with fraud, and not free from intimidation and force, would, without Federal aid, have obtained possession of the government, and constituted the government de facto, but for the interference of the Federal Executive. Kellogg and his legislature had never been in power. His legislature had not yet assembled, by whom the votes for governor were to be counted; no organization of his government had taken place when the Federal Executive interposed by military force, on the alleged authority of an order from the United States district judge, which all parties, at least all jurists and lawyers, except, perhaps, the Attorney-General, (if that constitutes an exception,) admit to have been void, and placed the Kellogg government in power, and kept it there. It was this, and this alone, which gave it inception, which placed and continued it in power, and gave it its entire and only character of a government de facto.

Having in this way only become a de facto government, the Executive could give it no additional sanction or validity by recognizing it as the de facto government, nor bind Congress, or either House of Congress, by such recognition; for it was the recognition only of his own acts, of the government he had instituted and set up, not of one which he had found in existence. The act of 1795, which has been claimed as making the acts of the Executive equivalent to the action or authority of Congress, can only have that effect, if at all, so far as his action comes within and was authorized by it: and though that act may justify the employment of the military force to put down insurrection and domestic violence, and to protect and keep in power, against insurrectionary forces, even a merely de facto government already existing, (upon which I express no opinion,) it certainly does not authorize him to create and institute a State government which had no previous or other existence in fact or law.

The logical process which can give to a subsequent recognition by the Executive, of a government thus instituted, any greater legal validity than it inherited from its origin, or make its action binding upon either House of Congress, is a process which, however valuable it may prove in more skillful hands, is of no value in my hands, and I could not use it to reach such a conclusion without cutting my own fingers. To me the whole process seems to be circular, beginning where it ends and ending where it begins; and with whatever velocity it may be made to revolve, it never moves a step forward from the point where it started. It leaves this Kellogg government, which assumed to elect a Senator in Congress, just where and what it was in its origin—not a Legislature or government of the State of Louisiana, but a body set up, installed, and kept in power and imposed upon the State by the executive department of the Federal Government, and deriving all its authority from this Executive action; and I do not myself see how the decisions of the Louisiana courts, constituting as they do only one branch of this government thus set up, can be any more binding upon us than the action of the pretended legislature, whether these judges were in office under previous existing governments, or judges had been thrust out and others put in their places for the purpose of securing the desired course of decision.

And now, Mr. President, for the purpose of testing by its results the soundness of any course of reasoning which would bind Congress or the Senate by the action of a State government thus set up and established, or any branch of such government, I will say that, if this is true of the State of Louisiana, it must be equally true of any and every other State in the Union where such a government might be thus set up and sustained; and the same course of reasoning which would authorize the setting up and sustaining such a government in Louisiana, would, as matter of law, equally authorize it in any other State under like circumstances; that is, when the candidates for governor and Legislature on two opposing tickets both claim to be elected, and neither has yet got possession of the government, and, to make the parallel entirely fair, when, in the opinion of the President, violence may be apprehended from the contest. This might occur in any State, as well at the North as in the South. Suppose it had occurred, as it might, in Michigan, at the last election, and, owing to the heated passions of the partisans on either side, and the frauds committed at the election or in canvassing the votes, a similar difficulty existed in determining which candidate for governor was elected; and while the dispute was still open, and neither candidate for governor had obtained possession of the office, a district court of the United States had assumed jurisdiction of the question in the same or any other way, to decide who was elected, and undertaken to decide upon the election of members of the legislature, and the President had sent the military to enforce this decision of the Federal court, and to place in power and sustain the candidate in whose favor the court had decided. While the people of Michigan might not object to the action of the military in preserving the lives of citizens against insurrection and violence, would they be likely to recognize the validity of the government thus imposed upon them? Would they be likely quietly to submit to it? The people of Michigan are a law-abiding people; but I know them well enough to venture the assertion that it would take several regiments of soldiers to keep them quiet under a government thus imposed, and more than all the armies of the United States to make them love or respect it.

They would see, as I know they do to-day see and feel, that the election of a State governor or a State Legislature was not to be decided, nor the State government run or prevented from running, by the fiat of a Federal court; and that even the Executive of the Federal Government had no right to decide the question for the State, or to institute or establish a State government for them.

The argument here urged in behalf of Pinchback involves this very principle, a principle which would place in the hand of the executive department of this Government the right and the power to revolutionize every State government in the Union, and bind, not only the States, but both branches of Congress to recognize that revolution. Such a principle cannot be sound. The arguments in favor of it begin in fallacy and end in absurdity.

I have not mentioned these illustrations because I think our present Executive is likely or inclined to do anything of the kind. I have not the remotest idea or suspicion that he has any such design or inclination. I believe he is just as clear from any such inclination as I am, or as any other man can be. I am merely illustrating the principle involved; and my habit in pursuing a legal or judicial investigation is to follow the truth wherever that may lead me. And though I am as well satisfied as I can be of anything which does not admit of mathematical demonstration, that the President has had no wish or intention to usurp power which does not belong to him, yet called upon, as he was, for prompt action for the suppression of apprehended violence and insurrection, and prompted by the humane motive of giving protection to the colored population, hundreds of whom had on several previous occasions been butchered in cold blood—a motive which does honor to the man, and in which I confess I sympathize with him—and without having all the evidence before him which we have before us, nor, as I think, the best legal advice, it is not strange that he should have failed to see clearly the true principle involved, and that he should have erred, as any other man, under similar circumstances, might have erred.

But looking, as I think the facts show that he did, upon the government he had set up as merely temporary, until Congress should take the matter off his hands, and doubting, as I think he did, as to the validity of the Kellogg government, he did what a wise and true-hearted statesman should have done under the circumstances; he called upon Congress to make proper provision for the case, and take such measures as they should deem proper. And he has called upon them repeatedly from that day to this; but he has called in vain, and Congress has neglected to act.

In all this I see no evidence of that deliberate usurpation or intention to establish an irresponsible despotism which has been charged, and I repel the charge as one of the extravagances of heated partisanship, which often leads men to believe what, in after years and upon due reflection, they discover to have been wild and absurd.

But here and now we are endeavoring to discover and apply the true principle which should govern the question of the admission of Mr. Pinchback as a Senator; and if we are wise we shall act upon no principle which we should not be willing to see applied to our own States; for, as in the case of individuals, no man can violate the rights of another without endangering his own, so we, as the representatives of States and their people, cannot violate the constitutional rights of another State or its people without endangering our own States and our own people.

In the mutations which are constantly taking place, and must continue to take place, in this and every other popular government, the time may come when our present positions may be reversed, and when those now in a minority may hold the power of enforcing their own views of government; and the poisoned chalice we now present to the State and people of Louisiana may be commended to our own lips. Let us, therefore, disregard all mere partisanship, and act upon the broad principle of equal justice, which is the highest statesmanship, and refuse to establish a new and, at least, a questionable principle, which may return to plague the inventors.

I have but one more point to notice. It has been gravely urged here that Louisiana, being entitled to two Senators upon this floor, it is a wrong to the people of that State to refuse them the enjoyment of that right; and therefore we ought, in order to avoid this wrong to the people of that State, to admit Mr. Pinchback. Now, according to my reading of the reports recently made to the House by both the majority and the minority of their committee, the majority of the people of Louisiana are opposed to the Kellogg government, and to Pinchback as their representative in the Senate; and they would, of course, prefer being unrepresented to being misrepresented; they are not, therefore, likely to complain of any special grievance arising from his rejection.

REPORT ON ALLUVIAL BASIN OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. ALCORN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five thousand copies of the report of the commission of engineers appointed in compliance with the act of Congress approved June 22, 1874, to investigate and report a permanent plan for the reclamation of the alluvial basin of the Mississippi River subject to inundation, be printed for the use of the Committee on the Levees of the Mississippi River.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. RANSOM, on his own motion, was excused from further service as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GORDON, on his own motion, was excused from further service as a member of the Committee on Commerce.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the vacancies be filled by the Vice-President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. RANSOM to fill the vacancy upon the Committee on Commerce, and Mr. GORDON to fill the vacancy upon the Committee on Military Affairs, each Senator to occupy the relative position on the committee which was held before the vacancy occurred.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at three o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 13, 1875.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. MORTON on the 5th instant:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback be admitted as a Senator from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years, beginning the 4th day of March, 1873.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the resolution by inserting the word "not" before "admitted." If it is amended in that way I think I can vote for it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I believe the understanding was that we were not to vote to-day, so that I hope the Chair will not put the question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair awaits a motion.

Mr. THURMAN. I had no expectation of making a speech this morning; but upon this question of Pinchback I think each of the old Senators here might adopt for his motto semper paratus. We have heard the thing discussed up hill and down hill, and in every other way or direction in which a man can go or look. As there seems to be no one ready to proceed, I will say a few words by way of taking my farewell leave of the subject.

The chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, [Mr. MORTON,] in the elaborate speech by which he supported the resolution he offered, and which was in effect the same speech made by him at previous sessions of the Senate, laid down three propositions upon which his conclusion is based. The first proposition was that Pinchback's credentials make a prima facie case and entitle him to his seat until ousted on an investigation. The second proposition was that the Senate is bound by the decisions of the supreme court of Louisiana recognizing Kellogg as governor and the body that elected Pinchback as the Legislature. His third proposition was that the Senate is bound by the President's recognition of Kellogg as governor and said body of men as the Legislature until Congress shall reverse or overthrow that recognition.

I propose to say something upon each of these propositions, and as briefly as I can. In support of the first proposition, that Pinchback's credentials make a prima facie case, entitling him to be seated until ousted upon an investigation, the Senator from Indiana speaks of the usage of the Senate and quotes the remarks of various Senators, and among others some remarks made by myself when Goldthwaite's case was before the Senate. Those remarks were these:

Mr. THURMAN. The Committee on Privileges and Elections, in accordance with the universal practice of this body from the foundation of the Government to this day—a practice that has not a single exception—reported that the credentials of this gentleman being correct, and he having been elected by a body competent to elect, he is prima facie entitled to his seat and to be sworn in.

When I said that I was speaking of a case like Goldthwaite's. I was not speaking of a case entirely different from Goldthwaite's. I was speaking of a case in which there was no question of the competency of the person elected to hold a seat in this body, no question as to the body of men by whom he was elected being the Legislature of his State, no question as to the right of the person who gave his certificate to be the governor of that State. It was therefore a case in which there was but one governor, there was but one Legislature, and there was no question as to the title of the governor or the title of the Legislature, and as to the individual himself no question whatsoever but that he was qualified under the Constitution of the United States to hold his seat, and no question further that he was elected at the proper time and that he was elected in the manner required by the Constitution and by the laws. In respect to cases of that sort I said that the usage of the Senate was without exception to seat the member and hear the contest afterward.

It is possible that I made the statement too broadly, although I am not satisfied yet that I did. It might seem that the case of Thomas, of Maryland, was an exception to the generality of the rule which I then stated, for Thomas was not allowed to take his seat although he was elected by the undoubted Legislature of Maryland at the proper time and commissioned by the proper executive. But that was a peculiar case. Thomas was not allowed to take his seat upon the ground that he could not truthfully take the oath of office. It was upon that sole and distinct ground that he could not truthfully take the oath of office. I have always thought, and I think the Senate if it had to decide the matter now would say that that decision was erroneous; but at all events the Senate saw fit to go into the investigation and determined that, inasmuch as in the opinion of the Senate the acts with which he was charged amounted to aiding and abetting the enemy, therefore, according to the true intent and meaning of the iron-clad oath as construed by a majority of the Senate, whatever Mr. Thomas might think of his own conduct, however little he might think that that was aiding and abetting the enemy, the Senate decided for him that the acts of which he was confessedly guilty—if that term can be applied to them—were aiding and abetting the enemy and that therefore he could not take the oath of office; and hence he was excluded.

But it is immaterial to consider whether I made the statement too broad or not. I can stand upon it precisely as I made it; but it has no application to this case. I said:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, in accordance with the universal practice of this body from the foundation of the Government to this day, a practice that has not a single exception, reported that the credentials of this gentleman being correct, and he having been elected by a body competent to elect, he was prima facie entitled to his seat and to be sworn in.

Mr. President, how different is this case! Here it is begging the very question to say that Pinchback was elected by a body competent to elect.

Mr. MORTON. The part the Senator now read was in a subsequent part of the debate; it is not a part of the speech I quoted. It was upon the report being made by the committee of which the Senator was a member at that time.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know whether it is from the same part or not, but this is the statement I made.

Mr. MORTON. That is in a subsequent speech.

Mr. THURMAN. It does not matter whether I made it one day or another day. That was my position. The vice of the argument of the Senator from Indiana is that it begs the question. It assumes that Kellogg is governer, and that therefore Pinchback's credentials are prima facie evidence. It assumes that the Legislature that elected Pinchback was the true Legislature. Both of these are assumptions which the Senator has no right to make; and therefore this case is not at all in the same category with the case of Goldthwaite or those of which I spoke. The Senate, however, as has been shown, has repeatedly kept Senators out, and especially it kept Goldthwaite out for a year and it kept Ransom out for a long time, I think for nearly a year.

Mr. MORTON. My friend will allow me to suggest right there that the Ransom case was referred to by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.] I ask him if he refers to that as a case in point?

Mr. THURMAN. Ransom was kept out. Why was he not seated?

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to state that in the Ransom case there had been a previous election of Vance, and the question was whether there was a vacancy. It was conceded that Ransom's credentials showed his election and prima facie entitled him to a seat; but the fact of his credentials being in proper form did not determine the question whether there was a vacancy. Vance had before been duly elected, but Vance was ineligible under the fourteenth amendment, and he never presented his credentials to this body and never came here; but that fact of his election was known, and when Ransom came here with his credentials, it was urged that there was no vacancy for him to fill. It was never pretended that the credentials being properly signed would determine the question of a vacancy. That is an entirely different question. It was admitted that the credentials determined the question of election provided there was a vacancy; and after a long consideration it was determined that there was a vacancy, Vance never having presented his credentials and being confessedly ineligible under the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not see how that alters the case in the slightest degree. There was a vacancy from North Carolina at one time or another, and the question was, is Ransom elected to fill that vacancy, or is Abbott elected to fill it? It was a question therefore of contest between those two persons. One had the commission, the other had none; and upon the theory of the Senator from Indiana Ransom should have been seated. But I do not care about that, for I do not want to speak on these questions. In fact it will be found that in numerous cases where there was more than one claimant the Senate has refused to seat either until an investigation. Such was the case of Hill and Blodgett and of Miller and Farrow. Hill claimed a seat as Senator from Georgia; so did Blodgett. Miller claimed a seat as Senator from Georgia; so did Farrow. Here were two claimants to the same seat in each of those cases. So in the case of Spencer vs. Sykes, Spencer was not seated at first.

Mr. MORTON. He was seated within two weeks.

Mr. THURMAN. It does not matter. We had no right to exclude him, according to the Senator's argument two minutes.

Mr. MORTON. He was admitted. The Senate kept right on and determined the question in less than ten days, and he was seated expressly on the ground that he had a prima facie case.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator wants to make his speech over again in the midst of mine I have no particular objection; but the truth about it is that, so far as the law is concerned, so far as the legal principle is concerned, his exclusion for two minutes was as good as his exclusion for two years. You had no right to exclude him for two seconds if the Senator's doctrine is correct.

Mr. MORTON. We had not.

Mr. THURMAN. And then here is Pinchback himself; and you have kept him out for two years, although you say he had a prima facie case; and the Senator from Indiana himself, after he made his first report, had it sent back to his committee to investigate Pinchback and find out whether he was rightfully elected. But that is not all.

A conclusive answer to the Senator's position about a prima facie case is that the Senate has not seen fit to seat Pinchback on a prima facie case, but has seen fit to take the other course and have an investigation; and the moment you have an investigation and have the facts before you, all questions of prima facies vanish at once. When you have the evidence before you, then you are compelled to decide upon the merits, in every court and in every legislative body. It is useless to talk now about prima facies after the Committee on Privileges and Elections have investigated this matter for months, have laid before us a body of testimony amounting to a thousand or more pages, have reported their conclusions upon that testimony, every member of the committee giving his conclusions. After all this, it will not do to say that it is a question of prima facies any more. It is a question now upon the merits. Why, how absurd would it be to seat Pinchback upon what is called a prima facie case, and then upon the very evidence which we have before us to turn him out of his seat the next day if a majority of the Senate believed that upon that evidence he was not entitled. And yet that is what the proposition of the Senator from Indiana would come to. No, sir; that will not do.

But in the next place, as I have said before, the proposition begs the question; it assumes that Kellogg was governor when he signed the credentials. We have a right to consider that question; we must consider it. If Kellogg was undoubtedly the governor at the time he signed those credentials, then there might be some foundation for the argument of the Senator in case there was nothing else before us than the credentials; but, the whole case being before us, we are bound to decide whether Kellogg was the governor; and if we find that he was not, then his commission goes for nothing at all. And if we decide that he was then the governor, that still does not settle it, because the question still comes before us, was the body of men by whom Pinchback was elected the lawful Legislature of the State of Louisiana? So that two things have to be established here; first, that this man was elected by a lawful body constituting the true Legislature of Louisiana; and, secondly, that he has the commission of the executive of that State. If he has not that commission, then he is not entitled upon it, however much he might be entitled if the evidence in the case showed that he was elected by the lawful Legislature of that State.

Now, was Kellogg then governor of that State? At the risk of being a little tedious, I shall refer to the finding of your committee, and I do not deem it necessary to refer to more than this finding, although it has been referred to so often. On pages 43 and 44 of the report your Committee on Privileges and Elections say:

Indeed, it is impossible not to see that this bill was filed—

That is, the Antoine bill—and the restraining order thereon was issued for the sole purpose of accomplishing what no Federal court has the jurisdiction to do, the organization of a State Legislature—

This Legislature by which Pinchback was elected—

And your committee cannot refrain from expressing their astonishment that any judge of the United States should thus unwarrantably have interfered with a State government, and know no language too strong to express their condemnation of such a proceeding.

It is the opinion of your committee that but for the unjustifiable interference of Judge Durell, whose orders were executed by United States troops, the canvass made by the De Feriet board, and promulgated by the governor, declaring McEnery to have been elected governor, &c., and also declaring who had been elected to the Legislature, would have been acquiesced in by the people, and that government would have entered quietly upon the exercise of the sovereign power of the State. But the proceedings of Judge Durell, and the support given to him by United States troops, resulted in establishing the authority de facto of Kellogg and his associates in State offices, and of the persons declared by the Lynch board to be elected to the Legislature. We have already seen that the proceedings of that board cannot be sustained without disregarding all the principles of law applicable to the subject, and ignoring the distinction between good faith and fraud.

Your committee are, therefore, led to the conclusion that, if the election held in November, 1872, be not absolutely void for frauds committed therein, McEnery and his associates in State offices, and the persons certified as members of the Legislature by the De Feriet board, ought to be recognized as the legal government of the State. Considering all the facts established before your committee, there seems no escape from the alternative that the McEnery government must be recognized by Congress, or Congress must provide for a re-election.

Nothing can be clearer or more positive than that your committee found that either there was no valid election at all, or if there was a valid election that McEnery and his associates were elected and the members returned by the De Feriet board were elected to the Legislature. They find the issue fairly and squarely against Kellogg, and fairly and squarely against the body of men calling themselves the Legislature that assumed to elect Pinchback. There is no equivocation about this finding; there is no double sense about it; and there is no way of construing it but one way, and that is a clear and distinct finding that McEnery and his associates were elected to the executive offices, and that the McEnery legislature was the true Legislature elected, or that there was no election at all, and consequently that Kellogg never was elected and that the body calling themselves the Legislature who assumed to elect Pinchback never were elected and never were the Legislature; so that the evidence completely overthrows the assumption of the Senator from Indiana that Kellogg was governor and that the body of men calling themselves the Legislature that elected Pinchback were the Legislature.

I need not go into the matter of the canvass of the Lynch board at any length. The committee have saved me all that trouble; and yet as there are some Senators who perhaps have not had their attention called to it, I beg leave to read a little from the finding of the committee on that subject.

On the 6th of December, 1872, the Lynch board—Bovee, (who was then acting as secretary of state in place of Herron,) Lynch, Longstreet, and Hawkins—pretended to have canvassed the returns of the election, and certified to the secretary of state that Kellogg had been elected governor; Antoine, lieutenant-governor; Clinton, auditor, Field, attorney-general; Brown, superintendent of education; and Deslondes, secretary of state; and also certified to a list of persons whom they had determined to be elected to the Legislature.

There is nothing in all the comedy of blunders and frauds under consideration more indefensible than the pretended canvass of this board. The following are some of the objections to the validity of their proceedings:

1. The board had been abolished by the act of November 20.

2. The board was under valid and existing injunctions restraining it from acting at all, and an injunction in the Armstead case restraining it from making any canvass not based upon the official returns of the election.

3. Conceding the board was in existence, and had full authority to canvass the returns, it had no returns to canvass.

The returns from the parishes had been made, under the law of 1870, to the governor, and not one of them was before the Lynch board.

It was testified before your committee by Mr. Bovee himself, who participated in this canvass by the Lynch board, that they were determined to have a republican Legislature, and made their canvass to that end. The testimony abundantly establishes the fraudulent character of their canvass. In some cases they had what were supposed to be copies of the original returns, in other cases they had nothing but newspaper statements, and in other cases, where they had nothing whatever to act upon, they made an estimate based upon their knowledge of the political complexion of the parish of what the vote ought to have been. They also counted a large number of affidavits purporting to be sworn to by voters who had been wrongfully denied registration or the right to vote, many of which affidavits they must have known to be forgeries. It was testified by one witness that he forged over a thousand affidavits and delivered them to the Lynch board while it was in session. It is quite unnecessary to waste time in considering this part of the case, for no person can examine the testimony ever so cursorily without seeing that this pretended canvass had no semblance of integrity.

Now, Mr. President, nothing that I can say can add force to that finding of your committee. There are other parts of this report in which the question is argued and in which it is perfectly demonstrated that the Lynch board had not one shadow of legal existence, and the board itself admitted that it had not one single official return before it, but it determined to count in a republican majority to that Legislature. So Bovee swore before your committee. And in order to do it the men composing it took newspaper reports of the election; and where they had not even such authority as that they took their own personal knowledge of what they thought were the politics of the parishes and returned a vote according to the personal knowledge of what were the politics of the parishes wholly irrespective of whether there had been any voting in the parishes or not; and finally to eke it out they counted as votes, without any authority of law whatsoever, thousands of affidavits most of which were plain and flagrant forgeries, and known to that board to be such. And yet, sir, it is upon the returns made by that board that it was claimed that Kellogg had a right to be governor and that the men sitting in the body that elected Pinchback were duly elected members of the General Assembly of that State. Here then was a board that had no lawful existence, a board that had no lawful returns, a board that avowedly determined to count in the republicans no matter whether they were elected or not, and that in order to count them in counted thousands of forged affidavits and made returns from parishes upon their own knowledge of what were the politics of the parishes without any regard to the votes at all. Sir, nothing more need be said about that.

It was the list of men certified by that Lynch board—or not all of them, for they had to certify some conservatives—but it was the list of republican men certified by that Lynch board that elected Pinchback. How came they to get possession of the State-house? How came they to get any apparent authority to act? This report finds all the facts. It was by the orders of Durell that they were enabled to do it. In the first place, upon Kellogg's bill, which was a simple injunction bill, Durell undertook to restrain what was called the Warmoth board from counting the votes at all. But that did not succeed. The governor signed an act of the Legislature on the 20th of November, 1872, under which the De Feriet board was appointed. It was necessary then to do something else, and thereupon Antoine filed his bill in Durell's court; Antoine having no more right to ask the intervention of the Federal court to determine the question of who were members of the Legislature than you or I had, sir, and that court having no more jurisdiction over that question than you or I had. Yet, that bill being filed, Durell made that famous midnight order out of court, not sitting as a court, without the parties before him, under which in less than two hours the State-house was seized by the Army of the United States, and, according to the terms and meaning of that order, not a man was allowed to go in there and take a seat in that Legislature unless he was returned by the fraudulent Lynch board. That all appears before us. How can you call that a Legislature? How is it possible to call that a Legislature? Why, sir, what did your own committee find in regard to these orders of Durell? The committee say on page 17 of the report:

It is impossible to conceive of a more irregular, illegal, and in every way inexcusable act on the part of a judge. Conceding the power of the court—

That is, only conceding for the question, not as an actual fact—

Conceding the power of the court to make such an order, the judge, out of court, had no more authority to make it than had the marshal. It has not even the form of judicial process. It was not sealed, nor was it signed by the clerk, and had no more legal effect than an order issued by any private citizen.

There had been no amendment of the bill of complaint. The law of November 20 had been promulgated. The De Feriet board had been appointed in pretended pursuance thereof. Whether, under the constitution, the governor had the power, in the vacation of the Legislature, to appoint that board, upon the ground that the act of November 20 created offices, and therefore vacancies in office, your committee do not inquire. But it is understood that the constitution has been so construed in that State, and that Judge Dibble was appointed by the governor under similar circumstances.

The De Feriet board, therefore, had color of official existence. Their canvass was completed, and the result promulgated under color of the State law, and it is clear that this gave the Federal court no more right to seize the State-house than to seize this Capitol.

The De Feriet board, a board which had color of legal right and which according to the interpretation placed upon the constitution of Louisiana in Judge Dibble's case was a lawful board, had made its list, and that list had been promulgated according to the laws of Louisiana, and that list showed that the McEnery legislature was the true Legislature, that the conservatives who sat in what was called the McEnery legislature were the men who were elected, and that those republicans who sat in the Kellogg legislature under the count of the Lynch board were not the true men; some of them of course were correctly returned, but the men who claimed seats there against the conservatives and were given those seats by the Lynch board were not elected. All that appeared by the return of the De Feriet board. And yet, sir, under this order made at twelve o'clock at night not one of those men of the conservatives thus reported to be elected by the only board that had color of legal existence was permitted to enter that State-house unless he was also upon the return made by the Lynch board. The committee go on to say:

The marshal, on receiving this pretended order, called for a detachment of United States troops to act as a posse comitatus, seized the State-house at two a. m. of December 6, and held it for weeks.

Held it until the usurpation was completed. But, sir, that is not all that is said of these orders. On page 27 the committee say:

Viewed in any light in which your committee can consider them, the orders and injunctions made and granted by Judge Durell in this cause are most reprehensible, erroneous in point of law, and are wholly void for want of jurisdiction; and your committee must express their sorrow and humiliation that a judge of the United States should have proceeded in such flagrant disregard of his duty, and have so far overstepped the limits of Federal jurisdiction.

That is the finding of your committee upon these orders. What said Senator Trumbull, one of the committee, upon the subject? I will read that presently; but first what said the Senator from Indiana, the chairman of the committee, in regard to these orders of Durell? The Senator from Indiana said in his report:

The conduct of Judge Durell, sitting in the circuit court of the United States, cannot be justified nor defended. He grossly exceeded his jurisdiction, and assumed the exercise of powers to which he could lay no claim. * * *

But the pretense that in a suit to perpetuate testimony the court could go beyond the natural and reasonable jurisdiction, to decide who constituted the legal returning board under the laws of Louisiana, and to enforce the rights of such as it might determine to be members of that board and to enjoin others who were not, is without any foundation in law or logic.

That is what the Senator from Indiana said about that decision of Judge Durell. He went on further to say:

In the Antoine case Judge Durell not only assumed to determine who constituted the legal returning board, but to prescribe who should be permitted to take part in the organization of the Legislature and to enjoin all persons from taking part in such organization who were not returned by the Lynch board as elected; and this assumption of jurisdiction was made in the face of the express provision in the act of 1870 that its benefits should not extend to candidates for electors, for Congress, or for the State Legislature. His order issued in the Kellogg case to the United States marshal to take possession of the State-house for the purpose of preventing unlawful assemblages, under which the marshal called to his aid a portion of the Army of the United States as a posse comitatus, can only be characterized as a gross usurpation.

That is what the Senator from Indiana said upon this subject as chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections; and yet, sir, it was the men who were put in that State-house by this gross usurpation of this judge thus denounced by the Senator, it was the men whom this judge determined without any right were members of the Legislature of Louisiana and who were seated there by the Federal Army who constituted that body which assumed to be the Legislature and elected Pinchback whose right to sit here the Senator now defends.

Mr. MORTON. I take it for granted the Senator does not intend to misrepresent me.

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly not.

Mr. MORTON. If not, then he will read in connection what I there said about the effect of Durell's action, or if the Senator will permit me I will read the extract.

Mr. THURMAN. I have no objection although it is prolonging my speech. This idea of sticking one speech into another I do not think is proper; but I will not object.

Mr. MORTON. I go on to say:

But conceding all the facts in regard to Judge Durell, the question arises how they affect the legal rights of the parties and the actual status of the Kellogg government. The Lynch returning board has been decided by the supreme court of the State to be the legal one, and the other boards, known as the Wharton, the De Feriet, and the Forman boards, to have been without any authority whatever. Has the legal character of that board been impaired or vitiated by the illegal interference of Judge Durell? Conceding that interference to have been in every way wrongful, would it have the effect to vitiate the title of the Lynch returning board as determined by the supreme court of the State? I think not. A title which the highest legal tribunal has declared to be good is not impaired by unlawful interference, even by violence in its support. And the case stands thus: that the circuit court of the United States has unlawfully interfered to do certain things which the highest tribunal of the State decides to be lawful and proper in themselves. The supreme court of the State having held that the Legislature was the lawful one which was organized by the admission of such persons only as were returned by the Lynch board as elected members, is the legality of that organization affected by the fact that the circuit court of the United States interfered to prevent the organization of a Legislature by persons who were not returned as elected by the Lynch board? If an officer in the performance of his duty were aided by a mob, the performance would not be made illegal by the presence and co-operation of an unlawful assemblage.

That is my answer.

Mr. THURMAN. Now the Senator has only anticipated my argument when I shall come to consider the effect of these decisions of the supreme court of Louisiana. I was not on that point when the Senator interrupted me; I was on the question whether or not we had a prima facie case here, and showing that we could not have a prima facie case unless Kellogg was the governor and unless the body that elected Pinchback was the Legislature; and in showing that I very properly called attention to the universal condemnation by the committee, every member of it, including the Senator himself, of those acts which resulted in organizing the body of men who assumed to elect Pinchback. Whether the decisions of the supreme court of Louisiana settle this question is another inquiry, and to that I am now ready to address myself.

The Senator made that same argument before; he has made it I do not know how many times; he made it to his committee; it is in his minority report. And now, first, what did the committee itself, the majority of the committee, answer to that argument of the Senator from Indiana—indeed, every member of the committee but the Senator himself? What did they say in reference to this very point which he now makes? I have something to add to what they said, but first let us see what they said. On the question of the effect of the decision of the supreme court of Louisiana the committee say:

But it has been claimed before your committee that a decision of the supreme court of Louisiana, rendered since this investigation commenced, has determined that the Lynch board was the legal returning board at the time it pretended to canvass the votes, and it is urged that a wholesome regard for the rights of the State precludes the Senate from investigating this subject back of that decision; that the canvassers were a board of officers created by the State law; and that the decision of the supreme court having determined that the Lynch board was the legal board, the United States is estopped by that decision and the canvass made by that board. To this there are three answers:

First. The supreme court, in the case referred to, is understood not to have had any testimony before it showing the character of the proceedings by the Lynch board, which testimony is before your committee very fully. Fraud vitiates everything, and it is certain that no court, upon the testimony before your committee, could hold the canvass by that board to be valid.

Second. In the opinion of your committee the supreme court had no jurisdiction of the case in which they made the decision. The judgments of every court, the most exalted in character, are absolutely void if rendered without jurisdiction. But this point will be considered more fully hereafter.

Third. But for the interference of Judge Durell in the matter of this State election, a matter wholly beyond his jurisdiction, the McEnery government would to-day have been the de facto government of the State. Judge Durell interposed the Army of the United States between the people of Louisiana and the only government which has the semblance of regularity, and the result of this has been to establish the Kellogg government, so far as that State now has any government. For the United States to interfere in a State election, and by the employment of troops set up a governor and Legislature without a shadow of right, and then to refuse redress of the wrong, upon the ground that to grant relief would be interfering with the rights of the State, is a proposition difficult to utter with a grave countenance.

What does your committee find? First, that the supreme court of Louisiana had no jurisdiction of the question; that the opinion expressed was a simple obiter dictum, which bound nobody; and, in the second place and very truly, that the Senate of the United States could not be bound by any judicial decision of that State upon the subject. What is the reason why the decision of the State court cannot bind the Senate? First, because the Senate is the sole and exclusive judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own members, and that includes jurisdiction to decide every question, I do not care what it is.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me to ask a question?

Mr. THURMAN. I would rather the Senator would not interrupt me right in the midst of a proposition.

Mr. MORTON. Before he leaves that point.

Mr. THURMAN. I say that gives us jurisdiction to decide every question upon which our determination depends; and we cannot surrender that power. We cannot surrender any power that the Constitution confers upon us. Now, we being the sole and exclusive judges of this question, are we bound by the decision of any other tribunal, however exalted? No, sir; and for the simple reason that no court is bound by the decision of any other court unless the latter court can reverse the decision of the former. The decision of one court may be a precedent in another court, but it is not authority unless the court that renders that decision has power to reverse the decision of the court whose opinion is in question. Let me give an illustration. Upon a question arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are binding upon the judiciary, whether Federal or State, throughout the whole length and breadth of this land. Why so? Why are those decisions authority—mark the word, "authority"—in every inferior court in this land, be it Federal or be it State? Because the question can be carried to the Supreme Court of the United States and the decision of the State court or of the inferior Federal court can be affirmed or reversed, and that makes the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States authority.

But take a question not arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States—take an ordinary commercial question which has nothing to do with the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States; no State court considers itself bound by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. There is not a State court in all this Union that would consider itself bound by any such decision. It will respect it as a precedent; it will consider the opinion of that high tribunal entitled to great weight; but if its own opinion is adverse, it will hold to its own opinion and make a contrary decision. The books are full of such cases. This has been carried so far that where an inferior court has sole jurisdiction in divorce cases, a decision by the supreme court of the same State upon the interpretation of the divorce statute was not held binding in the inferior court upon the question of granting a divorce or not, for the reason that the decision of the inferior court could not be reversed in the superior court. Applying this well-known principle, known to every man who ever sat on the bench, known to every lawyer who ever practiced at the bar, it is in the nature of things impossible that there can be any judicial tribunal in this country whose decisions are binding upon us when considering the question of the election, qualification, and return of our own members. Those decisions may be entitled to great respect; they have what has been called persuasive power; they are entitled to weight—not in this case, for these decisions are entitled to no respect at all, as I could show if I were to go into the matter; but the decisions of courts usually are entitled to respect and to have a persuasive power though they may not bind as authority. But so far as binding us is concerned, all the courts in this world cannot bind us upon this question; and when I say "cannot bind us," I do not mean that we have the brute power to vote "nay" or to vote "yea" in this Chamber, but I say, speaking as a constitutional lawyer, there is no tribunal under heaven that has any authority over us or can bind us upon any question when we are deciding upon the elections, qualifications, and returns of our own members.

Mr. MORTON. Let me ask this question: Whether the Supreme Court of the United States have not decided in many cases that they will follow the decision of the supreme court of the State upon all questions arising under the constitution and laws of that State and not involving any question arising under the laws or Constitution of the United States? If the question arises under the laws or Constitution of the United States, then the Supreme Court of the United States will not follow the decision of the court of the State, but will lay down the law for itself; but if it arises entirely under the law of the State or the constitution of the State, then the Supreme Court of the United States in all cases follows the decision of the supreme court of the State.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator has been so long from the bar that he has got very rusty, prodigiously rusty, [laughter,] or he never would make any such bold assertion as that. I can show him case after case, and case after case down I believe to the last term of the Supreme Court of the United States, in which they have refused to follow the decision of the highest court of the State. What did they do in the Bank case from my own State, a case of the first importance? There the supreme court of the State of Ohio had unanimously decided that under the constitution and laws of the State of Ohio the General Assembly had a right to levy a tax upon the banks beyond that tax on their dividends specified in the charter. What did the Supreme Court of the United States say to that decision? They said "we will not be bound by that decision;" they said "there was a decision many years ago, a decision before these banks had an existence, which was the other way, and we will follow this latter decision; but we will decide this question for ourselves." What did they say in the case of Gelpcke vs. The City of Dubuque only a few years ago, in which the supreme court of Iowa had decided unanimously I believe—at all events had decided, and that is sufficient——

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me right there?

Mr. THURMAN. Really this is too much!

Mr. MORTON. I take it for granted my friend intends to be correct.

Mr. THURMAN. There is this objection: I have a mode of arguing a case right squarely to the point, and the Senator from Indiana has a way of diverting attention to matters that in my judgment have nothing to do with the case.

Mr. MORTON. That assumption is unfounded; but I want to make this statement. I ask the Senator how the Supreme Court of the United States can get jurisdiction of any case from a State unless it involves some question arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States?

Mr. THURMAN. Now the Senator is showing that he is more ignorant than I supposed he was. [Laughter.] If the Senator from Indiana sees fit to bring a suit against me in the circuit court of the United States in the State of Ohio on a promissory note he can do it, and that case can come to the Supreme Court of the United States, and there is no question about the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States in it.

No, Mr. President, this will not do. The Senator cited the case of Luther vs. Borden, which is a case directly against him, for what said the court in Luther vs. Borden?

Indeed, we do not see how the question could be tried and judicially decided in a State court.

That is what the court said there, and it goes on to say:

Judicial power presupposes an established government capable of enacting laws and enforcing their execution, and of appointing judges to expound and administer them. The acceptance of the judicial office is a recognition of the authority of the government from which it is derived. And if the authority of that government is annulled and overthrown, the power of its courts and other officers is annulled with it. And if a State court should enter upon the inquiry proposed in this case, and should come to the conclusion that the government under which it acted had been put aside and displaced by an opposing government, it would cease to be a court, and be incapable of pronouncing a judicial decision upon the question it undertook to try. If it decides at all as a court, it necessarily affirms the existence and authority of the government under which it is exercising judicial power. (7 Howard, 40.)

Now apply that to the decision of this judge, Hawkins. He was on that Lynch board. The so-called Pinchback legislature, which rewarded every single man on the Lynch board with a lucrative office, abolished a court and created another with the sole jurisdiction to try contested-election cases, and put this very man Hawkins, one of the infamous Lynch board, on the bench of that court, deriving his authority from a so-called law passed by that so-called Legislature, and a commission of that so-called governor, William Pitt Kellogg. If he had decided that Kellogg was not the governor, that that body of men was not the Legislature, that very decision would decide that he was no judge. It is the very case put by Chief Justice Taney in the case of Luther vs. Borden, and to cite such a decision as that, to cite the decisions of a State court under such circumstances and say they are binding upon the Senate of the United States in the exercise of its sole jurisdiction to decide this question, is really trifling with reason and ignoring law.

Mr. BAYARD. Will my friend call attention to what Mr. Trumbull said about this judge, Hawkins?

Mr. THURMAN. I will thank my friend to read what was said by Mr. Trumbull on this same subject.

Mr. BAYARD. It is as follows, from Mr. Trumbull's report:

In view of the facts as shown to exist in Louisiana, the decisions of its courts in favor of the validity of the Pinchback legislature are entitled to no respect whatever. As has been already shown, that Legislature was not elected nor brought into being by the people of the State, but owes its existence to the void proceedings of the United States court supported by military force. It was the creature of force and fraud. Its first act was to impeach and suspend the governor (Warmoth) and install Pinchback in his place. It then abolished one court and set up another in its place, and Pinchback appointed Hawkins, one of the Lynch returning board, judge of the newly-established court. To give any consideration to the decisions of a court thus set up would be to aid the usurpation. Hawkins counts in spurious members of the Legislature; that Legislature makes a governor, who makes Hawkins judge; and Hawkins then decides the Legislature to be legal.

Mr. THURMAN. I had marked that place to be read. I will ask the Clerk to read the whole paragraph of what Judge Trumbull said on this subject. I send it to the Chair. Before the Clerk reads it, I wish to say one word more in regard to Luther vs. Borden.

Mr. MORTON. Has the Senator the seventh volume of Howard's Reports at his desk?

Mr. THURMAN. I have not.

Mr. MORTON. It is not in the library.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know who has it. I read not from 7 Howard but from an extract from the decision given in the speech of Mr. Carpenter, where the same passage referred to in the report is quoted. The question what is the government of a State is a political question, and the Supreme Court has held that it cannot decide a political question but must follow the political department of the Government. Consequently it follows that, being a political question, it is not settled by judicial decision. I have already read what Chief Justice Taney said in respect to the decisions of the State courts. I read now what he further said on the subject of its being a political question:

But the courts uniformly held that the inquiry proposed to be made belonged to the political power, and not to the judicial; that it rested within the political power to decide whether the charter government had been displaced or not; and when that decision was made, the judicial department would be bound to take notice of it as the paramount law of the State, without the aid of oral evidence or the examination of witnesses; that, according to the laws and institutions of Rhode Island, no change had been recognized by the political power; and that the charter government was the lawful and established government of the State during the period in contest, and that those who were in arms against it were insurgents and liable to punishment. This doctrine is clearly and forcibly stated in the opinion of the supreme court of the State in the trial of Thomas W. Dorr, who was the governor elected under the opposing constitution, and headed the armed force which endeavored to maintain its authority.

Indeed, we do not see how the question could be tried and judicially decided in a State court. (7 Howard, 39.)

That is what Chief Justice Taney said; delivering the opinion of the court in the case of Luther vs. Borden, that the political power of the State of Rhode Island had recognized that government to be the true and valid government which prosecuted Dorr, and that Dorr's government was not the true government of that State. It was that decision of the political power of the State of Rhode Island which the Supreme Court said was conclusive so far as that State was concerned, and the recognition by the political power of the United States was conclusive so far as the United States were concerned. Now I ask the Clerk to read the opinion of Judge Trumbull on this question from his report made in 1873.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The history of the world does not furnish a more palpable instance of usurpation than that by which Pinchback was made governor and the persons returned by the Lynch board the Legislature of Louisiana; nor can a parallel be found for the unfeeling and despotic answers sent by order of the President to the respectful appeals of the people of Louisiana. This pretended Legislature, installed in power by the aid of the United States Army, in pursuance of a void order of a United States district judge, proceeded to elect John Ray to represent the State of Louisiana in the Senate of the United States; and it is said the Senate must receive him because the supreme court of Louisiana has decided the Pinchback legislature to be the rightful Legislature of the State, and that the Senate is bound to follow the decision of the State court as to what constitutes its Legislature.

It is true, as a rule, that the Federal courts follow the decisions of the State courts in regard to the construction of their own constitution and laws; but it is not true that the legislative department of the Government follows the decisions of the courts upon political questions. The inquiry what is the established government in a State belongs to the political and not the judicial power. The Senate, by the Constitution, is made the sole and only judge of the election of its members, who can only be chosen by the Legislatures of the respective States. Ordinarily the body recognized in a State as its Legislature would be held by the Senate to be the body authorized to elect a Senator; but when, as is the case in Louisiana, there are two bodies in a State, each claiming to be its Legislature, and each of which has chosen a person to represent the State in the Senate, in deciding between the claimants the Senate must necessarily determine which body was the rightful Legislature and had authority to make the election.

In view of the facts as shown to exist in Louisiana, the decisions of its courts in favor of the validity of the Pinchback legislature are entitled to no respect whatever. As has been already shown, that Legislature was not elected nor brought into being by the people of the State, but owes its existence to the void proceedings of the United States court supported by military force. It was the creature of force and fraud. Its first act was to impeach and suspend the governor (Warmoth) and install Pinchback in his place. It then abolished one court and set up another in its place, and Pinchback appointed Hawkins, one of the Lynch returning board, judge of the newly-established court. To give any consideration to the decisions of a court thus set up would be to aid the usurpation. Hawkins counts in spurious members of the Legislature; that Legislature makes a governor, who makes Hawkins judge; and Hawkins then decides the Legislature to be legal.

Mr. THURMAN. Now, Mr. President, to show how complete——

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me in view of the statement he has just made——

Mr. THURMAN. I wish the Senator would not interrupt me now.

Mr. MORTON. I wish the Senator would just allow me——

Mr. THURMAN. I asked the Senator when he was speaking the other day to allow me to say a word about what he quoted from what I had said myself, and he declined.

Mr. MORTON. If I had charged the Senator with misrepresentation, I would have allowed him to correct it.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator has the whole session to correct it. I do not wish to be interrupted now.

Mr. MORTON. I ask to read just where the Senator left off in the decision in Luther vs. Borden.

Mr. THURMAN. How much does the Senator want to read?

Mr. MORTON. Not much.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator wants to read for the purpose of enlightening himself, it will take more time than I can spare. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORTON. I want to read enough to send back the charge of ignorance where it belongs.

Mr. THURMAN. Go ahead.

Mr. MORTON. I will do that. In the case of Luther vs. Borden, speaking about the authoritative decision of the supreme court of Rhode Island, the Supreme Court said:

It is worthy of remark, however, when we are referring to the authority of State decisions, that the trial of Thomas W. Dorr took place after the constitution of 1843 went into operation. The judges who decided that case held their authority under that constitution; and it is admitted on all hands that it was adopted by the people of the State, and is the lawful and established government. It is the decision, therefore, of a State court, whose judicial authority to decide upon the constitution and laws of Rhode Island is not questioned by either party to this controversy, although the government under which it acted was framed and adopted under the sanction and laws of the charter government.

The point, then, raised here has been already decided by the courts of Rhode Island. The question relates altogether to the constitution and laws of that State; and the well-settled rule in this court is, that the courts of the United States adopt and follow the decisions of the State courts in questions which concern merely the constitution and laws of the State.

Upon what ground could the circuit court of the United States which tried this case have departed from this rule and disregarded and overruled the decisions of the courts of Rhode Island? Undoubtedly the courts of the United States have certain powers under the Constitution and laws of the United States which do not belong to the State courts. But the power of determining that a State government has been lawfully established, which the courts of the State disown and repudiate, is not one of them. Upon such a question the courts of the United States are bound to follow the decisions of the State tribunals, and must therefore regard the charter government as the lawful and established government during the time of this contest.

I therefore send the charge of ignorance and misrepresentation home to roost where it belongs.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator had not been answered about six times on this subject already——

Mr. MORTON. Not once.

Mr. THURMAN. He read the same thing and he was answered by the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. Carpenter) during the last Congress.

Mr. MORTON. This speaks for itself.

Mr. THURMAN. I know it speaks for itself, and I know very well how it is that a person may pick out a single sentence or a single paragraph in a judicial opinion, wrest it from the context, and make it appear that it settles the whole case. The Senator was completely answered on that question by the late Senator from Wisconsin, for the Senator has always relied upon that.

Now I wish to put this question to the Senator and to the Senate: Can any decision of the Supreme Court even bind us when we are adjudicating upon the rights of our own members to seats in this body? Plainly not. Therefore, even if the decision of the Supreme Court were what the Senator says on this subject, it would not bind us. But what is it that the Senator has read now? In that elaborate opinion the Chief Justice went on to show that the political power of Rhode Island had refused to recognize the Dorr government and had recognized the other government. He then went on to show that after a new constitution had been formed in Rhode Island, which everybody admitted to be the true constitution, the supreme court created under that new constitution also recognized the old charter government as the true government. Undoubtedly those were most persuasive arguments why a Federal court should do the same; and then, in addition to that, was the recognition of the charter government by the Executive of the United States; and furthermore its recognition by both Houses of Congress, for the Senators here sat under the old charter government, and the Representatives in the other House sat under that government too.

But, sir, the matter is very easily disposed of as to this question of authority. Suppose that a body of armed men should overthrow the government of any State in this Union—take any one—displace the executive, displace the Assembly, displace the judiciary, and set up a new executive, a new Assembly if it had any Assembly at all, and a new judiciary, and by force get into power in that way; would the Senate feel bound by the decisions of that supreme court, the result of that usurpation? No one can pretend it; and yet it might be in the de facto exercise of power in that State, not a de facto government as lawyers understand a de facto government—one having color of title—but a government in point of fact exercising supreme authority over that State. Would this Senate feel bound by the decisions of such a supreme court? Manifestly not. In the exercise of its power, if the question arose whether a Senator from that State elected by that usurping Legislature was the true Senator or not in this body, manifestly it would say "we will not recognize this usurpation, which is directly in the teeth of the Constitution of the United States, which binds us to guarantee to every State a republican form of government." A usurping form of government is not a republican form of government. If it is sheer usurpation, then the United States, so far from recognizing the usurpation, so far from seating Senators elected by it in this Chamber, is bound to do directly the reverse and to guarantee to the people of that State a republican form of government.

I come now, Mr. President, to the third proposition of the Senator from Indiana, and that is that the Senate is bound by the recognition of the President of the United States until Congress shall reverse that recognition. The Senator lays great stress on this proposition. He insists upon it that we are bound by that recognition until Congress reverses it. He says that the Senate has no right to disregard it. Well, sir, if that is the case, then I have to say that his proposition expunges from the Constitution that provision which makes us the sole judge of the election, qualification, and return of our members; and I put it to him how is it that Congress is to reverse that decision? When we speak of Congress in a constitutional point of view as the law-making power we include the President of the United States, because his approval is necessary to make any bill that we may pass a law. If, therefore, Congress, acting in its legislative capacity, (for that is the proposition of the Senator,) can alone overturn the presidential recognition, then it must be by a bill or resolution that goes to the President for his approval, and which if he vetoes or refuses to sign fails to become a law. So then the proposition of the Senator from Indiana puts it absolutely in the power of the President to decide who shall be members of the Senate of the United States or of the House of Representatives; that is, whomsoever he recognizes, whatsoever body he recognizes, that body is the lawful government of the State, and by consequence has the authority to appoint Senators and under its laws Representatives are to be elected. It is an absolute surrender of the power of the Senate and the power of the House to determine the elections, qualifications, and returns of their own members.

The Senator seems to have a vague idea that Congress may enact laws without the presidential approval, that Congress may reverse the president by a joint resolution of the two Houses, a legislative resolution forsooth! How can it do any such thing as that? How can Congress pass any act of legislation that requires the concurrence of both Houses, unless it be the establishment of a joint rule for the conduct of the business of the two Houses, or the appointment of committees for the auditing of expenses, or those matters of the business of Congress which we provide for by what are called concurrent resolutions—how can Congress make anything that has the force of law by joint resolution or bill without sending it to the President of the United States for his approval?

I come back, then, to the position that the Senator's proposition gives the entire power to the President of the United States. It would require us to pass a bill and send it to him, which he may return to us with his veto or may refuse to sign; and then the presidential recognition would remain. So that the position of the Senator from Indiana gives to the President of the United States a power that no magistrate, no executive officer on the face of this globe, where there is a legislative assembly, possesses or ever did possess. It is an absolute surrender of power to the President of the United States. Sir, that will not do at all.

But the Senator, I think, undertook to read from Luther vs. Borden to sustain that proposition. The case is directly against him. What did the court say in that case:

Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State.

That is, the President may first decide that; he is compelled to decide, Congress not being in session and the President being called upon under the act of 1795, but that is subject to the action of Congress. The court go on to say:

Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State. For as the United States guarantee to each State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State before it can determine whether it is republican or not.

Do the court stop there and say that that must be done by a bill, that that must be done by a joint resolution or the like? No, sir; but they point out what is this recognition that they speak of, for the court immediately go on to say:

And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority.

Mark it—

And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority.

That is, we recognize it; the Senate by seating the Senators, the House of Representatives by seating the Representatives; not by bill, not by joint resolution, that is sent to the President for his approval or veto, but by our independent action in seating Senators and in seating Representatives, so that this very decision says we are to decide on this question. The House is to decide according to its judgment, and by the decisions that we make in that way the State government is recognized by the proper constitutional authority. Furthermore the Chief Justice, speaking for the court, goes on to say:

And its decision is binding on every other department of the Government, and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal.

That is to say, if we determine who are the Senators and thereby recognize the government by which they are appointed, if the House of Representatives recognize the Representatives elected under the laws of the same government, that makes a recognition by both Houses; and that is binding upon every other department of the Government; that is binding on the President; that is binding on the courts. That is the mode by which the President's erroneous recognition is reversed or his correct recognition is affirmed, if it be correct. So far, then, from our having no authority to decide this question, so far from our being bound by the presidential recognition, it is our decision and the decision of the House of Representatives which binds the President and not his recognition that binds us. The court go on to say—

It is true that the contest in this case did not last long enough to bring the matter to this issue—

That is, to a question in the Senate and in the House of Representatives who were Senators and who were Representatives—and as no Senators or Representatives were elected under the authority of the government of which Mr. Dorr was the head, Congress was not called upon to decide the controversy. Yet the right to decide is placed there and not in the courts.

The right to decide is placed in the Senate when it decides upon the right of a person claiming a seat here and in the House of Representatives when it decides upon the right of a Representative elected under the laws of the State, if that presents the question. There is where the right rests, say the court, and that is the manner in which it is to be decided by Congress; not by bill, not by legislation. I do not mean to say that it might not be decided by legislation; I do not say that if the President saw fit to approve such a bill as we might pass it would not be binding on all judicial tribunals; but what I say is that we shall never, I trust, surrender our jurisdiction to the President and put it in his power by interposing his veto or withholding his signature to a bill to determine who shall be Senators of the United States. No, sir, that will not do. This decision goes expressly on the ground that we decide for ourselves; for when it says that the question is to be decided by the seating of Senators or the seating of Representatives, it must mean that the seating of Senators is to be determined by the Senate and the seating of Representatives is to be determined by the House of Representatives, for the House has no power over us in the seating of Senators and we have no power over it in the seating of Representatives. The whole thing, then, is in a nutshell; it comes back to the fundamental principle of legislative institutions; at least it is fundamental in England and fundamental here and in every State of this Union. It cost a long time to establish the principle in England so far as the House of Commons was concerned. It was a struggle of nearly two centuries before the House of Commons established its right to be the sole judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of its own members; but it was firmly established there before the American Revolution, and it has been firmly established in the United States ever since a State constitution was formed. It finds its place in every State constitution; it finds its place in the Constitution of the United States; and if anything can be called established constitutional law in the United States of America, it is that each house of a legislative assembly is the sole judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own members. It has no master that can say authoritatively "You shall be bound by my opinion." It acts on its own high responsibility under the obligation of its members, imposed by their oath, their election, and their duty to support and maintain the Constitution under which they act. It cannot be restrained; it cannot be overthrown by any other department of the Government, by any other tribunal, be it executive, legislative, or judicial.

Sir, I have spoken much longer than I expected, and longer than I should have done if I had not been interrupted. I did not intend in fact to occupy any time of the Senate if others had been prepared to go on; and I now yield the floor.

Mr. MORTON. I want to occupy the attention of the Senate for a few minutes in reply to some statements in regard to the law made by the Senator from Ohio. The Senator from Ohio has this morning been guilty of a discourtesy which is rare to him, I am glad to say, and I think there must be some peculiar circumstance to account for it. He charged me first with being rusty with regard to the law, and secondly with being ignorant. In my State, if one lawyer should make a charge of that kind against another, and then turn out himself to be grossly ignorant, he would be disbarred as a matter of course.

I stated the proposition that the Supreme Court of the United States and the other courts of the United States would follow the decisions of the highest court of a State upon all questions regarding the constitution and laws of that State and not involving any question arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and that where the supreme court of a State had passed upon such a question its decision could not be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States. The Senator said that that was an evidence of ignorance, and he referred to the case of a citizen of one State bringing a suit in the courts of the United States against a citizen of another State. That is one of the cases provided for by the Constitution of the United States expressly. It arises under that instrument, because the second section of the third article provides that the courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction in suits "between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects."

These cases are specially provided for, and the jurisdiction is accordingly granted; but so far as any question can arise upon a State law as to the legality of a returning board, or as to who was elected governor or a member of the Legislature, the decision of that case belongs solely to the courts of that State and cannot be reviewed by the courts of the United States under any circumstances, and the decisions of such courts are binding upon the Senate of the United States or upon the House of Representatives acting in their separate capacity, and their authority can only be overturned by the joint action of Congress under that clause in regard to guaranteeing a republican form of government. I referred to the case of Luther vs. Borden, in which the court expressly say—and I want to call attention and quote the Senator's language in regard to it—that upon questions of this kind they will follow the courts of the State:

Upon such a question the courts of the United States are bound—

Not a mere matter of comity, but they are bound—to follow the decisions of the State tribunals, and must therefore regard the charter government as the lawful and established government during the time of this contest.

That principle has been repeatedly recognized, and since the Senator made these extraordinary statements I have collected some other authorities, and I might collect very many. In a very recent decision, a case decided in 1872, the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Strong, the Supreme Court of the United States use the following language:

In view of this, we do not perceive that we have any authority to review the judgment of the State court. Plainly, if there be any Federal question in the case, it is because the plaintiff claimed some title, right, privilege, or immunity under the act of Congress to which reference was made in his bill, and because the decision of the court was against the title, right, privilege, or immunity thus set up or claimed. Such a claim and such a decision must appear in the record. But we think this does not appear. It must be admitted that the question whether the sale of the land warrant by Holmes to Adsit, if made before the warrant issued, as charged in the bill, was not a nullity, may have been presented, but it does not appear that such a question was decided, much less that it was decided adversely to the plaintiff in error. Nothing is more certain than that to give this court jurisdiction to review the judgment of a State court the record must show either expressly or by necessary intendment not only that a Federal question was raised, but that it was decided adversely to the party who has caused the case to be removed here.

The doctrine was plainly stated in Crowell vs. Randell, and it has been repeated in numerous later decisions. Indeed, it is the express requirement of the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary act and of the act of February 14, 1867. And the rulings of this court have gone further. In Parmelee vs. Lawrence it was said it must appear that the question must have been necessarily involved in the decision, and that the State court could not have given a judgment without deciding it. In Williams vs. Norris it was held not to be enough that the construction of an act of Congress was drawn in question and that the decision was against the title of the party, but that it must also appear that the title depended on that act. And in Rector vs. Ashley it was laid down that if the judgment of the State court can be sustained on other grounds than those which are of Federal cognizance this court will not revise it, though a Federal question may also have been decided therein and decided erroneously. These decisions go much further than is necessary to sustain our judgment now.

I call attention to another part of this decision:

As we have seen, the bill was dismissed for want of jurisdiction. The judgment of the court respecting the extent of its equitable jurisdiction is, of course, not reviewable here. The record does not inform us what other questions, if any, were decided. It nowhere appears that the sale from Holmes to Adsit was ruled to be valid, notwithstanding the act of Congress which declared that sales of bounty rights, made or executed prior to the issue of land warrants therefor, shall be null and void. Nor was it necessary to the decree that was entered that such a decision should have been made.

But whatever may have been the reasons for the decision, whether the court had jurisdiction of the case or not, is a question exclusively for the judgment of the State court. (Smith vs. Adsit, 16 Wallace, 188-190.)

Now I apply that directly here. The Senator argued, as did Mr. Carpenter on a former occasion, that the supreme court of Louisiana had not jurisdiction of the case it decided. The argument was absurd in the beginning; the reasoning of Mr. Carpenter and of Mr. Trumbull was without force. My position then was that the supreme court of that State was to be the judge of its own jurisdiction under a statute of the State not involving any Federal question; and here I find that doctrine directly referred to, for the court say whatever may have been the reasons of the State court for holding that it had jurisdiction, whether those reasons were good or bad, that court was the final arbiter of the question as to its own jurisdiction under the State law. So I say, whether the supreme court of Louisiana had jurisdiction to decide all questions arising upon the act creating the returning board of that State, it was a State statute, and its judgment in every respect was final and conclusive, and to adopt any other rule would be to overturn the very foundations of the State judiciary.

In a case in 15 Wallace the same doctrine is adverted to very briefly, it being so well settled that the court does not reason it out:

When a decision holding a contract void is made by the highest court of a State upon the general principles by which courts determine that a transaction is good or bad on principles of public policy, the decision is one which this court is not authorized to review. (Tarver vs. Keach, 15 Wallace, 67.)

As a matter of course there may be certain questions going before the Supreme Court of the United States involving general principles of law that are common alike to all the courts of the Union and to the courts of every State which they may have a right to review; but all the questions arising under State statutes and State laws are to be finally decided and determined by the courts of the State itself.

I have said enough, I think, to vindicate myself from the assault made by the Senator from Ohio. Now one thing further. The Senator, in the conclusion of his argument, said that it was the province of every State Legislature to determine for itself the qualification and election of its own members. So say I. That was what the Senator held in the Goldthwaite case. That is what I held in the Goldthwaite case also, that if there were members in the Alabama Legislature who were not elected or who had procured their seats by fraud, that question was to be determined by the house itself; and that is the doctrine I apply to the Louisiana Legislature. If there were persons in that body who were not elected but who obtained their seats by fraud, each house was to judge and determine for itself; and when the Senator made that remark he admitted away the whole case; there was nothing left.

Mr. President, I did not intend to make an argument to-day. I shall desire in conclusion to reply somewhat to the argument of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] and perhaps other points that may have been raised. I have been drawn into this by the remarks of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I am very sorry that the Senator from Indiana thinks that I treated him with any discourtesy; there was nothing further from my intention. If I said he had become rusty in the law, it was not a very remarkable assertion nor one that was at all discourteous. It would be very extraordinary if he had not become rusty in the law after so long an absence from the courts; and I think that if I had been out of them as long as he has been I should not consider myself treated with discourtesy if any one were to say that I had become rusty in the law.

The Senator reads from a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States showing that the Supreme Court of the United States considers itself bound on questions that are in no wise Federal by the decision of the highest court of the State upon the direct question. I cited him to an established exception to that rule; and that is, that where there had been contradictory decisions, as in the Bank cases from Ohio and as in the case from Iowa, there the Supreme Court of the United States did not feel itself bound to follow the last decision but followed that decision which in its own judgment was correct. I ought also to have said in that connection that in respect to this very question now before us, or in respect to the principles that settle this question if it could be settled by judicial decision, this very report of our Committee on Privileges and Elections shows that the decisions of the supreme court of Louisiana are directly opposed to each other, so that the case comes precisely within that category of cases in which the Supreme Court of the United States itself, if it could have jurisdiction to decide upon the matter, would not feel itself bound by the last decision of the supreme court of Louisiana. The decisions of the supreme court of that State upon the principles which lie at the bottom of this whole controversy are directly in conflict. When there was a court there too pure to be suspected, when there was a court there in times of peace when law and the constitution prevailed, then the decisions of that court established principles upon which I might safely rely for the opposition I make to the seating of Pinchback.

But, Mr. President, the Senator says (and it is a specimen of his reasoning) that I yield the whole case when I say that each house of an assembly is to be the judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own members; and he says that this Louisiana house that elected Pinchback did decide and that settles the whole case. That is another specimen of begging the question. The question is, was that a house? In Goldthwaite's case there was no such question. Nobody denied that the body which elected Goldthwaite was the Legislature of Alabama; but it was said that there were three or four or half a dozen members in the body who were not legally entitled to sit there. If they had been turned out, the remainder would have been the Legislature. There was a quorum without them of members undoubtedly elected whose seats were in no wise questioned. So there was no question there but that the body that decided the question was the legal Legislature of the State of Alabama. But that is not the case here at all. This body of men who assembled there surrounded by the bayonets of the Army, placed there by Durell, never were a Legislature at all, never were authorized to decide anything. It was a sheer, flagrant usurpation, as your committee has found and found upon evidence that cannot be gainsaid. So that the Senator is simply furnishing us with another illustration of how he begs the question and then reasons from the premises that are thus assumed.

The Senator reads judicial authority in respect to the Supreme Court of the United States following State decisions. Has he shown authority that the Supreme Court of the United States follows the decision of the State courts on political questions? No, sir; but Luther vs. Borden decides directly the reverse, that political questions are not judicial questions, and that the judicial department follows the political department and not the political department the judicial department; and that same case decides that what is the established government in a State is a political question. I have already read from that decision, but I beg to refer to it again and to read another passage from it:

> When the decision of this court might lead to such results, it becomes its duty to examine very carefully its own powers before it undertakes to exercise jurisdiction. Certainly the question which the plaintiff proposed to raise by the testimony he offered has not heretofore been recognized as a judicial one in any of the State courts.

The question what is the established government the court say—> has not heretofore been recognized as a judicial one in any of the State courts. In forming the constitutions of the different States, after the declaration of independence, and in the various changes and alterations which have since been made, the political department has always determined whether the proposed constitution or amendment was ratified or not by the people of the State, and the judicial power had followed its decision. In Rhode Island the question has been directly decided. Prosecutions were there instituted against some of the persons who had been active in the forcible opposition to the old government. And in more than one of the cases evidence was offered on the part of the defense similar to the testimony offered in the circuit court, and for the same purpose; that is, for the purpose of showing that the proposed constitution had been adopted by the people of Rhode Island, and had, therefore, become the established government, and consequently that the parties accused were doing nothing more than their duty in endeavoring to support it.

But the courts uniformly held that the inquiry proposed to be made belonged to the political power and not to the judicial.

Why, sir, the decision is a complete decision that even the Legislature of Louisiana would not be bound by the decision of its courts; nor would it be. Upon this question as to what is the established government the Legislature of Louisiana itself would not be bound by that; on the contrary, the courts of Louisiana would be bound to follow the decision of the political power in that State on the question what is the established government in the State. And now the Senator gravely argues that a decision which the Legislature of Louisiana itself is not bound to respect, which in no sense controls the Legislature of Louisiana, binds the Senate of the United States!

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his last statement. He falls back, after I think being successfully driven from every other position, upon what the Supreme Court of the United States has said in regard to the political power of Congress. Now I gravely submit to the Senate of the United States whether the question as to who constitute the members of a returning board created by the laws of Louisiana or who is elected governor of the State or members of the Legislature is a political question primarily devolving upon Congress for its decision. If that is what is meant by a political question, then the question of electing every constable, sheriff, member of the Legislature, or State officer, is a political question, which can be canvassed, contested, and determined by the Congress of the United States--an absurdity so palpable that it only requires to be stated to be understood by everybody.

No, sir, that is not what is meant by political questions, as referred to in Luther vs. Borden. What was the case there? There was a supreme court in Rhode Island that was not in dispute at all. Nobody denied that the supreme court which had decided the question was the supreme court of the State. The controversy did not involve the court. So in Louisiana the controversy does not involve the court. The court was elected in 1868, the members holding their seats for eight years. Their title was not involved in the controversy at all. The supreme court of Louisiana, like that of Rhode Island, was undisputed.

The supreme court of Rhode Island, undisputed, went forward and decided that the charter government of Rhode Island was the lawful government of that State, and the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Luther vs. Borden said that as the supreme court of the State of Rhode Island was not in dispute they were bound to follow its decisions. It was not a question of comity; it was a question of absolute obligation; they were bound to follow its decisions, even upon a high question of that kind.

Now the question here does not approach in dignity to that at all; but in this case the supreme court of Louisiana have decided who was elected, a question arising exclusively under a State law and in regard to which we have no right to intervene unless the State governments in every respect are at our mercy.

The Senator said there had been conflicting decisions of the supreme court of Louisiana. I have heard that to-day for the first time. There is in that State, commencing in February, 1873, an unbroken current of decisions to the effect that the Kellogg legislature is the lawful Legislature of the State, that Kellogg is the governor of the State, and that what was known as the Kellogg government is the lawful government of the State of Louisiana—an unbroken current of decisions arising under the constitution and laws of the State of Louisiana. The case that he refers to covers this like a mantle.

And when he talks about "the political department of the Government," what does he mean by it? Does he mean the Senate of the United States? Does he mean the House of Representatives? Does he mean the President alone? No, sir; it is "the United States" that is to pass upon the political government of a State, and that means the action of both Houses of Congress coming to the same conclusion in the form of an enactment. It does not mean the Senate; it does not mean the House. That brings me back to the proposition I enunciated the other day, and one that is impregnable and indispensable to the existence of State government; and that is that the actual government in a State, there received, there administered by the courts, there in existence, there acknowledged and declared by every State tribunal; that that government must be received by the President acting by himself, by each House acting for itself, until the Congress of the United States, as "the United States" in the fourth article of the Constitution specified, shall overturn it; anything else is anarchy; and that is this case.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator from Indiana were the judge of whether he had demolished an adversary in argument he never would fail to give judgment in favor of himself, and thereby would illustrate the wisdom of that old maxim that no man ought to be a judge in his own case. I do not remember an occasion in which the Senator has engaged in discussion with a brother Senator that he did not completely demolish his adversary, in his own opinion. He has told us again and again in this discussion that he had advanced his positions before on this subject and had never been answered; he has told us that they are impregnable and that the opposite opinions are absurd; and if strength of language and strength of utterance and vehemence of gesticulation could settle the question, there would be no use whatsoever in arguing with the Senator from Indiana. There were some good lawyers on this floor who thought at the last session, when the Senator made substantially the same speech he has made at this, that he was answered by the Senator from Wisconsin, (Mr. Carpenter;) there were some of us who thought so; but the Senator from Indiana never thought so; it never entered into his imagination that the Senator from Wisconsin had answered him. It was of no use in his mind that Senator after Senator coincided in opinion with the Senator from Wisconsin; it was of no use in settling his judgment that even a majority of the Senate might be of that same opinion; he did not think he was answered; he does not think so to-day; he never will think so as long as he lives. That is his own idiosyncrasy; he cannot help it, and I will not complain of it. There is nothing better perhaps than for a gentleman to live on good terms with himself; and if my friend from Indiana has that extreme good fortune of being always on good terms with himself, I congratulate him on the possession of a characteristic which will contribute more to his happiness than all the other grand and amiable characteristics that he possesses.

Now, Mr. President, one word more. The Senator says that the theory that this is a political question, if I understand him, would authorize Congress to decide who is a constable in a State. Is that an argument worthy of the acknowledged ability of the Senator from Indiana? I think on reflection that it is not. I think on reflection he will admit that the Senate of the United States has nothing to do with deciding who is a constable in the State of Louisiana or Alabama or Ohio; but I think he must admit that the Senate of the United States has something to do with determining who has a right to a seat on this floor.

Again, sir, he says that would authorize us to go into a determination of the right of each claimant to a seat in a State Legislature. It does no such thing. The Senator from Indiana in the Goldthwaite case did express his opinion that if the objection to a member's holding a seat in a State Legislature was that he was disqualified under the fourteenth amendment, Congress might look into that question. He made that an exception. He is the only man I know of who does make that exception. I agree with him—and nobody ever entertained a different opinion—that the question as to the qualification of members of a State Legislature is a question to be decided by the house of the Legislature in which the claimant asks for a seat. No one disputes that; but there must first be a house; there must first be a body competent to decide. If the body that undertakes to decide is no house at all, if it is a mere body of usurpers, if it is a mere mob, you have to beg the question and say it is a house before you can give any effect to its decision. That is precisely the case here. This body of men were not the house. The whole of the Senator's argument is based on a begging of the question and saying they were.

Mr. WHYTE Mr. President, it is with unaffected diffidence that I rise to address the Senate on Louisiana affairs, and I am the more embarrassed in following immediately after two such distinguished Senators and after the able and logical arguments which they have delivered on this floor yesterday and to-day, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] and the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] and especially following the bandying of excited words which has taken place between our friends so recently before us. I am the more embarrassed, knowing my own inability to add any freshness to this "thrice-told tale," or to add new interest to anything that may be said in its discussion. But, sir, the question immediately in hand is as to the composition of this body; a body which has in time past and I trust may continue in the long future to be one of the most honorable and honored parliamentary bodies in the world. The question comes before us in the form of a resolution presented by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] which resolution provides that P. B. S. Pinchback should be admitted as a Senator from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years beginning on the 4th day of March, 1873. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] has offered an amendment to insert before the word "admitted" the word "not," and I am happy to say that I shall range myself in that army of which the Senator from Vermont shall carry the banner. I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, and I desire to give some of the reasons which have actuated me in coming to that conclusion.

The argument of the Senator from Indiana, the only advocate apparently for the proposition whom we have yet heard on this floor, is that the credentials of Mr. Pinchback being in due form, under the signature of a person signing himself as governor of Louisiana, and attested by the seal of that State, entitles him to admission to a seat as a Senator, and that whatever objections may exist, if any, as to the manner of his election or as to the legal character of the body by which he was elected should be inquired into afterward; or, in o her words, that the filing of his credentials presents a prima facie case for seating him in this body pending inquiry as to his election.

I would not take the time of the Senate in adverting to this subject, in my view of the case as it stands to-day, but it is well for those of us who have recently become members of this body to appreciate and to follow good and substantial precedents. I admit that in the absence of objection, where a gentleman presents himself at the bar of the Senate with a certificate of election and offers himself ready to take the oath provided in such case, he is admitted, and ought to be admitted, and he becomes, for the time being, a member of the Senate. The signature of the governor, the proper attestation of the other officers of the State, the affixing of the great seal of the State to the certificate, and if it complies with the terms of the act of Congress of 1866, I admit, ought to be his guarantee to be admitted, at once, to a seat on this floor. This rule has been established by a long line of precedents, commencing in the earlier days of the Senate, before party warfare had become as violent and party rancor as bitter as in these latter days have manifested themselves. This rule, as a State-rights man, I advocate and approve. When a gentleman comes to this body apparently chosen by the Legislature of a sovereign State and presents himself as its representative, it is due to the honor and the integrity of the State that he should be received into our midst.

But, Mr. President, rules of all kinds have their just and proper exceptions. This rule has had on more than one occasion not only a just and proper exception but in my judgment has been subjected to most unjust and improper exceptions. I know of no gentleman who has within recent years occupied a seat in this body, I refer to the late Mr. Fessenden, of Maine, now having gone to his long account, I trust enjoying that peace which passes our understanding—I say I know of no gentleman better acquainted with parliamentary practice or upon whose opinion on that subject I would more firmly depend. I trust I am not infringing upon that rule of senatorial courtesy to which Mr. Carpenter jokingly referred in the beginning, I think, of the last Congress, when he said that the Congressional Globe is not a good book to refer to if it recites senatorial opinions more than two years old, for this is a case in which I hardly believe I should be violating that rule, when I refer to the views of Mr. Fessenden in the case of Governor Thomas of my own State who had been elected by the lawful Legislature, and who appeared here with no one from his State disputing the right to his seat on this floor. Mr. Thomas came here with his proper credentials from the State of Maryland and offered himself ready to take the oath. Objection was made. My friend the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] will pardon me for saying that the objection as stated by him was not the real objection that was made on the floor of the Senate when he offered himself ready to be sworn in. Mr. Fessenden there stated the rule, and I refer to it, but will not occupy the time of the Senate by reading it unless asked or unless it is disputed. Mr. Fessenden laid down the rule, that by a long line of cases every Senator, who presented himself with proper credentials and without serious objection was entitled, and had been admitted to his seat, until the war broke out, and then he himself had objected to the formal admission of Mr. Stark from the State of Oregon; somebody else had objected to the admission of Judge Patterson from the State of Tennessee, and then came the case of Governor Thomas. Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, also gave his view of the case, which I will ask the permission of the Senate to read:

> There is no question of constitutional law raised in this matter, &c. The right of the Senate to pass upon the elections, qualifications, and returns of its members is given by the Constitution. Ordinarily, when a paper is presented in due form, showing the election of any citizen of the United States with the requisite qualifications, by any State, he is admitted to his seat. We have the right, however, to pass upon the election, returns, and qualifications of the member. Whether we do it before he is sworn into office or afterward is simply a matter of discretion in the body. Our right as judges, given to us by the Constitution, would undoubtedly authorize us to pass upon his qualifications before administering the oath of office.

Even, as it will be seen, on his qualifications, without waiting to obtain jurisdiction of his person before by having him sworn in.

> There can be no doubt about that. It is therefore simply a question of the order in which the business of admitting the new member shall be transacted. In ordinary cases the oath is administered, because it is presumed no objection will be made, or if objection be made afterward, that objection is inquired into and the action of the Senate can then be reconsidered.—Congressional Globe, first session Fortieth Congress, 1867, page 175.

But in the case of Mr. Thomas objection was made on account of words spoken by him when he received the nomination by the Legislature of the State, I think at a champagne supper. They were words, if true, highly defamatory of the character of the Senate of the United States; but he denied the truth of the assertion that he had ever uttered such language. These were the words. He spoke of Senators here being traitors to the Union, and that—

> He would go there to face these men, who are now and always were traitors to the Union.

The late Mr. Sumner seemed to have been particularly distressed at the words "always were," and inquired whether he said that, seeming to think that charge too heavy to bear; but if such words had reference to their actions since the war, probably it would not have been so serious an accusation. Said Mr. MORTON, of Indiana:

> If Mr. Thomas made that speech it is enough to put this Senate upon inquiry.
> I will remark further that, after having heard that speech read, I should like to know something about the history of this man during the war.

And he supported the reference of the credentials to the committee.

I cite this merely to show that the Senator from Indiana himself has not only made objections to a claimant's admission upon his prima facie case upon general grounds, but merely for words which he had used in a speech made in the State where he was elected.

I say there are exceptions. That case was supposed to be an exception, and it was sent to the Committee on the Judiciary. I believe at that time there was no committee in this body on privileges and elections. It was sent to the Committee on the Judiciary, and they reported not in regard to these words at all. They found no reason why Governor Thomas could not take his seat except in the fact that his son had joined the confederate army and that he had given him some money before he went away.

Mr. MORTON. I will state to the Senator another very important fact which he omits—the letter written by Mr. Thomas while he was Secretary of the Treasury, I think in January or February, 1861, which very clearly showed——

Mr. WHYTE. I am talking about the report of the committee, and I state it accurately. I know that there was in the testimony a great deal of evidence in regard to his course while he was Secretary of the Treasury under the Buchanan administration, but I am stating what the Judiciary Committee reported, which I have found in a document of that session. The Senator will find that they reported on the 18th of December, 1867, that they saw no reason to debar Mr. Thomas from taking his seat unless it was found in the fact of his son entering into the military service of the confederacy and in the circumstances connected with that fact, and they reported no expression of opinion whatever. I admit that the Senate afterward, upon discussion of Mr. Thomas's case, refused to allow him to take the seat to which they had never admitted him, and the Legislature of Maryland bowed to your decision and sent General Vickers in his stead. I am not complaining of the action of the Senate; I am not complaining that the Senate, sitting as judges acting upon conscience, turned Governor Thomas away from these doors.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I call the attention of the Senator to the ground upon which the rejection of Mr. Thomas was placed, the ground upon which it was taken out from the operation of the general rule. Whether that ground was solid or not, I shall not speak; but I speak of the ground upon which it was taken from the operation of the general rule that the certificate of the governor makes a prima facie case. At that time we had but one oath for admission into this body. That was what was called the iron-clad oath. There was no modified oath that could be taken; and it was held by the majority of the Senate, upon what was regarded as public history as well as special evidence, that Mr. Thomas could not take the iron-clad oath without committing perjury.

Mr. WHYTE. It was kind in our friends not to subject the gentleman to that ordeal! Did they ask him to take the oath? It is the first time that the consciences of democrats have been taken into such careful charge. But I am not objecting to it. I want my friend the Senator from Indiana to understand I do not object to his making the exception. I agree with him that there are exceptions to the general rule. He thinks Mr. Thomas's case was one, and now I am about to show that this case is another. If these cases of Stark and Judge Patterson—and I will not refer to the other cases mentioned by other gentlemen who have discussed this subject—if these cases presented objections to the prima facie title of the applicant, what must be thought of that objection made here, on all hands, coming up in this body, coming up in the other branch of the legislative department, coming up all over the land? Here is a man asking to be admitted to your body who claims his title to a seat upon an election that was a mockery and a fraud. If these cases furnished objections, what must be thought of the case of a man who comes here from a Legislature that had no legal existence, no power to exercise the functions of a lawful Legislature, who comes here and asks us to receive him as our peer and equal on this floor? Such a suggestion is one of a high public character. It is highly privileged in its nature when made even upon the solemn asseveration of a Senator alone; but when now made under the more solemn assertion of a standing committee of this body, it demands a prompt examination before the applicant should be permitted to participate in our deliberations.

If, therefore, Mr. President, the case was now presented for the first time, and this was the beginning of the Forty-third Congress, when the term for which he claimed began, with these denunciations of his right to a seat, I care not whether he be of my own party or of the opposition, loving the institutions of my country, I would vote to send his case to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. But I am taking up the time of the Senate to no purpose. The period for the prima facie case has long since passed. The argument which I have heard in the Senate Chamber from the Senator from Indiana might have been made at the commencement of the Forty-third Congress, but to-day it is as much out of place as the snow-heap of the lingering winter beside the blooming crocus which the fair-handed spring has just thrown out under the very walls of the Capitol. Prima facie case! It has gone. It is a mockery to talk to men of sense about a prima facie case in regard to Pinchback to-day. The case itself has been in the hands of a committee. It has been examined by the Committee on Privileges and Elections. On your table lie a majority and a minority report upon this very question. The case is ready before us for final adjudication. We have the majority report of the committee made at the last Congress by the Senator from Indiana. We have the minority report made by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] and the Senator who recently represented my own State here, [Mr. Hamilton.] Then what is the question? The question is a plain, simple one. It arises under that clause of the Constitution which declares that—

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

What are "returns?" The paper title; but the election is the substantial thing. The "election" is the title, the "return" the paper evidence of it. Without the election, what is the use of the return? If the return is in form, if the return is correct, and yet the election is a fraud, we go back to the foundation and start from the election itself, and do not commence at the return at all. Election first, certificate next, and qualification last. The framers of the Constitution made the order, and by that order I propose to try the case.

What is a prima facie case? A case where the party presents himself without objection, with the paper title, with all the surroundings which apparently give him a standing in this body. That case presents a degree of probability which in the absence of evidence to the contrary would entitle him to reception. When you take your testimony, when you have the facts before you, it is idle to talk about a prima facie case. Now, what facts have you obtained? You have the majority report on this very case; you have the minority report on this very case; and you have the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections on the case which occurred in the Forty-third Congress. What was that case? There may be some Senators who have not had the time to look at it, and I do not want to cite as evidence that which in my judgment is not clearly evidence in this contest. That case grew out of an election made by the same Legislature, held upon the very same day as that of Pinchback, and it occurred in this wise: The same Legislature voted upon the same day for two Senators, one of whose cases has been decided by this body and occurring thus: Kellogg resigned his seat in the Senate of the United States and went to Louisiana to be governor. The term for which he was Senator expired on the 4th of March, 1873. His resignation was dated some time in November, 1872, and thus a vacancy existed in this body for the rest of his term. The certificate of Kellogg as governor was given as well for the vacancy as for the next term beginning March 4, 1873, certifying that Mr. Ray was elected on the 15th of January, 1873, for the vacancy, and that on the same day P. B. S. Pinchback was elected for the long term. Therefore it is the same question, the same Legislature, the same day of election, for the short term and the long term. The question is identically the same, whether the Legislature that elected Ray was a lawful body and whether the Legislature that elected Pinchback was a lawful body. If it was unlawful when it elected Ray, it was unlawful when it elected Pinchback. The same rule applies to one as to the other. It is a great public question, and in the investigation as to the one case the testimony is binding as to the other. There is nothing of a personal character to be inquired into in either case.

That committee reported what we have so often heard, that there was no lawful State government in Louisiana and that the Legislature which professed to elect Ray was no lawful Legislature at all. Ray never was permitted to take a seat in this body. While we are acting here, not as legislators in determining this question, but as quasi-judicial officers, nevertheless we ought not to be bound by any strict and technical rules of evidence, such as are daily enforced in the courts of common law. We are bound to take a broader and more comprehensive view. We must take judicial notice of many things not proved in a special contest. We are bound to know certain historical facts. We are compelled to take cognizance of things of such public notoriety that, without the form of actual proof, we cannot fail to receive them as facts; for while it is undoubtedly true that sitting here in this investigation we are in a measure acting as a court of law and justice, yet we are also acting as a "court of discretion and of equity." Mr. Smith, of South Carolina, whose ability was well known and whose knowledge of the usages of parliamentary assemblages was admitted, as early as 1793, in a case of contested election, laid down this rule, though he was at that time speaking of hearsay testimony:

The House had been told that hearsay testimony was unworthy of attention; but he wished to remind them that they were not, like a court of law, restricted to proceed upon regular proof and not to go beyond the letter of it; they were entitled to hear and weigh everything advanced, and to form their opinion from the general conviction arising upon the whole circumstances.—Contested Elections, 1789–1834, page 80.

That is the rule in contested elections or in questions of this character, laid down by one of the ablest parliamentarians of this country. That rule has been followed in both Houses over and over again. That rule, I apprehend, will be followed in this body. The question here addresses itself to the conscience of every one of us; its decision will overturn no government in Louisiana. No matter what we decide, no matter whether we refuse to admit Pinchback, we cannot by that overturn the present unlawful government in Louisiana; it will create no revolution; it will only assert either the dignity of this body and its determination to maintain the purity of elections, or it will repudiate the wise counsels and the solemn findings of some of the ablest men that have been members of this Senate. On this subject, I say, we are bound by no recognition. No specious argument can mislead me; no human eloquence, though the orator be silver-tongued, can teach me so far to forget my duty that I am to be bound by the recognition of a court or any other authority in a matter of which the Constitution has made me a member and a component part of a supreme judicial tribunal.

I approach this question not as a partisan; for though I may believe that John McEnery was elected governor of Louisiana, that the Legislature on the same ticket with John McEnery was elected the lawful Legislature of Louisiana, yet to-day I say it on my individual responsibilty only—for I have consulted with no one—I would vote against McMillen, who presents credentials as elected by the McEnery legislature, because I am here to decide the question not according to my feelings, not according to my beliefs, not according to my hopes, but by the sworn testimony that I find upon the table and by the solemn findings, which I approve, of a standing committee of this body.

Now, says the Senator from Indiana, "you are bound by the decision of the highest State tribunal in the State of Louisiana;" "I do not mean to say that you can be compelled"—not using his language, because he used that which was more apt, probably, for the discussion—"I do not mean to say that I can take you like the horse to the spring and compel you to drink; I do not mean to say that you can be forced to do so;" but he addresses that which is the most persuasive argument to men of honor and of intelligence, "It is your solemn duty before God and your country to recognize the decisions of the highest State tribunal of the State of Louisiana on this question." He could use no language which would appeal to me with more force than that; and if I could be made to believe in such a doctrine as that I would vote for his resolution. But the doctrine is wrong; wrong in law, and has no foundation to sustain it whatever. We are bound by no recognition of a State court; and his view of the law is wrong in regard to the Supreme Court of the United States as to its undeviating adherence to decisions of State courts. As a general rule—for, again, when the distinguished Senator from Indiana gets upon general rules most of us can stand—his general rule is correct, that where the highest State tribunal, the supreme court of appeal of a State, decides any question growing out of the constitution and the laws of that State, the Supreme Court of the United States is bound by it and will follow it, because it has in numerous decisions said that it will be bound by that rule. It is accepted, therefore, to be true as a general rule; but like that other general rule in regard to the admission of Senators in this body of which I have spoke, it has its exceptions also. When the Supreme Court of the United States sees fraud as we see, that Kellogg's title to be governor is a fraud, that the Pinchback legislature is a fraud, that the returning board known as the Lynch board is a fraud—when we know and ascertain these things from the records and archives of the Senate, we not only are not bound to recognize a tribunal which does recognize such frauds, but our duty is to reject and to repudiate it with scorn and contempt; and so would the Supreme Court of the United States do. Speaking through Mr. Justice Swayne, of Ohio, it has refused to be bound by a decision in just such a case, and I refer to a decision in 1 Wallace, 206, which is directly in point:

> We are not unmindful of the importance of uniformity in the decisions of this court, and those of the highest local courts, giving constructions to the laws and constitutions of their own States. It is the settled rule of this court in such cases to follow the decisions of the State courts.

There is the rule which my friend from Indiana lays down, and which he will find this to be an authority to support:

> But there have been heretofore, in the judicial history of this court, as doubtless there will be hereafter, many exceptional cases.

Ah, Mr. President, let Senators read the decision of this tribunal made in 1863:

> We shall never immolate truth, justice, and the law because a State tribunal has erected the altar and decreed the sacrifice. (Gelpcke vs. City of Dubuque, 1 Wallace, 206.)

And they reversed the decision of the State court in that case.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator state how the Supreme Court got jurisdiction of the case? What was the question?

Mr. WHYTE. I gave my friend from Indiana a reference to the authority; and when he comes to it, if he can untie the knot I shall be very much pleased to hear him.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator if there was not some question arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States that gave the court jurisdiction?

Mr. WHYTE. It did no such thing. It was a question in regard to railroad bonds, exclusively belonging to the constitution and laws of the State of Iowa. Thank God, this judicial tribunal had manliness enough to tell us that when inferior tribunals or supreme State courts sought to bind us to fraud and injustice, we were not bound to follow them into the mire of such a course.

But that is not all, Mr. President. The Senator from Indiana is not content to bind us with the shackles of this beautiful court in the State of Louisiana, organized for the very purpose of the decision, as in old times they used to say of courts-martial, "organized to convict." Not satisfied with binding us with the shackles of a State court, one of whose judges had been one of the Lynch returning board that perpetrated the frauds on the people of Louisiana, he tells us that he has got another collar on our necks.

Mr. WEST. Will the Senator pardon me? I did not catch his expression exactly. Did I understand him to say that one of the judges of the supreme court of Louisiana had been a member of the Lynch returning board?

Mr. WHYTE. One of the judges of one of those Louisiana courts, Hawkins, I say was a member of the Lynch returning board.

Mr. WEST. But he was a judge of an inferior court and never had this question before him. He was appointed subsequently.

Mr. WHYTE. One of the decisions of an inferior court was read, as I understand—for I cannot find the book—and that was a decision from that very court of which Hawkins was a judge. I may be wrong for I have not seen the book; but I thought it was so read.

Mr. WEST. It was the same court, but not the same judge.

Mr. WHYTE. The same court but not the same judge! They change their judges so quickly down there that I do not know whether at the moment of the decision Hawkins had got in or got out. [Laughter.] They have a summary mode of executing people on the bench in Louisiana in these days.

Mr. WEST. Yes, and the Senator is quite as adroit in changing his position too.

Mr. WHYTE. I have not tried to do so in the slightest degree. But I was going to say, that we are admonished also that the President has recognized the Kellogg government and that we are bound by that recognition. I admit that under advice which probably came from his own law officer and which he was bound to respect, he not being a lawyer and the presumption being that the Attorney-General of the United States was a good one, the President may have been induced to recognize a government that was unlawful in its character. He was so induced, and he recognized some one whom he found in possession, as he says. But whom did he recognize? Did he recognize the lawfully elected governor of Louisiana? Did he recognize the man who had received the most lawful votes at the election for governor of Louisiana? Did he sustain with the Army of the United States the Legislature whose members received the most votes for legislators in Louisiana? No, sir; he recognized a man who had no title whatever to the office which he held; and I regret to say it; I blush with shame when I reflect upon that page of American history which shall contain these words, which I read from the message of the President of the United States sent into this body on the 13th of January, 1875; sent here for our edification, for our information; sent here so that when we come to act upon this question of Louisiana affairs we may act intelligently, knowing the facts. While I blush that I have to make such an admission, I thank the President of the United States for plainly and bluntly telling us the truth:

> It has been bitterly and persistently alleged that Kellogg was not elected. Whether he was or not is not altogether certain, nor is it any more certain that his competitor, McEnery, was chosen. The election was a gigantic fraud, and there are no reliable returns of its result.

And here we are asked to be bound by a recognition of the Kellogg government by the President, who, we must presume, has done it in the interest of peace; he might have believed that it was necessary for the preservation of the peace for him to take that step; but now when we come to act upon the case of the election of Pinchback and the election of the Legislature which chose him to this body, we have the President qualifying his recognition by telling us that the whole "election was a gigantic fraud."

Sir, shall we follow such recognition with these facts before our face? No, sir. If the supreme court of Louisiana had decided that the Legislature was a true and lawful Legislature, we are not bound by it; we are not bound by the recognition of the President of the United States if the whole statement made by him was, that it was a true and lawful election; but least of all are we bound when he tells us that the whole thing was "a gigantic fraud;" that there was no reliable result of the election ever ascertained.

But, Mr. President, we are not left to these statements. Every Senator who has sought to inform himself on this subject (though those of us who have come here so recently have been compelled, I admit, to cram) from the report—this voluminous report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections made by Senator Carpenter—those of us who have sought to do our duty here have found the findings of that committee, at least I have, honest and just, and I shall be bound by them because in my conscience I believe it is the nearest truth that upon the evidence we can get. What do they show briefly? That report discloses this fact, that the actual returns of the election in Warmoth's hands which were not counted at first by the Wharton board but were counted by the De Feriet board, the board appointed by Governor Warmoth after the repealing law had been signed by him in November, 1872—a new board—and counted again by the Forman board afterward in the State senate, showed that McEnery had a majority of 9,606 over Kellogg; that the senate, with those holding over, stood—democrats 22, republicans 11, vacancies 2; the House stood—democrats and conservatives 71, republicans 39, vacancies 7. This Legislature met in extra session on the 9th of December, 1872, and were recognized by Governor Warmoth as the legal Legislature, and then the board appointed by the senate examined the returns and gave McEnery a majority of 11,288.

Any Senator can look at the report from pages 75 to 83 and he will find there the returns given by the Committee on Privileges and Elections from the papers which were produced in their committee-room. But the committee believed that there were vast frauds and such intimidation as to render the election no fair expression of the popular will, and so reported it to be utterly null and void. The Senate knows that that committee tried to get a bill passed ordering a new election, which failed; but whatever may be thought of the provisions of that bill, that is not a question now before the Senate. But the canvass of the Lynch board, the board which Pinchback recognized, the board which counted in Kellogg and counted in the Legislature by whom Pinchback was elected—the canvass of that board has become a scandal and a reproach everywhere.

Now, in addition to what has been said by the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections in regard to the count of the Lynch board, allow me to read from the report made in the House of Representatives in the case of Sheridan vs. Pinchback. I maintain that all these documents and papers are to be taken and properly taken into consideration in deciding this case.

The same investigation which relates to this contest has also been had in the other House, and it is a remarkable circumstance in American political history. When the contest took place in the other House between Sheridan and Pinchback, the Committee on Elections was instructed to investigate that case. What was the anomalous condition of things which there occurred? I do not profess to have obtained all the political information on the subject that can be secured; but I have never heard before of a case of like character in any legislative body. While a gentleman is knocking at the door of the Senate, with his credentials from the State of Louisiana, claiming a seat in this body, he is standing also at the door of the House of Representatives, claiming a seat in that body for the same period of time, one seat for two years and the other for six years, including the same two years of the Forty-third Congress. His case was on trial after the beginning of the first session of that Congress. One of the members from Massachusetts introduced a resolution into the House of Representatives proposing to admit Sypher and Pinchback, and one other, to seats on the floor of the House of Representatives as members of the Forty-third Congress; but that statesman from Massachusetts, who generally looks before he leaps, began to realize that if the House of Representatives admitted Pinchback to a seat there, his claim in the Senate was gone. So he gave him the privilege that we often see in the circus, of riding two horses. He had his eye on a seat in the Senate and he had his eye on a seat in the House. How could he help winning one? It seemed to be beyond human comprehension that he could fail in both. But the Representative from Massachusetts saw the difficulty, and with that astuteness for which we all give him credit, he quietly took Mr. Pinchback out of the resolution and sent his case to the Committee on Elections. What did they do there? Kept Sheridan out in the cold until the last hours of the expiring Forty-third Congress. Then they came to the conclusion that Pinchback had not a ghost of a claim. That is not all. Both the majority of the House committee and the minority of that committee reported against Pinchback; and yet he was a candidate for Congressman at large, running over the whole State with Kellogg, side by side with Kellogg, counted in by the Lynch board with Kellogg, while Sheridan was running on the McEnery ticket, side by side with John McEnery. What did the majority of the House committee say about the Lynch board that counted Mr. Pinchback in the other House and Mr. Kellogg into the executive department of Louisiana?

When this contest was first presented to the committee, the contestee, Pinchback, rested his case upon the canvass of the board known as "the Lynch board." Upon examination the committee were satisfied that the Lynch board made its canvass without the presence of any primary statements of election or official data, and which the committee deemed insufficient to show his title to the seat claimed by him.

And then when speaking of the count in favor of Sheridan by the De Feriet board, see what the majority of the House committee say of that:

Assuming that the original "primary returns" made to the governor from all the parishes of the State but two were received by him, opened by him in the presence of the Wharton board, delivered by him to the De Feriet board, and transmitted to the Forman board just as they had been received, (and these facts the additional proof shows,) we are to look to what these returns show. They show that contestant, Sheridan, received 65,016 votes—

Which differs from McEnery's vote, that being 65,529. McEnery received only 500 more votes on that De Feriet count than Sheridan—

They show that contestant, Sheridan, received 65,016 votes, and contestee, Pinchback, 54,402 votes—

While the De Feriet board gave Kellogg 55,973.

As to the correctness of this tabulation we have the sworn testimony of Mitchell, Forman, and Thomas, a majority of the board; and, in addition to this, the admission of the contestee (page 3 of additional testimony) that it is a compilation of the returns before the Forman board.

And the committee say it is conclusive and they declare that Sheridan "was entitled to the seat" and had been entitled to it from the very beginning of the Forty-third Congress; and yet he only obtained it in the expiring hours of that session. Now what does the minority, which reported that Sheridan was not entitled to his seat, say about the Lynch board:

Is Mr. Pinchback shown entitled upon the merits to this seat?
Your committee think not. Mr. Pinchback's original certificate, it was conceded, and Governor Kellogg's supplemental certificate, it is to be assumed, were issued upon the pretended canvass by the returning board known as the "Lynch board." Assuming that the Lynch board was the legal returning board—

A committee of the House assuming that the Lynch board was the legal returning board! Giving the board that benefit—and waiving the consideration of the effect of Mr. Pinchback's default in making no response to Mr. Sheridan's notice of contest, your committee are of opinion that the fact that the Lynch board never had possession of the election returns, and therefore never canvassed them, has become a part of the political history of the country. They hold this fact to be so notorious that the House ought to take legislative notice of it in this contest, and may take like notice of it for the purpose of any appropriate legislation. They report, therefore, that upon the case as presented to your committee, Mr. Pinchback is not shown to be entitled to a seat in this House.

That is signed by Messrs. Smith, Hazelton, Hyde, Todd, and Thomas, five of the members of the Committee on Elections of the House of Representatives. My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] yesterday interrupted the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] while he was speaking in regard to this election, and I know that he will pardon me for referring to the fact when it is only to give him some information which he yesterday asked for. The Senator from Wisconsin asked whether the De Feriet board had not thrown out certain parishes in their count. The Senator from Delaware was not at the moment quite prepared to answer the question. While he was speaking I examined the records and made up a tabulation to meet that inquiry, but did not like to disturb the proceedings of the Senate by introducing it. The De Feriet board did refuse to count six parishes—Iberia, Iberville, Saint James, Saint Martin, Saint Tammany, and Terre Bonne. Look at the result declared by the Lynch board, made up as we all know that tabulation was made up from some copies of returns that they got from the United States supervisors, from newspaper reports, from false affidavits made to order as confessed by one of the witnesses, from a general estimate according to population and the old party vote as to what the vote ought to have been. Taking it with all those fallacies and absurdities, I give the Kellogg government the benefit of those six parishes, and let us see how the vote stands. McEnery had 65,579 and Kellogg had 55,973, according to the De Feriet board. The Forman board of the senate increased McEnery's majority to 11,000, but for the sake of the argument I take the lowest majority, 9,606; and I take Iberia Parish from the Lynch board, as given on page 191 of Mr. Carpenter's report, and I give Kellogg a majority of 349; I give him in Iberville 1,548; I give him in Saint James 1,195; I give him in Saint Martin 48; and in good old Saint Tammany I give him 1; in Terre Bonne, 186—making 3,327, which deducted from the 9,606 still leaves McEnery's majority 6,279.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator tell me where he gets those returns?
Mr. WHYTE. Yes, sir; from page 190 of Mr. Carpenter's report.
Mr. HOWE. But where did Mr. Carpenter's report get those returns?
Mr. WHYTE. From the report of the Lynch board.
Mr. HOWE. From the return of the Lynch board?
Mr. WHYTE. Yes, sir.
Mr. HOWE. Now, either Mr. Carpenter made a mistake or the Senator from Maryland made a mistake, or the Lynch board made a mistake in stating its own returns.
Mr. WHYTE. It is more than likely I have made the mistake.
Mr. HOWE. If the Senator from Maryland will give me the parishes——
Mr. WHYTE. I have not time; but I will give you the pages of the book, which I have marked.
Mr. HOWE. The six parishes.
Mr. WHYTE. If you will look at the return of the De Feriet board you will see they are left blank.
Mr. HOWE. We are talking about the Lynch board, not the De Feriet board. One of the parishes was Iberia, was it not?
Mr. WHYTE. Yes, sir.
Mr. HOWE. The Lynch board returned its vote at 965 for Kellogg and 616 for McEnery. Another parish was Iberville, was it not?
Mr. WHYTE. Yes, sir. Iberia Parish, which I find on page 190, is returned 965 for Kellogg and 616 for McEnery. That was the way I put it down.
Mr. HOWE. Now Iberville was another?
Mr. WHYTE. Yes, sir.
Mr. HOWE. Iberville was 2,239 for Kellogg.
Mr. WHYTE. And 691 for McEnery, and that gives 1,548 majority, according to my arithmetic.
Mr. HOWE. What was the next?
Mr. WHYTE. Eighteen hundred and fifty-two for Kellogg in Saint James, and 657 for McEnery.
Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir. What is next?
Mr. WHYTE. Saint Martin, 718 for Kellogg, 670 for McEnery.
Mr. HOWE. Yes. What is next?
Mr. WHYTE. Saint Tammany, 112 for Kellogg and 111 for McEnery.
Mr. HOWE. Yes. What is next?
Mr. WHYTE. Terre Bonne, 1,593 for Kellogg and 1,407 for McEnery.

Mr. HOWE. In each of the parishes Kellogg had a large majority, but in all the parishes McEnery had a large majority. Besides, this is only the effect which would be produced upon the result by the counting of the six parishes not counted at all by the McEnery board. When you have done that, before you undertake to state actual results in Louisiana you must correct the returns from parishes from which forged returns are alleged to have been presented, and in addition to that, if the Senator will allow me, you must ascertain as well as you can what precincts from parishes giving partial returns were thrown out by the supervisor and in what precincts the commissioners of election stuffed the boxes. These corrections must be made before you can undertake to state definitely what was the return according to the fact.

Mr. WHYTE. The Senator from Wisconsin entirely misunderstood me if he supposed that I was arguing in favor of McEnery's right to the seat of governor of Louisiana. I have not said a word of that character on this floor. I have accepted the report of the Senator from Wisconsin, the late colleague of the present Senator, as the basis of my discussion of this case.

Mr. HOWE. I understood the Senator to be arguing the proposition that if the returns from the six rejected parishes were added to the vote, take those returns as the Lynch board stated them, McEnery's majority would be larger instead of smaller.

Mr. WHYTE. I made no such argument.

Mr. HOWE. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly the Senator from Wisconsin entirely misunderstood me. The only reference I made to those returns was to correct the Senator who yesterday stated what I am satisfied he believes to be true, that Kellogg was elected governor of Louisiana by the votes polled at that election.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir; I believe that.

Mr. WHYTE. He stated that yesterday; and when the Senator from Delaware referred to the count he said "Yes, but in that count you have thrown out six parishes;" and all for which I have referred to the six parishes is to show that if we put into the De Feriet count the count of the Lynch board as to those six parishes, the most favorable count that can be made for Kellogg, it does not better Kellogg's case but still leaves McEnery a large majority.

Mr. HOWE. Well, Mr. President, I admit if you only make the corrections which the returns from those six parishes require, still McEnery will have a majority; but then I say you must make further deductions because of returns made from other parishes which are said to have been forged and not true returns, and then again from other returns made from other parishes you must make large deductions because of stuffed ballot-boxes, the testimony of which is here. I did not mention these other facts yesterday, because the Senator from Delaware said very shrewdly and candidly that he preferred to make his own speech, and I knew he could make his speech a great deal better than I could make it, and I yielded at once.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will pardon me if I now, in view of the detailed statement made by the Senator from Maryland as to the true results of the election by the actual count, ask him to withdraw the opinion which he expressed yesterday that Kellogg was elected.

Mr. HOWE. No; I would rather repeat the statement, if it is all the same to my friends on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, of course the Senator from Wisconsin has the advantage of me; he has been here for a long-continued period and has listened to all these debates. One of my friends in the rear says he is to be pitied, and probably he is. [Laughter.] Probably the Senate is more to be pitied now, for I am taking up so much of its time.

Mr. HOWE. I was about to make a request of my friend. I know he has no animosity against me, and I think he ought not to charge me with having listened to all the speeches that have been made on this subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHYTE. I was going to ask my friend from Wisconsin a question myself, whether or not when he was speaking of forgeries awhile ago he did not know and did not hear during the flagellation of speech upon this subject that he has received during the last Congress, whether it was not beaten into him, that those forged returns actually if thrown out made in favor of McEnery's government?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, I have heard that said on this floor. Exactly what effect would be produced by substituting true returns for forged returns, I do not think has been accurately calculated even in this protracted debate heretofore, and I am sure my friend, if he is discreet, will not undertake to calculate it just now.

Mr. WHYTE. Now then, Mr. President, I do not see how my friend from Wisconsin and I can differ. I do not see why we cannot vote together. I am content to believe that there was a vast amount of wrong and forgery and intimidation, if you please, in that election in Louisiana. I do not admire the system of election tactics that prevails in some regions of country. I have myself in early life felt some of the adverse effects of fraud and perjury and intimidation and rascality at the polls, and I know that there are bad men in all parties who often assume the machinery of elections and compromise the honest. That which I did more than twenty years ago in the House of Representatives I stand here to-day to do, protest against fraud and rascality at elections and to exclude from this body and the other House every man who comes with credentials tainted with violence and fraud. I care not to what party he belongs, he degrades either and he shall never receive my support and my sustentation.

No, sir; I am on the record in regard to that, in those days when blood ran through the streets of my own city and fraud was rampant at every polling place. Send them back whenever they come here with polluted certificates of election. Let us act together and unite on such common grounds as this, and I pledge myself to the Senator from Wisconsin whenever the facts disclose that a fair expression of the popular will was not had, I will stand side by side with him and close these doors upon a man of any party that comes to pollute the integrity of this body. Now let the Senator stand upon that platform of patriotism with me.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator will allow me to assure him that I will stand there as long as I am able to stand anywhere.

Mr. WHYTE. I have no doubt of it; and with all his intelligence, when he comes to decide that question his judgment will be based upon facts and not upon feelings.

But, sir, I know that I have wearied the Senate. It seems to have been presumption in me to have occupied its time, coming so recently within its walls; but I consider this question vital to the purity of election; I consider it vital to the peace and perpetuity of the established institutions of our country; I consider that it addresses itself to our consciences and to our sense of right; and therefore as long as I am a member of this body I feel that I shall be faithless to my duty if I do not stand up here to protest against any man's admission who does not come "elected by the lawful Legislature of a State."

But, Mr. President, I meant to say, when talking about recognition, what did this Senate do and what did the House of Representatives do when you came to count the last electoral vote for President of the United States? Were not the electors chosen at the same election? Were there not the same reasons applying? Were there not two sets of electors acting in Louisiana, some voting for Greeley and some for Grant? Were there not two returns before the joint convention? And what did you? You counted out the vote of Louisiana altogether.

Now, Mr. President, all I ask, all that any fair and reasonable man can ask, is that the Senate will approach this subject bound by no recognition whether of President or judicial authority, bound only as under the Constitution of the United States we are bound by our sense of duty, by the principles of justice, by the rules, which should govern us in distinguishing between right and wrong.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] to the authority which he referred to as showing that there are cases in which the Supreme Court of the United States will not follow the decisions of the State courts upon questions arising under the constitution and laws of the State. I asked him if there was not some question of Federal authority arising in that case upon which the Supreme Court of the United States could act. He said not. The Senator was mistaken. In the first place, the court got jurisdiction of the case because the plaintiff was a citizen of another State and the defendant was a citizen of Iowa. The Supreme Court in that case recognized the general doctrine fully and strongly, but they made it an exception simply upon this ground: There had been a long current of decisions recognizing the power of the Legislature of Iowa to create municipal corporations with authority to issue bonds; there had been, however, recently a decision of the supreme court of that State denying that authority; but the bond in controversy had been issued by a corporation while the supreme court of that State was affirming the authority of the corporations; and therefore the question came up broadly whether the second decision of the supreme court of Iowa if applied to a previous contract was not in the nature of a law impairing the obligation of contracts and prohibited by the Constitution of the United States. There is where the question arose; and the Supreme Court of the United States used the following language in the very opinion to which the Senator referred:

> The sound and true rule is that if the contract, when made, was valid by the laws of the State as then expounded by all departments of the Government and administered in its courts of justice, its validity and obligation cannot be impaired by any subsequent action of legislation or decision of its courts altering the construction of the law.
> The same principle applies where there is a change of judicial decision as to the constitutional power of the Legislature to enact the law. To this rule, thus enlarged, we adhere. It is the law of this court. It rests upon the plainest principles of justice. To hold otherwise would be as unjust as to hold that rights acquired under a statute may be lost by its repeal. The rule embraces this case.
> Bonds and coupons like these, by universal commercial usage and consent, have all the qualities of commercial paper. If the plaintiffs recover in this case, they will be entitled to the amount specified, &c. (1 Wallace, 206.)

It was put upon that ground and upon that ground only, that it was in effect to impair the obligation of the contract, which the Constitution of the United States expressly prohibited, and even in that case a minority of the court dissented, and Judge Miller held that even in that case the United States courts were bound to follow the decision of the State courts, and went on to state the doctrine at great length in a very able opinion; so that this case does not at all interfere with the statement that I made in regard to what was the uniform decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to the resolution of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.]

Mr. CONKLING. If no Senator wishes to address the Senate, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business—a motion which I will withdraw, of course, if any Senator wishes to take the floor.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at three o'clock and forty-four minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, March 15, 1875.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

FISH AND FISHERIES.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print six hundred additional copies of the report of Professor Baird on fish and fisheries, have instructed me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That six hundred additional copies of the third report of Professor Spencer F. Baird, Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, with the accompanying documents, be printed for the use of the Senate.

MISSISSIPPI ALLUVIAL BASIN.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print five thousand copies of the report of the commission of engineers on the best plan for the redemption of the alluvial basin of the Mississippi River, have instructed me to report it with an amendment, and I ask its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent.

The amendment of the Committee on Printing was to strike out "five" and insert "two" before "thousand;" so as to read:

Resolved, That two thousand copies of the report of the commission of engineers appointed in compliance with the act of Congress approved June 22, 1874, to investigate and report a permanent plan for the reclamation of the alluvial basin of the Mississippi River subject to inundation be printed for the use of the Committee on the Levees of the Mississippi River.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

DISTRIBUTION OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, a resolution which I drew very inadvertently was passed last week, directing that the same number of copies of the Revised Statutes that were distributed to Senators during the last Congress be distributed to the new Senators. I did not reflect that as the distribution of that document was ordered by act of Congress the usual reserve which is made in the folding-room for extra copies was not made. Consequently there are no such copies for distribution. The distribution is regulated strictly by law and is intrusted to the Secretary of State, who has no authority whatever to distribute a copy except according to the provisions of the act. But it is in the power of the Senate to print as many as will come within the cost of $500, which will give, I think, six or eight copies to each of the new Senators, and at the next session the inequality can be corrected. I therefore, by direction of the Committee on Printing, offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Congressional Printer print and bind so many additional copies of the Revised Statutes as can be printed and bound at a cost of $500; and that the same be distributed among the newly-elected Senators.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask whether the previous resolution ought not to be reconsidered or rescinded?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly. I move that the resolution which was passed the other day be rescinded. It is beyond the power of the Senate to do what it ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the resolution passed on the 12th instant in relation to this subject be rescinded.

The motion was agreed to.

EMIGRATION TO THE BLACK HILLS.

Mr. INGALLS. I beg leave to offer the following resolution for present consideration:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with public interests, any information in his possession in regard to the proposed emigration to the Black Hills country in the Sioux Indian reservation; whether such emigration is with the consent of the Indian tribes holding said country under the treaty of February 24, 1869, and if not, what measures will be taken in relation to the same.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to hear the resolution read again.

The resolution was read.

Mr. EATON. I beg to ask if that resolution does not come under the objection which was made by my colleague the other day?

Mr. INGALLS. I think it does not, from the fact that it relates purely to an anticipated infraction of an existing treaty between the Government and the Sioux Indians, which was ratified by the Senate in 1869. It proposes no legislation, but is simply an inquiry addressed to the President.

Mr. EATON. I thought the closing terms of the resolution, if they meant anything, meant that some body, either this body or some other, would do something. I may have misunderstood the terms of the resolution. Let the Clerk report it again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be again read.

The Chief Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. EATON. I do not like to interpose a point of order, but it strikes me that we are asking of the President of the United States through this resolution for certain information, and under certain contingencies we ask what shall be done. What is the meaning of that, unless it is that something shall be done by the President of the United States or by this or some other body? It strikes me that it looks clearly to legislation, else the resolution is useless.

Mr. INGALLS. I trust there will be no objection to the adoption of this resolution. It certainly is not amenable to the point of order intimated by the Senator from Connecticut, from the fact that it merely asks the President what steps he proposes to take in case there is any infraction of an existing treaty.

Mr. BOGY. There is no legislation.

Mr. INGALLS. There is no legislation anticipated or proposed by the resolution; and if anything is to be done, it cannot be done too speedily.

It is probably known to most Senators that the Sioux are the most ferocious, blood-thirsty, and implacable of all the Indian tribes now in the northwestern portion of our country. They number about fifty thousand, of which number about forty thousand have been in the receipt of rations at various Indian agencies for the past four years, and ten thousand remain entirely intractable. In 1868, upon the 29th day of April, a treaty was concluded between the various bands of Sioux Indians and the United States, General Sherman, General Harney, General Augur, General Terry, and others acting for the Government, and one hundred and eighty-four chiefs and head-men acting on the part of the Sioux. The second article of that treaty provides—

That the following district of country, to wit, namely, commencing on the east bank of the Missouri River where the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude crosses the same, then along low-water mark down said east bank to a point opposite where the northern line of the State of Nebraska strikes the river, thence west across said river and along the northern line of Nebraska to the one hundred and fourth degree of longitude west from Greenwich, thence north on said meridian to a point where the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude intercepts the same, thence due east along said parallel to the place of beginning; and in addition thereto all existing reservations on the east bank of said river shall be, and the same is, set apart for the absolute and undisturbed use and occupation of the Indians herein named and for such other friendly tribes or individual Indians as from time to time they may be willing, with the consent of the United States, to admit among them.

The sixteenth article of said treaty further provides—

That the country north of the North Platte River and east of the summits of the Big Horn Mountains shall be held and considered to be unceded Indian territory, and also stipulates and agrees that no white person or persons shall be permitted to settle upon or occupy any portion of the same.

In consideration of these agreements, the Sioux Indians stipulated—

First. That they will withdraw all opposition to the construction of the railroads now being built on the plains.

Second. That they will permit the peaceful construction of any railroad not passing over their reservation as herein defined.

Third. That they will not attack any persons at home, or traveling, nor molest or disturb any wagon trains, coaches, mules, or cattle belonging to the people of the United States, or to persons friendly therewith.

Fourth. They will never capture or carry off from the settlements white women or children.

Fifth. They will never kill or scalp white men, nor attempt to do them harm.

Sixth. They withdraw all pretense of opposition to the construction of the railroad now being built along the Platte River and westward to the Pacific Ocean, and they will not in future object to the construction of railroads, wagon-roads, mail stations, or other works of utility or necessity, which may be ordered or permitted by the laws of the United States. But should such roads or other works be constructed on the lands of their reservation the Government will pay the tribe whatever amount of damage may be assessed by three disinterested commissioners to be appointed by the President for that purpose, one of said commissioners to be a chief or head-man of the tribe.

Seventh. They agree to withdraw all opposition to the military posts or roads now established south of the North Platte River, or that may be established, not in violation of treaties heretofore made or hereafter to be made with any of the Indian tribes.

The enormous reservation set apart by this treaty lies in the southwestern portion of the Territory of Dakota. In the western part of that territorial area is a region of country known as the "Black" Hills, from the dark forests of stunted pine by which they are covered; a semi-mountainous region, a lateral or outlying spur of the main Rocky Mountain range; an irregular circle whose greatest diameter is roughly estimated at one hundred miles and whose circumference is described by the north and south forks of the Big Cheyenne River which rise in Wyoming Territory, sweep in curves from the west, and swollen by affluents which descend from the eastern declivities of the hills, unite about the center of the reservation and form one of the main tributaries of the Missouri River.

It has for a long time been rumored that gold existed in large deposits in the "Black Hills," and it is apparent from indications now received from many sources—newspaper statements, letters from special correspondents, and others—that we are on the eve of an organized emigration from the western portions of the country to what is known as the "Black Hills country," which is a part of the Sioux Indian reservation held under the most sacred guarantees by these Indians and which the United States are bound to maintain, protect, and defend by every obligation of honor.

If this were merely a question between the gold-hunters and the Indians, I could view the result with entire composure; but the difficulty lies here: these Indians are already disturbed and exasperated by the military expedition of last summer under General Custer. They are further irritated by the reports now current in regard to the proposed invasion of their territory. They are implacable and intractable; and the danger is that if this movement is permitted to go on they will consider themselves released from those treaty obligations, descend upon the unprotected frontier settlements of Dakota, Nebraska, and Kansas, and that we shall have another bloody summer of Indian rapine and massacre.

Now, sir, the object of my resolution is not unfriendly to this proposed expedition. If there is gold, or timber, or valuable land in that country it will some time or other be occupied by the white race. So far as I am concerned the sooner the better; but I am very solicitous that immediate steps should be taken to advise the people of the West, in the first place, that this country is held under treaty obligations, that it is occupied by the Sioux under guarantees that the United States are bound to protect and defend; and in the second place to notify the people who now threaten to invade this country what perils they will incur and to what dangers they will expose the unoffending settlers of the border.

I hope, therefore, sir, in order to enable the President to make an authoritative declaration of the condition of this country and of the course that he will be compelled to pursue if this proposed expedition goes on, that no objection will be offered to the passage of this resolution.

I may add that while the number of those who propose to join these expeditions is uncertain, some placing it as high as thirty thousand, some as high as fifty thousand, I have no doubt that by the middle of April, unless the President authoritatively interferes and perhaps in spite of his interference, there will be not less than fifteen thousand people in the Black Hills country within the Sioux Indian reservation; and in this event, with the present temper that exists among those Indians, I greatly fear that it will precipitate upon the western settlements of Kansas, Nebraska, and Dakota all the horrors of border Indian warfare.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, perhaps I am in error in regard to this resolution being liable to the objection which I suggested. While I am not the especial defender of the President of the United States on this floor, I beg to ask his especial friends if they have any doubt that he will do his full duty in regard to the carrying out of treaties? I have no doubt myself, although I do not belong to the party to which I allude, that the President of the United States will do his entire duty in this matter and take such steps as may be necessary. At all events I beg to ask what good the passage of this resolution will do? If it should be passed and sent to the President and should draw from him a communication to us, what good would that do throughout this broad land? I apprehend, while I do not make any objection to the resolution, that the passage of it will do no good, and I am entirely confident that the President will do his full duty in the premises as to informing all the people of the rights of the Indians to that land.

Mr. INGALLS. I share the confidence that the Senator from Connecticut expresses in the intention of the President to perform his whole duty. I have no doubt that he will discharge every obligation devolved upon him by the terms of this treaty, which is one of the most important ever made between this Government and the Indian nations of the Northwest.

The Senator further inquires what good will be accomplished by the adoption of this resolution. It will do good in many important particulars. In the first place, it will advise the people of the Northwest of the tenure, the title, by which this reservation is held, of which many of them are now ignorant. That fact alone, I am convinced, will deter those citizens who are law-abiding and intelligent from joining what would then appear to be an unlawful expedition. In the second place, it will be beneficial by advising the country at large as to what steps the President will take to prevent any proposed infraction of that treaty; whether he proposes to station troops there; whether he intends to establish posts and garrisons there; in other words, whether the people who propose to join these expeditions will be compelled to meet the armed force of the Government and conquer their way into the territory.

I believe, sir, that the President will feel called upon to maintain and uphold the guarantees of this treaty by all the power at his command. I think it is his duty to do so. But at the same time so long as the country is left in doubt what his duties are and what steps are to be taken, there is danger that men may presume upon the fact that they will be allowed to enter the country without opposition; and the Senator knows perfectly well that if anything is to be done it must be done promptly. By the middle of April, or as soon as there is sufficient grass upon the plains to furnish subsistence for stock, these expeditions will be en route for that region. Transportation companies, as we are informed by the papers, have been organized in Sioux City, in Yankton, and at various other places upon the Missouri River. Stage lines are about to be established. Everything indicates that we are on the eve of another one of those subtle contagions commonly called a "gold fever," an epidemic that will result perhaps in disaster and ruin to thousands of people like that of Pike's Peak in 1859 and others that are within the memory of Senators.

As the Senator from Connecticut intimates that this action certainly can do no harm and that he does not propose to resist it, and as in my judgment it is a matter of exceeding importance to protect the frontier settlers of Dakota, Nebraska, and Kansas from the dangers now threatening of Indian massacre, I hope the Senate will adopt the resolution promptly.

The resolution was agreed to.

CASE OF W. K. SEBASTIAN.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, presented a letter of C. C. Washburn covering a statement of facts connected with the petition of the heirs of the late William K. Sebastian, praying for the annulment of the resolution of the Senate for his expulsion from the Senate in 1861; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SAULSBURY presented additional papers pertaining to the application of the heirs of the late William K. Sebastian, United States Senator from Arkansas, praying the annulment of the order of his expulsion from the Senate; which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. ALCORN, it was Ordered, That F. Moore, of Horn Lake, Mississippi, have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution submitted by Mr. MORTON on the 5th instant:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback be admitted as a Senator from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years, beginning the 4th day of March, 1873.

The pending question being on the amendment of Mr. EDMUNDS to insert before "admitted" the word "not."

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Mr. President, I desire to say a very few words upon that branch of the argument of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] which had reference to the effect of the decision of the President of the United States as to the legitimacy of a State executive or Legislature when the President is called upon to suppress domestic violence in a State. I listened to that argument a year ago with much interest; but at the same time I thought then that it was rather a final resort of a debater in pursuance of authority for his case than a serious claim under the Constitution which that Senator would insist upon with the pertinacity with which he has adhered to it from that day to this. And it seems that his views upon that particular branch of the case have not only not altered with the progress of time, but have become so firm and stable that he regards that branch of his argument, in his own language, as unanswered and unanswerable. While I do not pretend to attempt a detailed answer to the argument, yet that Senator is so able, he occupies so prominent a position in this body, that when this case shall be examined in time to come in search of precedents I am unwilling to have the opinion expressed by the Senator go upon the record without at least my protest against it.

I shall endeavor to state as concisely as possible the proposition which I deduce from the argument of the Senator from Indiana with regard to the effect of the President's decision, and I will state that proposition as I understand it. It is that when the President is called upon to suppress domestic violence under the act of 1795 his compliance with the call involves the determination of the lawfulness of the authority making the call, whether it be the State executive or the Legislature; and the Senate, in judging of the election and returns of a person claiming to have been chosen a Senator from that State, is conclusively bound by such determination of the President till Congress shall have made a different decision, so that the Senate may not inquire whether the person signing the election return be the governor of the State or whether the assemblage which chose the claimant to be a Senator was the Legislature of the State, if such person or assemblage be the same that the President has determined to be the lawful executive or legislative authority.

That I understand to be the proposition of the Senator from Indiana; and it strikes me as repugnant to the Constitution in its plainest terms and utterly destructive of the independence of both Houses of Congress.

Now let us consider for a moment the origin of the powers of the Senate upon the question now before us, and of the President in determining, so far as he does determine, the legitimacy of the authority making a call upon him to suppress domestic violence. The Senate derives its powers from the Constitution. It required no legislation, no act of Congress, to define the mode in which the Senate should exercise those powers or the machinery by which it should operate. The Senate, by the single provision of the Constitution itself, judges of the election and returns of its members; and unquestionably before any act of Congress was passed conferring on the President the power to suppress domestic violence in the manner provided by the act of 1795, the Senate, under the Constitution, alone had the right to inquire and determine whether the person signing the return was the true executive authority of the State and the power to determine whether the assemblage choosing the claimant was the true Legislature of the State. The Senate certainly possessed that power under the Constitution, and without any limitation whatever, during the first six years of the existence of this Government, for from 1789 to 1795 the act under which alone the President acquires any authority whatever was not in existence; and we are therefore presented, upon the claim of the Senator from Indiana, with the strange assertion that a mere act of Congress may devolve upon the President of the United States powers which shall limit and control conclusively a power derived by the Senate from the Constitution itself!

Well, sir, I have only to say that if such is the effect of the act of 1795, if that act has conferred upon the President the power in any case to determine conclusively upon the legitimacy of the executive or legislative authority of a State making a call upon him to suppress domestic violence, so as to control the Senate in making inquiry after the lawfulness of that authority when it is judging of the election and return of its members, then that act so far is void, for it is a clear infraction of the Constitution itself.

But, sir, I cannot give to the act of 1795 any such force as the Senator claims for it, and I think that he has fallen into an error in not considering the mischief which existed before the act of 1795 was passed and for which it provided a remedy, and the true scope and purpose of that act.

As I have said, the Senate derives its power to judge of the legitimacy of the authority choosing a Senator or signing his credentials directly from the Constitution. The President derives no authority directly from the Constitution to suppress domestic violence. The Constitution does not confer upon the President the power to suppress domestic violence. The Constitution provides that the United States shall have certain powers:

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.

The Constitution confers that power upon "the United States;" and as the suppression of domestic violence necessarily involves the exercise of the physical force of the United States, it became necessary for Congress, in order that the clause which I have read should have any effect whatever, to provide the machinery by which the physical force of the United States could be applied in the suppression of domestic violence; and therefore Congress passed the act of 1795, providing that the President, the executive branch of the Government, that which wields the physical force of the United States, should be possessed of the powers enumerated in that act in the suppression of domestic violence.

The purpose for which the act was passed and for which the power was conferred upon the President was simply to suppress domestic violence. The evil which existed before the law was passed was that there was no adequate machinery, no channel through which the physical force of the United States could pour itself to suppress domestic violence. The remedy was to confer upon the President, the executive branch of the Government, the authority in the mode provided by the statute to suppress such violence; and that is the whole scope and purpose of the authority conferred upon the President. Incidentally, where there are rival claimants either to the executive or legislative authority of the State, and one or both of the rival claimants makes its call on the President to suppress domestic violence, there incidentally the President must determine which (for the purpose for which he is to exercise his powers under this act) is the lawful authority. He is to determine it for the purpose of through that channel sending forth the Federal force to suppress the violence which is threatened or which has actually burst forth; and it is only for the purpose of accomplishing the object of that act, the suppression of domestic violence, that the President makes this his determination, and that his determination is binding against all domestic violence from any source in the contingency which has arisen. It commands physical obedience everywhere; it cannot be contradicted or denied within the scope of the power conferred upon the President by the act and for the purposes for which the act was passed. And so it continues binding to compel physical obedience from all quarters until it shall have been set aside by other competent authority. It is not needful for me to say here what I suppose that other competent authority to be. I do not agree with the Senator from Indiana upon that point; but it is not necessary for the purposes of my present argument.

Mr. MORTON. Will not the Senator state what the competent authority is to reverse that decision?

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I prefer not to state it, because it is not involved in my present argument. I do not think that under the guarantee clause of the Constitution which I have just read, conferring upon the United States power to suppress domestic violence, it is the Congress of the United States in its legislative capacity which is to determine the legitimacy of rival claimants for executive or legislative authority in a State. I understand the Senator from Indiana to take that position, that it is the Congress as a Congress that is to determine between rival claimants to executive or legislative authority in a State as to the legitimacy of the authority which they are wielding. I differ from him in that respect, and I might go on to state the opinion which I have on that subject, but it is not necessary for the purpose of my present discussion. Ultimately I do think, from other portions of the Constitution, the question might be necessarily remitted to the Congress of the United States where absolute anarchy is found to have intervened in a State owing to the conflict of rival claimants to authority and the necessity of the intervention of Federal power is created by the necessity of self-preservation. But, as I said, what is the finally competent authority is a matter which, in my judgment, is outside of the question now before the Senate. I want to confine myself to the simple question as to how the argument of the Senator from Indiana stands upon the inquiry whether the Senate, in judging of the election and returns of its members, is to be bound by a determination of the President of the United States made incidentally in the exercise of his authority under an act of Congress to suppress domestic violence, for that purpose only, and in my judgment binding only to compel physical obedience from all quarters until the absolute and final decision of the controversy between the rival claimants to State authority.

As I have said, the President is empowered with the functions set forth in the act of 1795 for the sole purpose of suppressing domestic violence—to use the common expression, to keep the peace. He determines for that purpose between the rival claimants, and according to his determination exercises the powers conferred upon him by the act of 1795, puts a stop to domestic violence on both sides and all sides, keeps the peace until the civil and political question involved between the rival claimants is settled by legitimate authority. And the question is now before us whether, pending that final decision, while the President is wielding the powers which he possesses only under the act of 1795 to keep the peace, holding the parties back from flying at one another's throats—for that is all he is doing; that is what the act of 1795 tells him to do; that is what the Constitution says the United States shall do, and the United States by an act of Congress has made the executive branch the machinery through which its physical force shall operate to keep the peace until the civil or political controversy between the rival claimants is settled; and in the mean time the assertion, the strange assertion, is set up here by the Senator that the Senate or the House, either of them, is bound by this mere incidental determination of the President in the exercise of his function of keeping the peace so conclusively that the power which both Houses confessedly possessed before the act of 1795 was passed, by virtue of the Constitution itself, is wrested from the two Houses despite the Constitution? Sir, this cannot be so.

And, finally, what is the legitimate corollary flowing from the position of the Senator from Indiana? Let me state his position again; I have read it carefully and understand it. When the President is called upon to suppress domestic violence under the act of 1795, his compliance with the call involves the determination of the lawfulness of the authority making the call, whether it be the State executive or the Legislature, and the Senate in judging of the election and returns of a person claiming to have been chosen a Senator from that State is necessarily bound by such determination of the President till Congress shall have made a different decision; so that the Senate may not inquire whether the person signing the election return be the governor of the State or whether the assemblage which chose the claimant to the Senate was the Legislature of the State, if such person or assemblage be the same that the President has determined to be the lawful executive or legislative authority. That is the proposition.

Now, in addition to what I have said, if this proposition be true the following corollary inevitably flows from it: that under such circumstances, even though the Senate may know that the person signing the return was not the governor and the assemblage choosing the claimant was not the Legislature, nevertheless it must accept both as the lawful legislative and executive authority of the State in judging of the election and returns of claimants, solely because the President has decided that fact! And that is the very case before us!

I know that it is proposed before this debate is finished to go into an argument upon the facts to prove that the report of the committee of two years ago is false in point of fact; that in point of fact Kellogg was elected and the Legislature that chose Pinchback was elected; and that the report of the committee is false in both those particulars. But, sir, it is too late to set up that claim now; it is too late upon ingenious plausibilities which have been manufactured during the last two years to set aside a report based upon six or seven hundred pages of testimony open to every one of us, and which testimony, if carefully read, will report against the Kellogg executive and legislative authority still more decidedly than the committee of 1873 found; and there is no safe course for us, Senators, now, there can be no safe course for us, except to take the facts as to the legitimacy of the government set up there as the Kellogg government upon the basis of the report of the committee made after weeks, perhaps months, of investigation, and against the personal and political wishes at the time of the very gentlemen who made the report.

The case which I have supposed in this corollary is then the case before us. From the great volume of evidence, from the careful report of the committee, we as a Senate know that when that assemblage in January, 1873, proceeded to choose a Senator and chose Mr. Pinchback, it was not the Legislature of Louisiana; and when William P. Kellogg in January, 1873, signed his name to that certificate of election, we know that he was not the lawful governor of Louisiana. And yet Senators who have listened to this argument and who have listened to the Senator from Indiana from beginning to end, have not heard from him one single claim with regard to that fact opposing the report of the committee except "we have the formal, technical decision of the President of the United States; we are bound by it; the argument is unanswered and unanswerable;" and though we do know that in admitting Mr. Pinchback as a Senator we are admitting the personification of infamous forgery and falsehood, yet we must do it! The power which the Constitution gave us we shall not exercise because a law made under the Constitution has given the President of the United States power to subvert our authority!

Sir, it seems to me that such claims as these only indicate the desperation of the case, and I am not surprised, when such claims of law as these have been fairly sifted by the Senate, at the last moment the ground should be changed, and instead of asserting the binding authority in law of certain official acts, we are to have a new version of the Louisiana case, and, from undiscovered testimony hitherto, to be assured that after all, after the six hundred pages of testimony tending all in one direction to show that your Kellogg executive and legislative authority was a mere sham, we are at last to be told that the truth is that Kellogg was elected, the Legislature counted in with him was the Legislature, and therefore without regard to these questions of law, upon the fact alone, Mr. Pinchback is to be entitled to a seat. It was needful to make a change of base, because upon the proposition asserted by the Senator from Indiana we are bound to find that a falsehood is the truth; we are bound to find and assert that the truth is a lie; and we are to do it upon the technical claim of the binding force of an executive determination made solely for arriving at the proper channel in which to exercise the physical force of the United States to suppress domestic violence.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I will occupy but a moment to call the attention of the Senate to the position taken by the Senator from Connecticut. First, the Senator's language in regard to what is shown by the report of two years ago, in my opinion, is not sustained. The Senate knows no such thing as he says it does, and he does not know it himself. On the contrary I think a careful analysis of that report, and of the evidence presented, disproves his statement. The Senator overlooks the fact stated by the report itself, that if McEnery was elected, it was the success of a monstrous fraud, a fraud intended to overcome an acknowledged republican majority in that State; and what the Senator insists upon is the success of the fraud.

But I do not intend to argue the fact. I simply want to call attention to the position of law taken by the Senator. If I understood him correctly, he started out with the same statement that the Supreme Court did in the case of Luther vs. Borden, that the power of the President to suppress domestic insurrection does not spring from the Constitution but springs from the act of Congress. There I agree with him, and that admission is fatal to his argument in my judgment. The Supreme Court say in that case that the whole authority of the President is derived from the act of Congress and that the act of Congress empowers him to decide which of the two governments is the lawful government, for without making that decision he cannot determine which one he will support by the Army of the United States and which one he will put down. He is first required to make that decision, and after he has made that decision he will support the one and suppress the other.

Now, what is the effect of that decision made by virtue of an act of Congress? If there is anything wrong, it is in the act of Congress. The effect of it is to bind the courts of the United States. The Supreme Court say expressly that while the contest is raging the courts of the United States will recognize that government which is recognized by the President, and they say furthermore that after the contest is over they will still recognize that government recognized by the President.

Yet if this right does not reside in the courts—

That is when the contest is raging—

when the conflict is raging, if the judicial power is at that time bound to follow the decision of the political, it must be equally bound when the contest is over. It cannot, when peace is restored, punish as offenses and crimes the acts which it before recognized and was bound to recognize as lawful.

Now what is the consequence of that? That the courts of the United States after the contest is over are still bound to recognize that government in the State which the President has recognized. Now I come to the point where the Senator I think utterly failed. He said that the Congress of the United States had not the power to reverse the decision of the President. If Congress as a Congress has not the power, where does that power reside?

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Will the Senator excuse me? I did not intend to be diverted from the direct scope of what I was saying to express any opinion as to the ultimate authority which should decide between rival claimants in a State government. I now repeat simply what I said, as the Senator does not state me exactly correct——

Mr. MORTON. I want to get the Senator exactly right.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. What I said was that I do not think Congress derives any power to decide between the rival claimants for State authority from the clause in the Constitution authorizing the United States to suppress domestic violence. That is what I said.

Mr. MORTON. Now I take the Senator upon that point. He says Congress has not the power. Then there is no power. If the President has the power to make the decision and determine which one of these governments he will sustain, and the Supreme Court say that the courts of the United States are bound to follow and to continue to recognize that decision, and if Congress has no power to reverse it, I ask if one House alone can reverse it? It comes down to the reductio ad absurdum. If Congress as a body, the two Houses acting together through legislation, have no power to reverse that decision, can one House alone do it? If it can, then one House may decide one way and the other House may decide the other way, and the courts of the United States may still decide a third way, following the decision of the President of the United States. No; there is but one logical conclusion about it, and it has not been answered. The Senator from Ohio the other day said—I will not say childishly, but he repeated it several times—"The Senator from Indiana has made that argument half a dozen times." It has never been answered, if I have; and the point is that if Congress cannot reverse that decision, there is no power to do it. But I say Congress can. I say the Constitution gives that power to Congress and to nobody else—not to one House alone.

I do not say that the Senate is bound to do anything. The Senate is not bound to recognize the governor of Connecticut. You cannot force the Senate to do anything. But I say that the doctrine of the Constitution is, and consistency requires, that when the President has made a decision in pursuance of the law, and the courts of the United States are bound to follow that decision, as the Supreme Court say they are, and the courts of the State are bound to follow it, that decision cannot be reversed except by Congress, both Houses acting together in the form of legislation; for to allow one House to do it is to make anarchy. Take the case in Rhode Island. Suppose, if you please, when the President made his decision in that case, and the courts of the United States followed that decision, and the courts of the State followed that decision, yet that the Senate of the United States had resolved to recognize the Dorr government and to admit a Senator elected by that government, what would have been the condition of the relations between Rhode Island and the United States? Does not anybody see that they would have been abnormal, absurd relations, that could not have been sustained, and clearly unconstitutional? When Congress as a Congress determine that the President has made a wrong decision, then the President is bound to follow that determination. "The United States" then, in the language of the Constitution, will have decided otherwise. But bear in mind—and that is a point the Senator fails to answer—that the President makes his decision in pursuance of law, and all the courts are bound to follow it, say the Supreme Court, until it has been reversed; and who can reverse it? The Senator even does not admit the power of Congress to reverse it; and yet he asserts the power of one body alone to reverse it and to put a Senator into this Chamber in conflict with the decision of the President and of the courts of the country.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I know the Senator does not intend to misrepresent me——

Mr. MORTON. I do not. If that is not your position, I misunderstood you.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I have stated expressly twice over that my position is that Congress does not derive any power from the authority of the United States to suppress domestic violence, to decide between contesting claimants for State authority. I have not said, either when I first spoke or in reply to the Senator's question a few moments ago, that Congress does not possess the power at all, for in my judgment when the conflict between rival claimants in a State results in the overthrow of civil government in the State with an incapacity of the resumption by the State of the faculty of civil government, Congress, on the principle of self-preservation, is bound to interfere and decide.

Mr. MORTON. I understand the Senator now. He says that Congress is bound to interfere. In other words, does the Senator mean to say that Congress does possess the power to reverse the President's decision and say that the other government is the lawful government of the State? If he means to say that, I agree with him and we come right together. But he says that doubtingly, hesitatingly. I think he ought not. I agree fully as to the power of Congress, but not as to the power of one House alone. While the President's decision stands unreversed by Congress it must be accepted by each House acting separately. Any other conclusion, it seems to me, is anarchy; any other conclusion is clearly unconstitutional.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I would have preferred not to address the Senate to-day. I am not exactly prepared. I was in hopes some Senator either on this side of the Chamber or on the other would have risen and claimed the attention of the Senate; but finding nobody else apparently inclined to do it, I will occupy their time for a brief period, premising that my remarks and perhaps my argument, from the fact that I did not expect to speak now, may be somewhat desultory and disconnected. But I am actuated to reply to a remark just made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FERRY] who claims that the republican government in Louisiana which was elected in 1872 had no basis but infamous falsehood and forgery. That is the charge which we have had continuously to meet on the part of our opponents, and I think it is time that some one should be prepared to rebuke that charge and to charge home upon our opponents that the falsehood and the forgery lie with them, and that the attempt to subvert the verdict of the people at the ballot-boxes in the State of Louisiana in 1872 was a fraud initiated and continued by our opponents and not by the republican party.

Following the example of the Senators who have hitherto participated in this debate, I offer the customary apology to those whose ears and attention are already weary of the subject, and essay to address myself to the later comers among us. I would ask the Senators of my own political faith to give attention while I show the frauds designed and perpetrated in 1872 upon the republicans of Louisiana whereby that State has been remitted to a condition of revolution, bloodshed, industrial depression, and political oppression for the past two years; where by an ingenuity almost marvelous the better has been made to appear the worse cause in the popular estimation, and the republican party throughout the nation has been held up as responsible for a political crime of great gravity, while the very perpetrators of that crime unblushingly parade themselves as innocent and denounce their victims as guilty.

I am not unmindful that there is a prevailing disgust with this so-called Louisiana case. It finds a parallel in two contemporaneous cases, one recently notorious in England and another in this country now vexing the searcher after truth. But our decision approaches, and I earnestly appeal to those of my political faith in this Chamber whose votes shall make that decision to remember the trials, the persecutions, and the sufferings of those who uphold the banner of that faith in the South. I ask them to look into all the circumstances. I ask them to believe as I do and as I think I can demonstrate if they will listen to me, that the republicans of Louisiana in 1872 were and that they are to-day in a majority, that they rightfully elected their governor in that year, that the claimant whose right to a seat in this body we are now about to determine was in every respect legally elected, that he has been indorsed again and reindorsed by the Legislature, that he is, outside of all partisan considerations, fully entitled to be admitted; and if we shall so decide, I promise them and I promise the Senate that the much vexed and dangerous Louisiana troubles will be set at rest forever; that political strife will thenceforward be confined in that State within the control customary to other sections; and that peace shall reign and bless where anarchy has brooded and blighted. To other honorable Senators of the opposite political faith I would plead for their attention that they may hear the reverse of the story ordinarily presented to them, and I would ask them to pause ere they lend themselves to the perpetration of a wrong initiated by a few unprincipled men who adopted democracy as a convenient cloak for spoils-seeking and who deliberately planned a scheme of wholesale fraud upon the elective franchise in Louisiana and have deceived and deluded the men of that party faith there, who, incapable of wrong themselves, are outraged in their delusive conviction that they have been defrauded of the government of their choice.

My proposition, Mr. President, will be to claim nothing by the so-called forged and falsified returns. Taking the returns as made by the republican board of Louisiana, I claim nothing under them; and I as emphatically deny the claim of the opposition to anything resulting from their returns. The truth of the facts is this: We had one board in that State pronounced by the highest judicial authority of that State as incompetent to deal with the returns, and that board had the returns. We had another board pronounced by that same authority as competent to take cognizance of the returns, and that board had no returns. Consequently we have no case presenting an election here, so far as returns are concerned. I shall endeavor to show that the claimant in this case, not for a seat, but the claimant, McEnery, that the democratic party carried that State has no authentic claim, and as a logical consequence, if he was not elected it follows that the republican candidate was. You can have but one determination to an election. When two men are voted for, it must be concluded that one or the other of those two men was chosen, and in denying that the democrat was elected I think I shall prove that the republican was.

Let me ask your attention, because this is the new feature in the case and I believe I am the only Senator who presents it in that light, that I go behind the returns, as we are forced in this case to go behind the certificate of the claimant. I go behind the returns and I ask you from all the evidence in this report, I ask you from the conclusions of the report itself, whether the legitimate result is not that the republican party lawfully elected their candidate on that day?

We have had the proposition stated to us again and again that the certificate of Governor Kellogg does not constitute an election of Senator by a lawful body. We are forced into this attitude by those who oppose the admission of this man. We are forced to analyze what constitutes an election. It is denied that there is anything on the face of the papers; and if they are determined to go behind our papers, I insist upon going behind theirs. Assuming for the sake of the argument that this is true, are we not then permitted to inquire whether a certificate made by a returning board that a certain man was elected governor of Louisiana in 1872 does or not constitute an election by a lawful body of electors? If we can look into the qualifications or the acts of the Legislature that elected a Senator, are we not permitted to look into the acts of the electors who elected the governor? If we can inquire whether Pinchback was not elected notwithstanding his certificate, can we not inquire whether Kellogg was elected although he has no certificate, according to the ground and position taken by our opponents? They take the ground that a certificate does not constitute an election. I adopt their argument and say the votes of the legal Legislature caused an election of Senator and the votes of the people elected the governor. If the votes of the people show that Kellogg was elected governor, the same votes will show that the Legislature that chose Mr. Pinchback Senator were also elected. I have never based the claim of either the one or the other upon returns or certificates. Kellogg's certificate can only give Pinchback a prima facie case, leaving us the authority to investigate whether the Legislature was legally chosen that sends him here as the representative of that State. In dealing with this case I maintain that we are permitted to examine into what constitutes an election for governor as well as what constitutes an election for Senator. If the proof demonstrates the fact that Kellogg was elected, it will necessarily show that the Legislature was also elected, and I think the proof is conclusive on both points.

It is necessary in the line of what I am stating for me now to examine into the political complexion—and the word is particularly appropriate in the connection in which I use it—the political complexion of the voters of Louisiana. With a maladroitness that will not stand scrutiny, the census is continually quoted as proving conclusively that the division of races is such in that State and the political affinities of those races are such that it is impossible that there should be a republican majority in that State. Merely recurring to the results of the election of 1870 in which the republican party carried that State by some twenty-odd thousand majority, I will come down to the inauguration and the initiation of the campaign that has been so long discussed here. Taking the figures of the census of 1870—and here is where I want to refute one of the fallacies that are continually thrust upon us—we find that the white and black races in Louisiana are divided, counting men, women, and children, within about two thousand difference. There are some two thousand more black inhabitants of the State of Louisiana than there are white. Taking that same census and examining the number of male adults, you discover that there are just about one hundred more white male adults than there are black; and there is where the examiners of this census who take the other side of the position from the one that I assume choose to stop in their investigation. In a recent report that we have from the House on this subject the gentlemen making the report, contrary to the opinions that I hold, use that very census. Now let us see how they use it.

The census of 1870 (the correctness of which is not impeached)—

showed 87,076 whites and 86,913 colored males over twenty-one years of age. All the statistics and evidence before us indicated no change in this proportion in favor of the colored voters.

In a previous report these very gentlemen said that they made no examination into the political condition of the State generally; but they expressed their surprise here that there should have been an increase of four thousand colored men and they say it is unaccountable. The facts are that since some of the States in our immediate vicinity have relapsed under the control of a party inimical, as they consider it, to the black men, they have largely emigrated from those States and immigrated to mine. It is then, in my judgment, easy to account for the fact that there should be an increase of the black vote over the census. Then they say that the white registration is ten thousand less than the census. As I took occasion to say to the Senate once before, had they examined from pages 619 and 629 of the census report of 1870 they would have discovered that in the State of Louisiana there are fifteen thousand unnaturalized foreigners not entitled to vote; they would have discovered that in the single parish of Orleans alone out of those fifteen thousand there are nine thousand congregated; and yet the democrats claim that they shall be legitimate voters to offset the colored men who are legal citizens.

So, taking the census, taking their very authority, taking their own documentary evidence, we have an admitted majority in that State of fifteen thousand republican voters. I know that it will be urged "Does it follow that because a man is black he votes the republican ticket?" Once more I want to quote their own authority on the subject. In the testimony taken before this Committee on Privileges and Elections there was a contestant for a seat in this body for the short term and subsequently for a seat for the long term; his name was McMillen, a gentleman for whom I entertain the highest respect; and when he was examined on oath before the committee he testified, as Senators will have the opportunity of realizing if they will examine his testimony, that there were as many black men as white men who voted opposite tickets during that campaign; that the number was about equalized; in other words, he said that from the best of his information there were five thousand white men who voted the republican ticket and he thinks there were five thousand colored men who voted the democratic ticket. So then the vote is left standing as it was on the color line, with our ascertained majority in that State of 15,000.

I know how customary it is to say that colored men are not allied to the republican party. We have had evidence on that subject here too and we have refuted that idea, and the assertion is now seldom made. There was one other witness and the only witness who gave any testimony on that subject, and he was a gentleman more noted for the volubility of his utterances than for the soundness of his judgment, and he thought there were eight thousand black men who voted the democratic ticket.

Now let me go back to the facts again, which show a presumption as to how these votes were cast and show also a corroborative presumption. The whole election machinery of that State was in the hands of our political opponents, and in manipulating the registration of the State to all the ultimate advantage that they could expect to derive from such practices, that very democratic board of registration was compelled to return a colored majority of 11,000 in the State. I will not follow the details of that election. On one side it is all fraud, and on the other side it is all guess-work. It is not necessary to go into those facts; but let us quote now the report that has been made upon which so much reliance is placed to show that we did not carry the State.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY]—to whom I listened the other day with profound respect and great regard in reference to his law points although I must be constrained to take some exception to them simply because they leave us without remedy; to use one of his own illustrations, they are "entirely circular, they end where they begin and begin where they end"—warns us of danger, and he points out to us no path of safety; but in quoting the facts he took occasion to say:

Now, according to my reading of the evidence, and according to the report made to this Senate in 1873, and those recently made to the House, the majority of the people of Louisiana are opposed to the Kellogg government.

According to the report made to the Senate in 1873!

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The Senator will allow me to say that that was in reference to this point which I made:

It has been gravely urged here that, Louisiana being entitled to two Senators upon this floor, it is a wrong to the people of that State to refuse them the enjoyment of that right.

The question of a majority of the people one way or the other, so far as it relates to my argument, was confined to the majority as it now exists, not as it existed in 1872, unless the Senator should claim that Mr. Pinchback, if now elected, would be entitled to go back and vote upon every measure which has been passed or presented here since the time of his election up to this time. The question was the hardship of depriving a State of two Senators upon this floor. I suppose the Senator will hardly claim that that hardship can be removed now so far as the past is concerned, but only as to the future. Now, I confess that the reference in that connection to the report of the Senate committee to which I alluded was entirely irrelevant and inadvertent, and I should have confined it entirely to the majority and minority report as recently made to the House of Representatives by its committee. But so far as the argument I was then making use of was concerned, I might safely concede to the gentleman that there were ten or fifteen thousand majority of the people of Louisiana, not as shown by their votes but of the population, who were in favor of the Kellogg government; it does not touch this question now, inasmuch as these reports recently made show that now a majority is opposed to the Kellogg government and consequently to Mr. Pinchback's admission here.

Mr. WEST. Well, Mr. President, I did not intend to arraign the Senator. I merely referred to him as having illustrated a position which I wanted to controvert. He states now that he made it inadvertently and unintentionally and that it does not apply to the argument, and I will not say anything further in regard to his position, but I will merely go on and maintain my own.

The Senator asks me whether the admission of Mr. Pinchback will repair the damage that has been done to my State for the last two years by the failure of the expression of his vote on various occasions. Unfortunately not. Even on a recent occasion here had Mr. Pinchback's vote been available for the State of Louisiana the inundation of the land and the destitution of that people might have been avoided. Here last year out of the coffers and by the charity of this Government we fed the starving hundreds of thousands of people in Louisiana. Here once more the benign protection of the Government was appealed to on behalf of Louisiana to save her starving people from inundation and it failed because Mr. Pinchback was not here as a Senator from Louisiana to cast a vote. His one vote would have carried the measure; and it is upon these legal technicalities that the people of Louisiana are condemned to suffer, because they are not allowed to be heard.

Now let me refer to this much lauded report. This report proves just exactly what I said in the outset, that so far as the ballots cast on that day were concerned the voice of the people was expressed in favor of the republican candidate. What does the report say?

The colored population of that State outnumbers the white, and in the last election the colored voters were almost unanimous in their support of the republican ticket.

Corroborated by the testimony that I have quoted, corroborated by the testimony of a man familiar with the politics of that State, familiar with all the proceedings of that canvass even down to their absolute iniquity, he tells you that in the main the colored men of that State cast their votes for the republican ticket, and he tells you, and this report tells you, that they are largely in the majority in that State. So outraged did this committee feel in their examination, in their researches, of the frauds perpetrated there in the name and on behalf of democracy, that they brand the whole proceeding as an infamous fraud, and they say the attempt to foist McEnery on the people of Louisiana was contrary to the wishes, and contrary to the expressed wishes of the majority of that people. Senators are here upholding that fraud, unwittingly I admit, according to their conscientious convictions of duty—they are here upholding a fraud to-day that was so pronounced by a committee of this body over two years ago.

All the frauds are on the part of the republicans, says the Senator from Connecticut; the whole claim of Kellogg and the republicans is based on infamous outrage and fraud. Sir, I base the right of the republicans upon the expressed will of the sovereigns of that State, who undoubtedly cast their votes for that man. There is something else in an election besides the returns. Something else constitutes an election. The primary cause of an election is the intention, and it is the expressed intention of the voter as to who shall be his choice that mainly constitutes an election.

Now, Mr. President, let me say one thing in regard to the election laws of my State, in regard to the election law that prevailed and controlled the election of 1872. It was a law passed by the republican party, I will admit—passed to protect republicans from the scenes of violence and intimidation that were practiced in that State in the presidential election in 1868. It had accomplished its purpose. It was deprecated by republicans and by democrats, and there was a universal demand for its repeal or for its modification. The governor of that State at that time had on three successive occasions, according to my recollection, appealed to the Legislature to relax the stringency of those laws, and he had deprecated their existence. The Legislature, yielding to the justice of the demand, yielding to the equities of the demand, during a preceding session just prior to this election had modified and repealed that law and modified many of its obnoxious features. Was that repealing act approved? Was it allowed to go into operation so as to give either one party or the other the same opportunity for an equal and fair election? No, sir; but it was quietly kept for an opportunity for its use, an opportunity for its use which is well known to this Senate, and certainly must be known to the new members here. According to the testimony in the report there was a law that had been denounced from one end of that State to the other as obnoxious, oppressive, and infamous, and denounced by the democratic party, according to their admission. Then what was their proceeding? They made terms with the governor who had the manipulation of that law, and this very thing which they had denounced, which they stated themselves was an alliance with an infamy, that was worse than infamy itself, they hugged to their bosom and they undertook to practice the frauds that it admitted. On the ratification of what is called the fusion ticket there was a mass meeting held and speakers from that stand announced that that law was to be used in favor of the party that had for years denounced it. Ah, they said, this is a glorious law; give it to us now and we will carry the State for the democracy; thus prostituting all their professions of repugnance in order that success might follow such prostitution. What did one of the speakers say?

Now I propose to tell the people of this city, and through the press represented here the people of the State, the simple, plain reason that I do not sign these laws. In the first place they make no material modification of the old election and registration laws. In the second place, it was intended, when the repeal of these laws was forced through the Legislature, that instead of them General Grant should use his election law upon the people of this State; and then, besides that, the great mass of the people—the great mass of the people who have so long demanded the modification or repeal of these laws have changed their minds.

To whom was he speaking at the moment? To the democracy as represented at a mass meeting in the city of New Orleans—

Ah, it makes a very great difference whose ox is gored. These were laws to be denounced when operated in the interest of the republican party, but O! what sweet and wholesome things they were when they could be diverted to the fraudulent purposes of the democratic party! And I have just this one apology to make to my friends in using that term: It was not the democratic party of Louisiana that originated or perpetrated these frauds; it was a few political adventurers there claiming the cloak of democracy to enhance and advance their own views. Through them and by them the democratic masses of the State of Louisiana have been made to believe, and do this day believe, that they have been outraged. Here were the instructions sent out by the authorities having control of these election laws as to how proceedings were to be managed under them:

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
OFFICE OF STATE REGISTER OF VOTERS,
New Orleans, October 24, 1872.

SIR: In addition to the instructions contained in Circular No. 8, from this office, you are instructed—

First. In counting the ballots after election, count first the votes cast for presidential electors and members of Congress, keeping separate tally-lists on the Form No. 1, provided for that purpose, and making up and completing the statement of votes for each poll upon Form No. 1. Then close the box, reseal it, and proceed in a similar manner until all the national votes have been counted. Then proceed with the counting of the State and parish votes, bearing in mind the fact that the United States supervisors of election and deputy marshals have no right whatever to scrutinize, inspect, or be present at the counting of the State and parish votes.

Here are the facts and here are the practices pursued in that case. The supervisors appointed by the United States judge were allowed to remain as witnesses of the count of national votes, and the moment it became necessary to practice hocus-pocus on the boxes in order to get in democrats they told those gentlemen they had no legal right there. They excluded them from witnessing the count and they went on and consummated their fraud. The republicans were not allowed to have a man there. I assert it as a fact that there was not a republican officer of election throughout that whole State on that day except these supervisors of election, and they were excluded immediately after the national vote was counted. Here is the answer again from the registrar of voters of the State to a republican, the president of the State republican committee:

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
OFFICE OF STATE REGISTRATION OF VOTERS,
New Orleans, November 2, 1872.

SIR: In reply to your communication of date, I must respectfully decline compliance with your request to appoint one commissioner of election at each polling place from the republican party at the general election to be held November 4, 1872.

In regard to your second request, I have the honor to inform you that the list of polling places in this parish will be published in the official journal and other papers to-morrow, 3d instant.

Very respectfully,

B. P. BLANCHARD,
State Registrar of Voters and Supervisor of Registration Parish of Orleans.

Hon. S. B. PACKARD,
President State Republican Committee.

In the first place, there shall be no republican to witness the wrongs that we intend to perpetrate in this counting of the vote. In the next place, we do not pretend to let you know where the polling places are to be, either here or throughout the State, until the morning of the election; and the testimony goes to show that they were scattered and located and placed in such positions that the poor, ignorant colored men had to travel twenty-odd miles in some instances to find where they had the opportunity to vote, while every democrat in the State knew exactly where to find his hole. But our voters were not to be deterred in that way; against all difficulties they asserted their rights and were not foiled by such practices.

Now let us look at some of the marvelous mathematical results of these proceedings. In 1870, in sixteen parishes in my State, sixteen exclusively democratic parishes, the majority for the democratic ticket was 7,300. Those are what are known as democratic strongholds. Those same sixteen parishes in 1872, the election upon which this case turns, gave 7,100 majority for the democrats. In parishes exclusively democratic, the democratic vote fell off. The republicans gained ground in the democratic strongholds, but how did they figure out results in the republican strongholds? Now I want to take my listeners to another part of the country, I want to take them to the thirty-six republican parishes of the State, and show the legerdemain that was practiced in order to give the democratic candidate a majority. The remaining thirty-six parishes of the State, our republican parishes, were all carried by the republicans in 1870 by a majority of 32,616, and the democratic board in 1872 gave an actual aggregate majority of 1,500 for their ticket. In other words, at an election which showed large republican gains all over the United States, which showed in a certain portion of our State republican gains over the democrats in their own strongholds, an astonishing gain of 34,000 in the opposite direction, with no assignable cause for the change, was claimed in the exclusively republican parishes of Louisiana by a board which admitted a republican gain in the exclusively democratic parishes. Where they did not need an opportunity to practice this legerdemain, this infamous practice upon the returns of an election, they lost ground; and where they did, they entirely turned the tables upon us. Can anybody believe that such was the actual result? It is incredible. We can go into their own strongholds and legitimately defeat them; they can come into ours and cheat us out of the expression of the will of our people.

Reference has been made in this discussion to the forged returns of four parishes. It is admitted that they were forged. The opposite counsel did not deny it. The true returns would have given 4,000 majority for the republican ticket. We lost 4,000 there. Six parishes were rejected by the fusion board, and it is a remarkable coincidence that they were all republican parishes. Those six parishes polled by the registration 4,500 majority for the republican ticket. There are 8,500 votes of democratic figures whistled down the wind.

But it is not upon the figures of the returns that I rely; it is not to the figures of the returns that I advert; but I am calling the attention of the Senate and asking them to go back to what they believe was the desire and the wish of the people, and I ask them if we are not in this situation, that for two years we have been defrauded of our legitimate political rights?

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] pleaded the admission of the democratic candidate for Congress at large to the floor of the House and to the privileges of membership just prior to the adjournment of that body, and cited it as evidence that in the judgment of that committee and in the judgment of that House he had received a majority of the votes, and that consequently if the Congressman at large on the democratic ticket was elected the republican governor was defeated. Did he know the circumstances of that contest? Did he know that the republican contestant was a claimant for a seat on this floor, and that his appearance in that body somewhat jeopardized and imperiled his right to a seat here? Did he know that the very committee which reported the fact says that Pinchback failed to take any testimony within the time given in the resolution? Did he not know that neither by himself nor by his counsel did he put in an appearance on the occasion? Do not the committee in their report admit that? They say:

> The present contest does not either necessarily or actually involve the so-called Louisiana question or settle the matter at issue pro or con of the legality of the present State government of Louisiana, as will appear from the several considerations suggested by the facts and testimony before the committee.
> First. The contestant was a liberal republican candidate, and received in addition to the full strength of the vote of what was known as the "fusion party" a large republican vote.

There was no liberal republican candidate for governor. This man was a liberal republican candidate and he did get some republican votes, and this very committee that reported to seat him reported that he got a large vote from the republican side, and that their determination in no way affects the main result as between Kellogg and McEnery.

Let me here say a word in justice to the claimant for this seat. He has been held up here as a target for two years to be laughed at, receiving all the shafts of scandal, calumny, rivalry, and jealousy. His personal character is not impugned, but there is something in his official character that should be known. He was selected as the republican candidate for Congress at large for that State in October, 1872. He was voted for as a Congressman at large in November. He was taken up by his party friends and voted for as Senator, in January following. Is the fact that he was selected as the standard-bearer of his party on one occasion throughout the State to be pleaded in detriment of his right to a seat here? On the contrary, it shows the estimation in which he was held. He is spoken of as an adventurer who is willing to let his foot rest on any soil that will give him pap and emolument. He is denounced for appearing in that House and he is condemned for presenting himself here. Is he not, from what I have said, fully and entirely justified for this double two-horse act of his? It is not his selection. He is here in obedience to the wish of the majority of the people of Louisiana, and certainly no reflection should be cast upon him, because in that case it would apply equally to any one of us who assumes the duty to which he aspires.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WEST. With pleasure.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to inquire of the Senator if Judge Dibble, of Louisiana, was not one of the counsel who advocated the claim of the claimant to a seat in this body before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and whether that judge has not recently published a letter in which he declares that the existing government of Louisiana was obtained by revolution?

Mr. WEST. There is some truth in what the Senator states. The judge appeared on one side, but, like a good many other politicians, he is ready to jump on the other horse if he thinks he is going to win the race. I do not attach the slightest consequence to that any more than I do to the sudden somersaults that some people have made in other political contests.

Mr. MORTON. The democracy took him at once.

Mr. WEST. The democracy, as my friend suggests, were willing to adopt him immediately.

We are referred also to the report made by the House committee, and told that that report says the Kellogg government exists in defiance of the wishes of the people of the State of Louisiana. Who are the people of the State? Are they the white-leaguers, the turbulent red-handed revolutionists, who override all law, unless that law is administered in their behalf and in their interest? No, sir, they are the law-abiding, the laboring people, who unfortunately have few to plead their cause or speak in their behalf. What do this committee say again on further investigation? Their "best judgment" is that Governor Kellogg was elected. "We find that many of the more moderate of his opponents concede his election." Yes, not only his moderate opponents but the very men who put up this trick in 1872—these so-called democrats. They laughingly have told me over and over again how near they came to winning and what a glorious thing it was. They laugh over it. They have thrown a State into turmoil, anarchy, revolution, and bloodshed for two years, and they laugh over the adroitness of their practices and how nearly they came to succeeding.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I suppose my friend refers here to the report of the minority of the House committee?

Mr. WEST. I refer to the report of the minority, and I shall refer to the majority report, if the Senator will wait.

> Sixth. While we believe Governor Kellogg to have received a majority of votes in 1872—

That is what the minority says; and that minority consists of—

GEORGE F. HOAR,
W. A. WHEELER,
WM. P. FRYE.

They believe it. They have investigated the matter. The majority of the committee say in their report that they never did investigate that election; and what are their words? I am going to quote them in a few minutes. They said in their original report that they never investigated the election of 1872, and here in their supplemental report they express their opinion.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Were they authorized to investigate it?

Mr. WEST. If they were not authorized they were not competent to express an opinion about it. What did they do? And here again I come back to the majority report.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator mean to state that they did in point of fact investigate that question?

Mr. WEST. I presume that that committee looked into the matter at large, and I know that they did take some testimony in regard to it. That testimony unfortunately is not available, but it will be demonstrated by the testimony when it comes out that democrats admitted throughout the State that Kellogg was elected, and I am told that that testimony shows it. I applied to the Government Printing Office, having been apprised of the names of the witnesses who testified in that case, but I could not get it; it was not available at the moment. The majority of the committee maintained that Kellogg was not elected on his own color line, and they never had the courage to go out to the utmost verge of that color line and see whether there is a majority of white or colored voters in that State. This majority come back and say that it is impossible that the republicans could have carried that State, because the white element were their equal in numbers and their superior in intelligence; once more falling back upon the mistake and the error of which the Senator from Wisconsin not now in this Chamber was convicted, of saying that there are as many white voters in that State as colored. That is the ground again that they offer to us upon which the majority base their idea that Mr. Kellogg was defeated.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to read an extract from the report in reply to the question asked by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] if I do not interrupt him?

Mr. WEST. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I read from the report of Messrs. Hoar, Wheeler, and Frye:

We were unable to make any direct and thorough investigation of the election of 1872. It is apparent from the facts stated in the report of the Senate committee (Senate report, third session Forty-second Congress, No. 457) that the action of the officials was so tainted with fraud and illegality that the action of neither of the pretended returning boards or the certificates of the local election officers can be relied on in the least as a basis for making up an opinion as to the true result. Indeed this is conceded by several of the most intelligent of the conservative witnesses. It would be impossible at this distance of time, and probably at any time, to go behind the returns and ascertain the true expression of the people's will. But our best judgment is that Governor Kellogg was elected. We find that many of the more moderate of his opponents concede his election. There is no argument to show the election of McEnery which is not met by one equally strong in proof of the election of Kellogg.

I call the attention of the Senator to what follows:

The registration—

And mark you, the registration was exclusively in the hands of the appointees of Governor Warmoth, who had joined the democratic party, and every one of the election officers throughout the State was either a democrat or a republican who had deserted and gone over to the democratic party—

The registration shows a considerable majority of colored voters, and it is not denied that Kellogg received substantially all the colored votes, beside some thousand whites. Taking the democratic returns in 1872 for all the parishes except four, for which the returns are conceded to be forgeries, and six others from which they threw out the returns for fraud and violence, and get at the true vote in those parishes in any way you can, by comparing the vote with the registration of white and colored voters, or by taking the republican and democratic votes at the election of this year, and it gives Kellogg a majority of several thousand.

Mr. DAWES. My inquiry of the Senator from Louisiana was wholly for information. I was aware that the testimony taken by the committee was not accessible, but I had a conference with some members of the committee; and I knew or supposed what their opinion was. I agree with the Senator from Louisiana that it was the opinion, I think of a majority of the committee, that Governor Kellogg was elected. I do not think that they made any investigation of the facts as to that election; I did not suppose they had, and therefore I made the inquiry of the Senator. But their opinion as to the election of the rest of the ticket is quite another question.

Mr. MORTON. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that I understood from one member of the committee that in the course of the cross-examination of some democratic witnesses before the committee in regard to certain parishes in 1872 the result of that cross-examination in regard to those two parishes was to show such a change as would elect Kellogg, but that there was no direct examination made for that purpose. It came out incidentally in the cross-examination of democratic witnesses.

Mr. DAWES. I cannot speak with any confidence as to how far the investigation went. I think it will be found when the evidence is published that they took no testimony at all in reference to the election of 1872; but that it was the opinion of a majority of that committee, based upon such information as they could obtain in the matter, that Mr. Kellogg was elected governor; but they came to an opposite conclusion as to the rest of the ticket.

Mr. WEST. Whatever apprehensions I might have had at the commencement of making some points, I certainly must express my acknowledgment for the assistance given me by my friend from Massachusetts and my friend from Indiana. The Senator from Massachusetts has had a more favorable opportunity than myself of knowing what information was elicited by this committee, a member of which was one of his colleagues in the other body. All that I know in regard to it is the fact, communicated to me by persons who were cognizant and heard of and heard that testimony, that this committee solicited an expression of opinion from among intelligent men of both parties in that State as to how the election resulted in 1872, and that while republicans were in no hesitation or manner of doubt as to the result, there were some fair-minded democrats who repudiated the cheat that was practiced upon them, and who admitted to this committee that in their opinion the State had gone republican. If an expression of opinion is to be cited adversely to us, we certainly must be allowed to use those same expressions of opinion when they redound to our benefit.

I have not had the opportunity of looking at the remarks of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE,] who spoke on Saturday, but I would call the attention of the Senate to one of his presumptions of fact that is scarcely substantiated by the record. He says that as the Senate had upon the testimony refused the electoral vote of Louisiana in 1873, we are now stultifying ourselves by admitting the representative of that State, or that we would stultify ourselves; that the decision to-day in favor of Pinchback would controvert and annul the decision of the Senate on a previous occasion as to the electoral vote.

Mr. WHYTE. Will the Senator allow me to correct him?

Mr. WEST. Certainly.

Mr. WHYTE. I did not say that the Senate had acted upon testimony when it excluded that vote. I stated the fact that, owing to the condition of affairs in Louisiana, both Houses, acting separately, had each determined that the electoral vote of Louisiana should not be counted at all.

Mr. WEST. And that if we now received it we should be stultifying ourselves. Perhaps I do not use exactly the words of the Senator, but I think that was his idea.

On the 10th of February, 1873, the Committee on Privileges and Elections of this body made an entirely separate report from what is known as the Carpenter report. They made it on the electoral vote of the State of Louisiana, investigation into the validity of which had been confided to them. The Carpenter report was not made until the 23d of February. On the 10th of February, 1873, they came to this conclusion:

We find that the official returns of the election of electors from the various parishes of Louisiana have never been counted by any body having authority to count them.

The Senate resolved:

That, all the objections having been considered, no electoral vote purporting to be that of the State of Louisiana be counted.

Certainly the Senator will not contend that that is res adjudicata. Certainly he will not contend that the Senate did not reserve to itself the competency upon any future occasion, on a subsequent measure, to examine into the returns and the facts. What would have been the action of the Senate and House of Representatives on the 12th day of February, 1873, under the solemn sanction of the Constitution to declare what the votes of the people of the United States were for President had there been such an issue as that presented? Had the issue between President Grant and Mr. Greeley turned on the electoral vote of Louisiana, would you have said there was no return? Would you have shut the door and said, "Here are 179 votes on one side and 179 votes on the other; anarchy prevails, and there is no government in the United States," as you assume to say now that there is no government in the State of Louisiana? No, sir; you would have held possession of this Government by all the power of the bayonets of the United States until you had examined into the right and wrong of this case and set the right right and condemned the wrong. Would you have remitted your Government to anarchy, confusion, distraction, and violence, such as we have had in Louisiana, simply because you had no return before you? No, sir; you would have examined the presumptions of the case to begin with; you would have gone into the facts; and you never would have been satisfied until you knew how every man in that State, black and white, had voted. What you would have done for this country at large, what you would have done for this confederacy of States, I claim now that you shall do the same justice to us. We have been defrauded out of our rights. We show you the villainous and infamous conspiracy to defraud the republican voters of my State, and you tell us we have got no rights. We have a right to look to our republican friends in this body for sympathy and justification and support when all the presumptions of the case go to show that the republican party was in the ascendency on that occasion. We have a right to appeal to you in our distress. We have been outraged there. Republicans have been killed by the hundreds in that State for maintaining that their cause was successful in 1872, and you put us off with the cold proposition that the only result and conclusion we can come to is that one board was legal and had no returns and another board was illegal and had forged returns.

What will be the result to us if your verdict is against us to-day? It will leave us but a continuation of this interminable, inconsequential Louisiana case. Refuse to admit this man, and the word goes out once more to the country that the Kellogg government is a fraud, and agitation in that region is renewed, crime and violence run riot there, White Leagues muster, and your President is called upon once more by the strong hand to preserve the peace. Can he do it? Is he competent to do it when his judgment is reversed by this deliberative assembly? What have we got to expect there? Not satisfied with keeping us in that condition for two long years, not satisfied with holding us under the ban of prejudice and oppression, are you to refuse now, when you know the facts and the circumstances of this case, to adjudicate and to give us peace?

Where is the democrat in this Chamber with the facts before him who can convince you, republicans, that that State went democratic in 1872? He will convince you of nothing except the existence of a "gigantic fraud" and an attempt to cheat the people out of their votes. I ask you again, can there be any other choice but one of two? When only two men are running for the same office you must either admit one or the other. You can either acknowledge that Kellogg is elected or you must have our State go into the hands of the democrats. That is the platform on which I wish to stand. That is the logical result of the vote of this Senate. It will be either an admission on the part of the Senate that the republicans are entitled to the government of that State or it will be the verdict of the Senate that the democrats are, because that will be the practical result.

Mr. President, I said at the outset that I had not expected to say anything on this subject to-day. I have gone over much of the ground that has been trod over and over again, and were I a Senator from any other State except the State of Louisiana I would not have vexed the ears of the Senate to-day. It has been incumbent upon me, however, to say something, and I have felt it incumbent upon me to repel in the strongest terms of which I am capable the charge that the republicans are the only fraudulent manipulators of election machinery in that State; and I charge home to the democrats that they conspired and fraudulently deceived the people, and have deceived the democrats of Louisiana as well as the democrats throughout the country.

Mr. MORTON. If there be no other Senator desiring to speak now, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at two o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 16, 1875.

Prayer by Bishop GILBERT HAVEN, of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT FOR 1874.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1874; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That twelve hundred and fifty additional copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for 1874 be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. How can that be done?

Mr. ANTHONY. We can print the cost of $500. We did that last year.

Mr. SHERMAN. It will not cost more than $500 then?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the estimate.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. MITCHELL, it was Ordered, That Mrs. D. J. Browne have leave to withdraw her petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. MORTON on the 5th instant:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback be admitted as a Senator from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years, beginning the 4th day of March, 1873.

The pending question being on the amendment of Mr. EDMUNDS to insert the word "not" before "admitted."

Mr. ALCORN. Mr. President, it will be remembered that I was one of the committee that joined in the majority report two years since declaring the fact that there was no legal government in the State of Louisiana. The investigations of that committee were patient and I think they were impartial, and in my judgment the conclusions arrived at cannot well be controverted. I now affirm everything that that report asserts as true. I declare that in my judgment the election which resulted in the installation of Kellogg and his Legislature was a fraud; that it was an organized fraud on both sides; as much of a fraud as the parties were capable of making it. Hence it was that I concurred with the majority of the committee in declaring that the election was not entitled to the consideration of Congress; that it should be disregarded; that the matter should be referred again to the people of Louisiana; that a commission should be organized by Congress for the purpose of holding an election there; and that it would be the duty of this Government to see to it that the people of Louisiana had an opportunity of expressing their will untrammeled with regard to the government which they proposed should be established over them.

For two years I have sought to follow up this idea; and during all that period of time the chances for consummating that which I believed to be the remedy for the wrongs that had been committed have grown less and less. To-day there is no hope that anything of that sort can be done. The question of a new election now may be regarded as postponed forever. No one will attempt hereafter to introduce any proposition for a new election in Louisiana.

When I last addressed the Senate on this subject I stated that if the Senate would recognize formally the Kellogg government, notwithstanding my judgment with regard to the election, I would take the formal recognition by the Senate as an adjudication of the case, and would then stand prepared to act upon the credentials of Pinchback, regarding the question of the Kellogg government as fixed, as settled for me and for the Senate.

I have been somewhat persistent in endeavoring to induce the Senate to begin at the right place in this Kellogg matter; first, with regard to the question as to whether the government was legal, whether in truth there was a government there, and if a government, there whether that government elected a Senator; and if a Senator, who that Senator was. But the Senate has not seen proper to commence where my judgment suggested the propriety of commencing. It has ignored the question of the Kellogg government and has come directly to the question of the admission of Pinchback.

I have affirmed here that in my judgment Pinchback was about to be dealt with unjustly by this presentation of the question; that the issue is not properly formed; that it is not properly joined; that the issue is demurrable in law, and in chancery it is demurrable for multifariousness. We are now here to-day trying, in the arguments of the case, the Kellogg government upon an issue presented as to the admission of Pinchback. I stated to the Senate that I could not vote for the admission of Pinchback when the real issue of the case was upon the recognition of the Kellogg government; but since I made that statement to the Senate, since I assumed that position, some action has been taken with regard to this question. The House of Representatives, the popular branch of Congress, has recognized the Kellogg government. My friend on my right [Mr. BOGY] suggests that they also recognized the McEnery government indirectly, for the reason that they admitted at the same time members of Congress who had been candidates upon the McEnery ticket for the State at large. Well, sir, I will not undertake to reconcile this action of the House of Representatives. I presume, however, looking to subsequent events, that it was somewhat in the interest of compromise; that, the Kellogg men having held their seats in Congress for two long years less three days, now in the interest of compromise the House turns them out and puts in the Representatives of the McEnery government; and I am told too that the sitting members, the usurping members, as they may now be called, voted to turn themselves out and put in the McEnery Representatives. This was very polite. This showed that they were up to the spirit of compromise that is now surrounding all this Kellogg question. So the House of Representatives went away in good humor. They had recognized the Kellogg government as the legal government and they had admitted the McEnery Representatives to legislate for the benefit of their constituents during the period of forty-eight hours just before the close of the session and just in time to get their pay.

But there was more than that done. The recent election in Louisiana occurred four months and a half ago. The returning board sat counting the returns for full three months of time. For three months they sat manipulating the returns and counting to see who was elected. The time for the assembling of the Legislature came, but still the count went on. I will not undertake to recite the various charges and mutations of charge that characterize this government in its recent presentation to the country. Committees have been sent by Congress to New Orleans; and finally a commission has been organized by the consent of the Kellogg government and the aggrieved party, and has taken up the returns and carried them to the city of New York, where to-day they are being counted. They are being counted by a commission unknown to the laws of Louisiana; and it is agreed between the party aggrieved and the party in power that the Kellogg government shall be recognized and that this commission shall suggest to Kellogg's government who are the true representatives in Louisiana, and that when this suggestion is made the members shall be entitled to their certificates upon the suggestion of strangers to the law of Louisiana, and that upon this recommendation and upon these certificates those members shall be admitted to their seats, and that then Kellogg, the then recognized governor, shall call the Legislature of Louisiana together, and that the Legislature shall proceed to do what? To make more laws, to undo perhaps some of the laws that have been enacted and that are now in force, but finally to elect a Senator to the Congress of the United States, and when that Senator comes, I ask with what better grace does he come, with what stronger warrant of authority does he come, than that warrant held now in the hands of Pinchback? A Legislature is to be organized after this style, a Legislature fixed up under a compromise between citizens aggrieved and citizens who stood content, outside the forms of law, without regard to the constitution and laws, in the interest of peace and harmony and good-will and compromise. I trust that when so organized it will meet the approbation of the people of the State of Louisiana; that that government, having reached the level of despair, may rise from that level to the majesty of a State government entitled to the respect of the people whom it pretends to govern or is entitled to govern.

Now when the House of Representatives, the popular branch of Congress, that branch representing the people of the United States, has recognized the Kellogg government, and when the people of Louisiana, the aggrieved people, have recognized that government —for the consummation will be made before the Senate adjourns— and the Kellogg government by the consent of the people will be recognized, when all that attaches and appertains to the people has been settled, adjusted, compromised, what is left for the Senate to do?

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ALCORN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know that it is incumbent on me to vindicate the action of the House of Representatives; but as I voted myself for both propositions which the Senator from Mississippi has undertaken to construe as a recognition of the Kellogg government and of the McEnery government by way of compromise, I may be allowed to say that I think the Senator misconstrues the resolution adopted by the House of Representatives. I did not understand it myself when I gave it my vote as recognizing the Kellogg government as the legal government of Louisiana. There is no such phraseology in it; nor did I vote for it myself nor do I suppose the House of Representatives voted for it under any such supposition. I have heard with surprise a suggestion that members of the House whose seats were contested voted to oust themselves and put others in their place. It is the first I have ever heard of such an instance, and I very much doubt whether the record will bear out that statement. I think that the House of Representatives voted for a resolution declaring that they would recognize William P. Kellogg as the governor of the State of Louisiana; that is all; that they then voted, those of them whose seats were not contested, upon the question whether a contestant whom I have heard for the first time—I did not know it before; I presume it is so—ran upon the same ticket with McEnery was entitled to a seat. I voted with the majority in both those cases. I did not vote myself, and this is the first time I have ever heard it suggested that the majority who did vote either for the resolution recognizing Kellogg as governor de facto of the State of Louisiana or for Mr. Sheridan or Mr. Lawrence, whichever of them it was, was entitled to a seat that had been occupied up to that time by some other gentleman, voted for them with any idea of passing upon the question of the legality of either the Kellogg or the McEnery government.

Mr. ALCORN. I was careful to say that I had been informed of what I stated; I believe there was no call of the yeas and nays in the House upon the admission of those members; I think they were admitted without a division. But with regard to the resolution that was passed by the House—I have not that resolution before me—I take it, however, as the honorable Senator from Massachusetts represents it, that it was a resolution recognizing Hon. William P. Kellogg as governor of the State of Louisiana. That, Mr. President, covers all that there is in this case. You may draw subtile distinctions in law, you may draw subtile distinctions in politics, but the masses of the American people hold in its fullest, in its broadest sense, the resolution passed by the House as a recognition of the Kellogg government. There is no explaining of this away.

If Kellogg, then, is recognized as the governor of Louisiana, Pinchback holds his credentials certified under the hand of this governor, the seal attached thereto being the great seal of the State of Louisiana. Then here, under the rulings of the Senate, is a prima facie case. I repeat, the popular branch of Congress has recognized the Kellogg government, has recognized William P. Kellogg, the present governor of the State of Louisiana, the functionary now in discharge of those duties, as the legal governor.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me to read the resolution?

Mr. ALCORN. Certainly; and I shall be very glad if the Senator will send it here that I may look at it after he has read it.

Mr. DAWES. I have no desire to participate in this debate. I only desired to see that the House of Representatives be vindicated.

Mr. ALCORN. I am sure I would not misrepresent any one connected with this affair. Here is the resolution:

Resolved, That William Pitt Kellogg be recognized as the governor of the State of Louisiana until the end of the term of office fixed by the constitution of that State.

This is the whole law. This runs the full limit, covers all the ground, and there is no room for anything more. The Legislature which was a part of that government has passed out of existence, but the recognition of Kellogg recognizes all the appointments he has made, all his official acts, and everything that he has done.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator if that resolution was qualified in any respect?

Mr. ALCORN. Not at all. It is full and complete. The resolution reads:

Resolved, That William Pitt Kellogg be recognized as the governor of the State of Louisiana until the end of the term of office fixed by the constitution of that State.

Not in the past, but in the future by the grace of God until his term of office shall expire. Could anything be more full than that? It covers everything from beginning to end.

Mr. MERRIMON. May I ask a question?

Mr. ALCORN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MERRIMON. Does the Senator think the House had jurisdiction to pass that resolution?

Mr. ALCORN. Certainly they had. They can pass any resolution they please. It is simply an expression of the will of the House of Representatives, the popular will. The representatives of the people come up here and express their will. I admit that it is not binding on us except so far as it is the expression of the popular will.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALCORN. Certainly.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. By reference to the reports which that resolution accompanies, does it not appear to have been the result of a compromise, merely recognizing Kellogg as the de facto governor for the residue of the term?

Mr. ALCORN. The resolution does not use the term "de facto governor" nor does it use the term "de jure governor," but it does use the word "governor," and thereby it embraces all that belongs to the governor complete and full. There is no mistaking, no dodging this.

Mr. DAWES. There is no doubt but what the language of the resolution is broad enough to cover a title de jure as well as a title de facto.

Mr. ALCORN. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. But it is also just as plain that it will apply to a governor de facto as well as de jure. It is a resolution so drawn as to command the support of those who believed that he was only governor de facto as well as those who believed that he was governor de jure. It was, I have reason to believe, drawn on purpose in that form and for that very object, so that those who believed that William P. Kellogg had no other title to that office except that of a de facto governor and those who believed that he was entitled to the office de jure could in a spirit of compromise support that resolution; and in that way and in that way only I believe it commanded a majority of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ALCORN. The Senator from Massachusetts simply makes good the point that I endeavored to establish here, and that was that the resolution was intended to satisfy all parties, and that it was so broad and comprehensive in its language that certainly the man who contended for the recognition of the Kellogg government de jure had no right to complain. That certainly left no room that he should complain, for the language was broad and unmistakable, not only in recognizing him up to the present time, but continuing that recognition on the part of the House of Representatives until the term of office shall expire. Now I think that our de facto friends, if they were seeking there to find any hook upon which they could hang an objection thereafter, whereby they could justify themselves in voting for this resolution before their constituents, were perhaps overreached a little by those who held that it was the duty of the House of Representatives to recognize the Kellogg government as the government de jure.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the Senator is not disturbed by my interruptions.

Mr. ALCORN. Not at all.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to state that it is true that it was so drawn, as the Senator says, that those who believed that Mr. Kellogg was governor de jure would have no right to complain of the resolution, and as I said before it was drawn just as much so that those who believed he was only governor de facto would have no right to complain. It was a resolution so drawn, and was supported because it was so drawn, that it would establish neither the one nor the other of the propositions. It was because the Senator from Mississippi seemed disposed to make it the judgment of the House of Representatives that Kellogg is the de jure governor of that State that I was led to interrupt him, perhaps a little improperly, in order that I might indicate what I supposed was the true purpose of that resolution. I suppose that those who drew it did not desire that it might be used for the purpose of indicating the judgment of the House of Representatives one way or the other upon that point. The fair judgment of the House of Representatives was expressed, and expressed in the spirit and for the purpose solely of indicating that they did not wish to decide upon that question, but simply that a man exercising the functions of governor of the State so long as under the circumstances he had exercised them had better be recognized as the governor of the State than be overthrown; but upon the question how he came to that office, by what right or by what power he was installed in that office, the House of Representatives took care not to express itself. Any other use, it seems to me, of the resolution of the House of Representatives upon that point is a use to which it was not the intention of the House of Representatives that it should be put.

Mr. ALCORN. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Massachusetts for having given us what he understands to have been the will of the House on this subject. If it was not intended that this resolution should commit those who held that the Kellogg government was the government de jure nor those who held that it was a government de facto both were very unfortunate, for the reason that the resolution in my judgment is sufficiently full and strong and does commit all parties. I can only take the language of the resolution as to what the House meant. I have not undertaken to debate the jurisdiction of the House on the subject, and the Senator will perceive presently that such was not my purpose, and I did not refer to this for the purpose of criticising the action of the House. I have no criticism to make. I refer to it for the purpose of showing the reason why I propose now to cast a vote different from that which I indicated some time back.

I then stated that if the Senate would recognize the Kellogg government I would take the matter as adjudicated, so anxious was I in the interest of the peace of Louisiana—for I have regarded the agitation in Louisiana with but little less concern than I have in my own State. Her broad border is by the side of the State that I in part represent, and that which excites the people of Louisiana excites and disturbs the minds of the people of the State of Mississippi. We are anxious for peace, and we are ready to make all the compromises that it is possible to make under the Constitution in the interest of peace. This is the feeling of every man in the State of Louisiana and in the State of Mississippi who wishes his country well.

I was going on to show that I had found now, as I thought, a justification for the vote I shall give when this question comes to the vote. As I said, I hold to the same judgment with regard to the election that I expressed originally; and I hold with regard to the decisions of the courts of Louisiana that I have no respect for them.

Why, sir, it is but few decisions of courts in the Southern States organized under the manipulations of adventurers that I have any respect for. In my own State the other day the governor, being called to appoint chancellors in the State to be judges of the subtile distinctions of law in the adjudication of questions appertaining to the jurisdiction in matters of equity and in the orphans' court, did that which I thought it was impossible to do; but I have learned that there is nothing new under the sun; he absolutely made a chancellor out of a country doctor who had never studied law so far as I am informed, who had not a license to practice law, but who did succeed in obtaining a license upon a reading of five or six days after the appointment had been tendered to him; and that man is now commissioned chancellor. He may be, for all that I know, a very clever man, a good neighbor, a good sort of man; but I judge that there is no lawyer in the State of Mississippi, that there is no intelligent man in that State who will have any great regard for his decisions when he shall see proper to make them and promulgate them in the country.

So far as the decisions of the courts organized by adventurers are concerned, I have as a general rule no respect for them. I have no respect for the decisions of the courts in Louisiana, and having read and analyzed the decisions of the courts in Louisiana touching all these questions and the decisions upon various points contradictory of each other, I say that while I can see that there is ability, that there is there a subtile ability manifested in covering up points, I cannot see how any man can have any respect for the adjudications of the courts in Louisiana.

But, sir, if we can obtain peace now perhaps we shall do better. The object and aim now of the Kellogg government being once accomplished, it being established, it may be possible from this standpoint, bad as it is, we may be able there to maintain a government that will be entitled to the respect of the people, a government that will be a source of protection to the people. It is in this hope, and it is for the purpose of settling this question, for the purpose of giving final legislative action to the Louisiana case, that, when the vote shall be taken on this resolution, I shall vote to admit Pinchback. It will be the last of him if he is admitted. If he is not admitted, what is the outlook for the future? The returns are being examined to-day in the city of New York, and the Legislature that is to come in on that examination, as the result of a compromise, will elect a Senator; and when he comes here will he be entitled any more to the respect of this body than is Pinchback, as he stands here to-day elected by the Kellogg legislature No. 1 and the Kellogg legislature No. 2?

There could be no government in Louisiana that would be entitled to my respect unless the government de novo, a government that is established and based upon the will of the people expressed at the ballot-box without restraint, and that could not be done unless through the interposition of Congress, and Congress has failed to do that, and it has estopped itself in the other branch from ever doing it by having recognized Kellogg as governor of the State not only for the past but for all the future as long as his term under the constitution of the State of Louisiana may continue. It has thus been put out of the question to organize any other government in Louisiana than that already established. Kellogg is there, originally a usurper, but by the external help of the United States Army for the last two years and by the internal help of his courts as organized by himself he has maintained himself in his place; and I think the aggrieved party in Louisiana did very well in effecting a compromise whereby the masses of the people will be reconciled to that which was inevitable. It is in that direction I go. Now, there being nothing left to close out this question finally and forever except to admit Pinchback, I shall give my vote to admit him, trusting in God that it may result to the advantage, to the peace, to the happiness, to the future prosperity of those people.

Mr. President, the South is torn by faction. Intestine feuds and internal commotions have rent that people from the day that reconstruction was inaugurated. This friction is wearing our people out and destroying us, till they are almost reduced to the level of despair. It is a hope that I seize upon now to save the people from any further agitations, from any further feuds, from any further strife.

I arose, sir, simply to give the reasons why I should have to admit Pinchback and to reconcile my present position to the position I heretofore assumed; to give the reasons, in other words, for that which seems to be a change, but which in truth is not in principle any change. I suggest to the Senate that I trust Pinchback may be admitted and the matter finally adjusted. I shall do nothing while I am a member of this body, if I know it, to lower the dignity of the Senate. I shall do nothing in violation of the Constitution and the laws, if I am aware of the fact; but in reconstruction the Constitution was not very closely consulted. The text of that instrument was sometimes enlarged in a way that created doubts in the minds of some as to whether Congress had the power to do what it did do. In the view of many of the best lawyers of the country Congress had no power to do much that it has done, or rather, I should say, no warrant under the Constitution, for it had the power. It may be that in going forward this enlarged view of the power of Congress will have occasionally to be exercised, in order to harmonize what has been done with the duty of the hour and with the necessities of the future. It is in this spirit that I feel justified to-day, holding as I do the views that I have expressed upon the Kellogg government, in voting to admit Pinchback. He represents the colored race. He represents the colored people of the State of Louisiana. He is their representative man. There can be no question of that. If the republicans in the State of Louisiana are in the majority, and I believe they are, it is the negroes who placed that party in the majority; and if they are in the majority, Pinchback represents that race and is entitled to his place here. The State of Louisiana has her representative of the white race on this floor; he is here. But for two years the colored race have demanded that they shall have their representation here, but it has been denied them. I come now to recognize the demand; and while I hold, as I have said, that the applicant comes not clothed in all the forms and prerequisites required by law, yet he comes at least indorsed as the man who represents his race, and he has the certificate in his hand of that functionary who has been recognized by the House of Representatives as the governor of the State of Louisiana. He comes, too, with a certificate in his hands signed by that functionary who, under a compromise made by the party in power and by the aggrieved party as well, is recognized and his government continued until the end of his term. So avouched for, so indorsed, I feel that I stand justified before the people in voting for his admission.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, it has just struck me that the best reason which can be given for the admission of this claimant has been stated by the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. ALCORN,] and I am glad that before we have come to a vote upon the question, one reason which has some solidity to it shall have been advanced in his favor. The case is stated with the candor which always characterizes the observations of the honorable Senator from Mississippi. He says that this man does not come here clothed with the forms and observances of law, but he does come here as the representative man of a race, and so, in order that this race may have its due representation in the Senate of the United States, and in order that it may be made to see that its rights under the new order of things are to meet with due recognition, this man is to be admitted, because it will give us a colored Senator from Louisiana and so give us repose. Mr. President, if we were the supreme tribunal of the universe, and the Constitution of the United States had invested us with the power to choose Senators, undoubtedly the observations of the Senator from Mississippi would have great weight; but, as I read the Constitution of the United States, this tribunal is not authorized to elect Senators or to choose them. It is only authorized, acting in a purely judicial and independent capacity, to declare whether a distinct and given claimant has been chosen, not by us, but by the Legislature of a State, to represent that State in the Senate of the United States. By most people it would be thought that this does not give large scope for the imagination; it does not give wide play to the humanities, or to those moral or political considerations looking to the future which should lead us to patronize either white races or black races; but we should believe, I think, that our mission is one simply to declare the truth, and one whose guide is the essential reverence for truth and for law, which is the only security for liberty in this or any other free government. Why, sir, it is the only standard which, in spite of a man's will or his passion or his prejudice, is so elevated above him that if he be true he will follow it, whether it leads to present and political success or whether it leads to the giving of an opposite political party a Senator or a law.

Now, what is this constitution? The constitution of Louisiana, like that of the other States, points out clearly how its Legislature is to be selected, and how, when selected, it is to exercise its functions. There is no room for guess-work; there is no room for speculation; but in plain and simple language, just as is in the constitution of almost every one of the other States, it declares in the first place that that State shall be divided into election precincts or districts, each one of which is to choose one or more members of the General Assembly, and it declares in distinct phrase that the returns of the election of these members of the General Assembly shall be transmitted to the secretary of state. Instead of being transmitted to the secretary of state, these returns were transmitted to somebody else. It is claimed by my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] that this is a compliance with the constitution, and that it is left to the regulations of law to point out how and through what devices and through what tests the final sovereign power of the State in its Legislature is to ascertain who have been elected to its own bodies, as well as who have been elected to the executive and other offices of the government. Now let us see precisely what this constitution does say, and then let us ask ourselves, guided not by our own wishes but by the hard logic of fact, where it leads us.

ART. 46. Returns of all elections for members of the General Assembly shall be made to the secretary of state.

ART. 48. The supreme executive power of the State shall be vested in a chief magistrate, who shall be styled the governor of the State of Louisiana. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and, together with the lieutenant-governor, chosen for the same term, be elected as follows: The qualified electors for representatives shall vote for governor and lieutenant-governor at the time and place for voting for representatives; the returns of every election shall be sealed up and transmitted by the proper returning officer to the secretary of state, who shall deliver them to the speaker of the house of representatives on the second day of the session of the General Assembly then to be holden. The members of the General Assembly shall meet in the house of representatives to examine and count the votes. The person having the greatest number of votes for governor shall be declared duly elected; but in case of a tie vote between two or more candidates, one of them shall immediately be chosen governor by joint vote of the members of the General Assembly.

In the light of that language, can any Senator stand up here and say that he believes that the word "returns," as used in that constitution, means or can mean any other thing than the local official papers taken at the time in every voting district and precinct in the State, and that in Louisiana, as I believe in Indiana, and certainly in Vermont and Massachusetts and many other States, the votes of the people taken on the same day and before a thousand different officers in different places are by a statement to be sealed up and transmitted to the sovereign power of the State, that by them, and not by any judgment of any intervening authority, the original evidence of what the will of the people has been shall receive examination and that by them the result shall be declared? If that be not so, then one of the chief securities, as this sad history of Louisiana shows, of preserving law and order under the law has been lost; for if the original certificates of votes made by local officers who are known to all the voters, made without any opportunity of conference or combination with other local officers in other parts of the State, are not the safest repository of the prima facie (if I may use such a phrase) result of an election, then it is impossible to conceive what is the safest, because it must be seen that there is less opportunity for fraud, less opportunity for falsehood and for commotion if you take what the people in their separate districts have given as the vote, counted under their own eye, certified by their own officer, instead of taking the judgment of a body of men gathered together at the capital, selected by the executive, who are to take these returns forwarded under the constitution and to bring out from them what they declare to be the true result, which is the only paper upon which the Legislature is to act.

Why, Mr. President, I think it would be a strange thing if this were not so, notwithstanding the election laws of Louisiana, and notwithstanding what its supreme court may have said; and the opinion of the Senator from Mississippi respecting that court relieves me from saying anything about it just now. If there is anything which is capable of misconstruction, I should have said it was the proposition that the returns mentioned in the constitution, which are to go to the secretary of state and are to be by him laid before the Legislature, are the returns which the various local officers take from the votes of the people, seal up, and transmit, and not the judgment of a body of men unknown to the constitution who are to take these various papers and produce any result that in their judgment is lawful or convenient.

Mr. President, this constitution is not anomalous. Its language is almost on all fours with the language of the Constitution of the United States touching what is to be done with the votes of the electors for President assembled in the various States who represent, so far as it respects the President, in a certain sense exactly the same sort of autonomy that the election districts in a State represent to the State sovereignty. The Constitution of the United States, as you all know, declares that the votes of the electors are to be sealed up and transmitted to the President of the Senate; he is to open the votes in the presence of the two Housess, and they shall then be counted. What would be thought of that statesman or that lawgiver who should undertake to pass through Congress a law which should declare that, instead of these votes and returns sent by the electors being delivered to the President of the Senate, they should be delivered to a returning board selected by the President of the United States or elected by Congress, constituted in some way, a month in advance of the time fixed by law for their being counted, and that that returning board should canvass those votes and determine which were legal and which were not and reject all those where in their judgment there had been fraud or violence or tumult, following the analogy of the Louisiana law, and then after they had reached a result that they believed to be a convenient one, they should turn it over to the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses who should then, according to that return of that returning board, find out who is the President of the United States? Why, sir, it seems to me only necessary to state such a proposition to show how utterly unfounded it is.

So then, when I am trying to ascertain what was the Legislature of Louisiana on the 15th of January, 1873, when it is said Mr. Pinchback was elected, I shall have no hesitation in saying that, no matter what returning board had declared this to be a Legislature or the other to be a Legislature, it is within the competence of our duty to know, as the final and supreme judges of the election and qualification of this claimant to a seat, whether that Legislature was composed of persons who appeared by the returns that the constitution speaks of made up and elected, or whether they were the creation of some intermediate contrivance that either the cupidity of thieves or the ambition of politicians, or whatever, may have invented as a means of standing between the right of the people to elect their representatives and the persons who were to be authorized to meet and to organize the house.

My good friend from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST,] whose mind always grasps readily at distinctions, suggests to me that the presidential vote is counted by an outgoing Congress and that the vote of the governor of Louisiana, under the constitution, is counted by a Legislature elected at the same time. That is perfectly true, but I fail to perceive how that changes the statement of the question or changes the principle in the slightest degree. If it be a distinction at all, it is a distinction in the line of what I am saying, because if you cannot trust an outgoing Congress to exercise its immediate and primary right, whatever that may be, to see the original returns and act upon them, then certainly you cannot trust an incoming Congress. And so, Mr. President, in the State of Louisiana, as in the State of Indiana and Vermont, and I dare say three-fourths of all the States, the Legislature elected at the same time the governor is is the tribunal, the grand inquest and the grand court, to which all the original returns from the various voting places are carried by certificate or in fact, as they are in the State of Vermont—the actual ballots—and are there opened and counted by the representatives of the people; so that if any dignity is to be gained in favor of a legislative body, it is that which has come most recently and most fresh from the people, and the evidence of whose election is most recent and any fraud in which is most easily ascertained. But, Mr. President, it is not necessary to dwell on this topic.

Let us proceed to find what returns it is that the secretary of state is to lay before the Legislature, either by the constitution or by the election law of Louisiana. The constitution says that the returns shall be sent to him. The same constitution says that those returns shall be turned over to the speaker of the house of representatives by the secretary of state. That plainly imposes on the secretary of state the duty of turning over to the Legislature the very papers, unaltered, unchanged, unopened, that he receives. If this word "returns" in this constitution does not apply exclusively to those primary and fundamental evidences of local action which the people are to give in their various parishes, then you have no provision in the constitution for any returns from the people, and you may begin your election at the returning board, as I do not know but that this one, so far as we can get at any fact about it, began and ended at the same place.

Mr. WEST. On both sides.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Louisiana says "on both sides." I say on both sides. I beg him to believe that I am not speaking of sides; I am not speaking of parties; I am speaking of the question as I understand it to be, a question of simple conclusion of truth and of law upon an event that has already taken place. I see no policy for the future in it; it is only the truth and the law of the past.

But what is this law, Mr. President, and what did this people do under it? The law, that which was in force at the date of the election, declares:

That immediately upon the close of the polls on the day of election—

There being a commissioner of election at the various voting places and a supervisor of registration in each one of the parishes—

That immediately upon the close of the polls on the day of election the commissioners of election at each poll or voting place shall seal the ballot-box by pasting slips of paper over the key-hole and the opening in the top thereof and fastening the same with sealing-wax, on which they shall impress a seal, and they shall write the names of the commissioners on the said slips of paper; they shall forthwith convey the ballot-box so sealed to the office of and deliver said ballot-box to the supervisor of registration for the parish, who shall keep his office open for that purpose from the hour of the close of the election until all the votes from the several polls or voting places of the precinct shall have been received and counted. The supervisor of registration shall immediately upon the receipt of said ballot-box note its condition and the state of the seals and fastenings thereof, and shall then—shall then, in the presence of the commissioners of election and three citizens—

And here comes the part chiefly in question now—

Surrounded, as you see, by the best possible witnesses of what the truth has been, those who presided at the polls and three citizens representing the people who had been exercising their franchise—three citizens, freeholders of the parish for such poll or voting place, open the ballot-box, and count the ballots therein, and make a list of all the names of the persons and offices voted for, the number of votes for each person, the number of ballots in the box, and the number of ballots rejected, and the reason therefor. Said statements shall be made in triplicate, and each copy thereof shall be signed and sworn to by the commissioners of election of the poll and by the supervisor of registration.

Requiring still two separate oaths and two separate tests, one by the person who received the ballots, the other by the person to whom they are delivered and by whom they are counted, as to the genuineness and truth of the statement made up from them. Then it provides that—

As soon as the supervisor of registration shall have made the statement above provided for, for each poll in his precinct or parish, and it shall have been sworn to and subscribed as above directed, the supervisor of registration shall inclose in an envelope of strong paper or cloth, securely sealed, one copy of such statement from each poll and one copy of the list of persons voting at each poll, and one copy of any statements as to violence or disturbance, bribery or corruption, or other offenses specified in section twenty-nine of this act, if any there be, together with all memoranda and tally-lists used in making the count and statement of the votes, and shall send such package by mail, properly and plainly addressed, to the governor of the State.

If that had said "to the secretary of state" it would have been a perfect and complete compliance with and execution of the constitution that I have read, for those are the returns, evidently the returns, exclusively the returns, mentioned in the constitution of the State of Louisiana. It then provides for triplicate copies and what is to be done with those. Then it proceeds to declare—for I need not read section 29, about the throwing out of votes, at this present time—

That the governor, the lieutenant-governor, the secretary of state, and John Lynch, and T. C. Anderson, or a majority of them, shall be the returning officers for all elections in the State, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum, and have power to make the returns of all elections. In case of any vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise, by either of the board, then the vacancy shall be filled by the residue of the board of returning officers. The returning officers shall after each election, before entering upon their duties, take and subscribe to the following oath, before a judge of the supreme or any district court:

"I, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully and diligently perform the duties of a returning officer as prescribed by law; that I will carefully and honestly canvass and compile the statements of the votes."

"Canvass and compile"—not "destroy or take away from," not "add to" upon any evidence whatever, but that he will take the papers which have come from the separate assemblies of the people under the guards and guarantees of the constitution and this law, and he will honestly and carefully canvass and compile them. Then—

Within ten days after the closing of the election, said returning officers shall meet in New Orleans to canvass and compile the statements of votes made by the supervisors of registration, and make returns of the election to the secretary of state.

There they are to make returns to the secretary of state. Take it for granted, as I say, for this purpose now that this is right and follows the constitution, what are they to return to the secretary of state? They are to return the result of the statements whichhave come from the assemblies of the people already certified to, sworn to from the various localities, and they are honestly to make up what those papers show under the law is the result. It is true, by the twenty-ninth section, if upon certain evidence, which the law carefully defines, it appears to them in a certain way that there has been bribery, or tumult, or whatever, to interfere with the election in a particular parish or precinct, they may, if they think the case warrants it, set aside all the returns from that parish or precinct. They are not to change them; they are not to change the footing; they are not to subtract or to add to them; but if they find there has been a state of public violence which shall have interfered with the freedom and purity of the election, upon certain evidence, which the law prescribes, then they are to set aside that people as for the time being disfranchised either by their own fault or the fault of some violent or fraudulent party who may have got possession of that particular voting place. The law itself gives this board no power of its own judgment or its own discretion in any way to tamper with or to change this primary and fundamental evidence, the only evidence which in any government which is to live by law can ever be received for the time being, the certificates from the people to show who have been elected members of the Legislature or the governor of the State. The liberties of a State would be in rather a hopeless chaos, if you take a hundred years to come, if the determination of who have been elected by the people to be their rulers is to be confided to the discretion of any selected board of men whatever. There is no civilized state that I know of where any such discretion has ever been reposed in any such board. In respect to Legislatures every constitution that I ever read provides that the Legislature itself, as the best and nearest tribunal to the liberty and security of the people, should be the exclusive judge of who have been elected to it; and wherever boards have intervened, as in this case it seems they did, their conduct has been guided by the severest restrictions of law and the strongest limitations upon their powers. So then, if you take this law, it was not open to the Lynch board, it was not open to the De Feriet board, or to the Wharton board, or to the dozen other boards that followed each other like the turns of a kaleidoscope in that State, to stand between the original returns coming from the people and the men whom those returns showed to be elected, with the single exception that the law states that if there was upon certain evidence fraud or tumult in a particular parish that parish was to be set aside altogether for the time being.

Now, what does the law say they are to do further after they have thus canvassed?

The governor shall at such meetings open, in the presence of the said returning officers, the statements of the supervisors of registration, and the said returning officers shall, from said statements, canvass and compile the returns of the election in duplicate. One copy of such returns they shall file in the office of the secretary of state, and of one copy they shall make public proclamation by printing in the official journal and such other newspapers as they may deem proper, declaring the names of all persons and offices voted for, the number of votes for each person, and the names of the persons who have been duly and lawfully elected. The returns of the election thus made and promulgated shall be prima facie evidence in all courts of justice and before all civil officers until set aside after a contest according to law.

What are the returns that they are to send to the secretary of state? Can any man stand up and say that it is any other thing than what the language of the law says, a compilation of results from the various sources which the law has provided and which has flowed into their hands. Such returns, it says—not those obtained by extrinsic evidence; not those obtained upon affidavit; not those obtained upon the judgment of any court; not those obtained in any other way than that they come from the separate assemblies of the people, sworn to and certified in the manner prescribed by law, their seals broken in their presence, and the results of those statements are to be proclaimed—and such results, thus proclaimed, are prima facie evidence. Then when you turn to section 56, which comes directly to the point of this house of representatives, you will find that it is provided:

That it shall be the duty of the secretary of state to transmit to the clerk of the house of representatives and the secretary of the senate of the last General Assembly a list of the names of such persons as, according to the returns, shall have been elected to either branch of the General Assembly.

Not a list of any persons such as, according to their judgment, ought to have been elected; not a list of such persons as, according to their judgment or as according to any evidence except that which the constitution and this law speaks of, ought to have been elected or were elected. The question of determining who were elected the constitution had invested in the house of representatives itself; and this action under the law and the constitution, therefore, is only to ascertain, as the law in terms declares, who in the first instance appeared from the papers to have been elected by the people and who thus, for the time being, make up the composition and the aggregate of the representatives of the people, under the constitution, in the house of representatives and in the senate. That being done, the constitution invests that tribunal with power to determine upon the right of every member who takes a seat in it and of every person who makes a claim to it; and if we were to hold otherwise we should then hold what this lamentable affair has shown would be the natural consequence of such a proceeding, that it is within the competence of the returning board of Louisiana at any time, without regard to what the original papers may show, to select a house of representatives and a senate for itself. It may take those who were voted for, it may take those who were not voted for; whoever it chooses to take and chooses to send a list of to the secretary of state become the members of the house of representatives and of the senate for the time being, on the theory of this election of this claimant here; and there is no help for it, while the constitution says that the returns coming from the people shall appear in the house of representatives and be canvassed and counted, having been sent to the secretary of state and by him turned over, and while the law says that this returning board, guided by the explicit letter of its commands, shall certify to the secretary of state the names of the persons who according to the returns, and those only, have been elected by the people as their representatives in the General Assembly. And yet, when you turn to this case, you find upon the undisputed evidence conceded all around that the board which returned the body of men that elected Mr. Pinchback never had any returns, never had any votes, and that they made up their list of the persons who were to compose the house of representatives that elected this gentleman from information which they received from a great variety of sources, unknown to the constitution and laws of Louisiana, unknown to any system of government of laws with which I am acquainted except it be made known to that final body, as in this case it may be to us, and as in a case in the house of representatives it may be to that body; and that was the evidence of what they thought the true state of things was or ought to be! You will see, Mr. President, how clear this becomes, much more clear than I can state it, to the eye of any intelligent person who will read the constitution and this law, when you find that this very faculty and function is to be exercised by the house of representatives and the senate itself in counting the votes after they shall have been returned to them through the channels provided by law.

Let me see now exactly what the Lynch board did. On page 155 of the testimony taken by our committee I find this statement in the testimony of Mr. John Lynch, the chairman of the Lynch board:

I have some personal experience in that—

That is referring to affidavits of colored men—

I would like to make a statement, with the permission of the committee, of the general principle that controlled me in my action as a member of the board.

Question. Go on and state it.

Answer. We had not the technical evidence before us—

He calls the evidence which the law requires "technical," just as some of us are sometimes berated, or used to be in this body, when we would read law to any person that it was rather hard to get over, we would immediately be accused of being "technical—"

We were what I considered in the midst of a revolution, and in order to get at the result of the election as near as we could, as an officer acting, I availed myself of every kind of information within my reach, not only the affidavits, but my former knowledge of the political divisions of the inhabitants of the State as corroborative of the evidence placed before us. I do not pretend to say that the results we arrived at in all cases were technically correct, but I believe we were substantially correct as to the result, and that it was the best we could do under the circumstances. It was the best under the circumstances we could do in our efforts to arrive at the truth.

Q. How many affidavits altogether were counted from different parishes as votes?

A. I could not enumerate the whole number. I have not them in my memory. I remember particular parishes. In Natchitoches there were 1,206.

Q. In this parish, in which you say the regular vote was rejected and you counted only those that made affidavits that they had not voted or had been denied the right to vote, how many were there?

A. That was Bossier—1,159.

Q. Was that the whole number of votes returned by you from that parish?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were they all for one ticket?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were there any other parishes in which the regular vote was thrown out

A. Yes, sir; Natchitoches.

Q. Was the whole of the regular vote thrown out there?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you acted upon affidavits?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many?

A. One thousand two hundred and six.

Q. For what tickets were those affidavits?
A. All republican.
Q. Then is your statement distinct that there were no votes counted in that parish except upon affidavits?
A. None by us.
Q. Were there any other parishes in the same way—that were thrown out entirely?
A. I do not at this moment recollect any.
Q. How many votes were thrown out in the first parish you named? How many did you reject?
A. I do not know that; we rejected the whole thing.
Q. State how many that was, as near as you can tell.
A. I cannot tell.
Q. Was it a hundred, or a thousand, or two thousand?
A. I cannot tell.

By Mr. CARPENTER:

Q. Will those returns be here, showing that precisely?
A. Yes, sir; we rejected the whole parish on the ground that we believed it to have been an organized fraud, and that we could not determine who the votes were cast for, nor what was the intention of the voters.

Thus in this particular instance, which I take as an illustration of the method of their doing things, this witness tells you that he had nothing in his board to go upon which the law and the constitution required; he tells you that he obtained nothing that the law or the constitution required, but that he acted upon the best information that he could get, no matter from what source it came, so that he was satisfied it would produce the result which he believed would be the true one, growing out of his previous knowledge of political parties in that State.

Mr. President, if I were to hear a democratic witness in the State of Indiana, or in the State of New Hampshire—where I believe some democratic witnesses are being examined at this very moment touching some similar performances to this, only on a smaller scale—testify that he as a polling or returning officer had set aside everything which had the semblance or pretense of official or legal regularity about it, and had taken his political notions as a guide and had then taken all the information he could get in support of the course he was to pursue and then had rejected all the republican votes in that town and had counted none but democratic ones, every republican in this Chamber would have held up his hands, if he had anything to say about it, and said, "Shame on the democracy of Manchester," or wherever it may be. And it has sometimes seemed to me that it was just possible that in the enthusiasm and zeal that we all feel for the great purposes for which our party is organized and the sympathy that we feel for the great things it has accomplished, we occasionally forget that we may make mistakes if in upholding the party of law and of order and of liberty, only secured under law and order, we wink at things done by members of our party that we should be the first to condemn if done by the members of some other.

This, then, was what this board undertook to do. This is one instance of it, perhaps an extreme instance; I presume it is the extremest one that there is. Certainly none could be more extreme, more extraordinary, than the one which I have read from the testimony of the witness whose board it was that created the Legislature which elected the gentleman who now asks us to declare that he is the lawful and the constitutional Senator of the State of Louisiana.

But, Mr. President, when this board was thus acting and was making public the result to which it arrived through means like these, what were its powers and its authority? I have endeavored to show you that it had no power or authority to do anything of the kind. It is a special creation of the law; it has no finality, and it can have none that the law does not expressly or by clear implication confer upon it; and when the law says it may throw out a parish for a certain reason, it is an implied declaration of the law that it shall not throw out a parish for any other reason; and when the law says that it shall compile and canvass the returns that come to it, that is certainly a prohibition against its compiling or canvassing and getting together information, as this witness calls it, derived from his political knowledge or from any other knowledge under the sun, I do not care how sacred or how particular or complete it may be; for the moment these officers of the law, whose duties are so clearly pointed out, depart from the firm foundation of that path which the law has marked out for them, there is no security for liberty or for right or for anything for which government is instituted, for the reason that there is then no guide or limit either to their powers or their discretion; and that people in my opinion will make a great mistake who undertake to uphold results produced by a body acting as this did outside of the constitution and the laws of the State, because, as the honorable Senator from Mississippi says, the final production of that performance happens to be a gentleman of a race which it is desirable at this particular time to cultivate the good opinion of.

I had hoped, Mr. President, that this question of race was to disappear from the arena of politics and from the arena of law. I had supposed that the amendments to the Constitution and the events which had produced and which have followed them had, in respect of political and private rights, erased from the polity of this country, at least, any question justly to be asked whether the particular candidate or the particular claimant or the particular citizen derived his descent from one race or from another, as much so as in a longer period of time, I take it, we have come all to believe that it is not a good thing to inquire whether the particular citizen or the particular candidate or claimant professes his religion under one system of theology, under one hierarchy or under another; and I am sorry, therefore, that any influence, however slight, should be brought to bear in discussing this question depending upon the origin of the claimant or of the person who may oppose him.

But, Mr. President, this board thus acting was by an act said to be constitutional—it is much the same as laws in other States which are constitutional, being approved in the vacation—absolutely abolished. Before this canvass was proclaimed, and before I believe it was completed, it had ceased, so far as an express and unmistakable enactment of legislative power could effect it, to have any existence whatever; and therefore the character of these gentlemen, supposing them to have been the legal board before, had become changed, and, instead of being a legal board, with no jurisdiction to act upon anything that they had before them, they had come to be a body of private citizens of the State of Louisiana, who, it is true, could act as private citizens upon any information they could obtain, but their action could find no warrant in the constitution or the laws of that or any other State They were left at last in precisely the same condition in respect of their official existence that they found the means of performing their functions to be while they had that existence. They had while they existed nothing to act upon, and when they ceased to exist there was neither board nor case; and yet after they ceased to exist they made this list of the men who voted for Mr. Pinchback, and declared that they were the members-elect of the house of representatives and of the senate of the State of Louisiana. That list I have taken the pains to look at. These gentlemen returned twenty-seven members of the General Assembly, who the witnesses on the other side in favor of McMillen in this bundle of testimony (members of the board that did have the original returns, and who do swear that they canvassed and compiled them in conformity with the law, honestly and truly, as they appeared to them) say composed the house. This list contained, as I say, twenty-seven names out of the one hundred and ten that composed the lower house of the General Assembly which the other gentlemen having the returns that came from the parishes, and that, whether good or bad, fraudulent or otherwise, were the things that came under the guise of law, found to have been elected. If there was a full house, that would leave about eighty persons on the list returned by the Lynch board who, so far as the papers went that came up from the parishes, had not title at all. If this board had had these returns and had obeyed the law upon the face of it, and had obeyed the constitution, they could not have returned anybody elected that did not appear to be elected by those returns, because the law had said what they should do precisely, and that was to canvass the returns that came, and if in one case of fraud and violence there was a ground of wrong they should set it aside altogether, which would leave a vacancy or leave the Legislature when it met to determine the question in its fundamental and constitutional capacity as the judge of the election of its own members.

That leads me to think that if a board which ceased to exist before it concluded its labors, and which had nothing whatever that the constitution or the law authorized any board to act upon, and which therefore had no authority at all to make any list whatever, has made a list of one hundred and ten men as being authorized to elect a Senator in this body, I must take leave to hesitate before I say that that Senator is elected.

The other Legislature, the McEnery legislature as it was called, according to the returns of the De Feriet and the Forman boards, had thirty people, and this Legislature of ours, as I will call it, had twenty-seven, about whose title to office there was no dispute. So that if we were going on the theory of jumping at probabilities and conclusions, they neither made a quorum nor anything like it, and the enemy had by three the best of the bargain. They came by three being nearest regular, if you are going to count it in that way. A quorum of the house would be fifty-six members. When Mr. Pinchback was elected there were I think twenty-one. I may not be precisely accurate as to the number, but less than twenty-seven at any rate—twenty-one, I think, of the people who appeared by the returns that came from the parishes to have a right to sit in that house.

Governor Warmoth called this Legislature together. They were to assemble, I think, on the 9th of December, 1872. On the 6th of December, as you all know, under the order of Judge Durell, the State-house was taken possession of by the troops of the United States; and a Mr. Antoine about the same time, or before the 9th of December at any rate, obtained an injunction from Judge Durell—not the midnight order, but a later one—commanding every one of the persons whom the De Feriet board had returned to be members of the Legislature who were not returned by the Lynch board, that is, every one except these twenty-seven, not to set his foot, in any capacity of assisting in the organization of any of these bodies, within the door-ways of that great hall of justice and of law in the State of Louisiana. That was the order of Judge Durell, the injunction in the Antoine suit, as it was called. It was convenient, as the report says in fighting the devil with fire, not only that the President of the United States should be drawn into this controversy in a way which would be perfectly natural and easy to draw him in his obedience to law in supporting judicial process, to have the marshal authorized to maintain the judicial process of the United States, which of course he must be authorized to do, and it is not every case by any means in which either he or the President can judge or have the right to judge whether that process can be supported or not, for if that were so the Executive would usurp all judicial power, he would be the ultimate judge of whether any judicial power is to be executed or not; but, as I say, it was convenient not only to thus draw in the Executive of the United States with the arm of the Government to take possession by military force in aid of the marshal of the place of the meeting of the General Assembly, but it was necessary to supplement that, lest it might be that the President would be too early advised or that his commanding officer would be too little advised by the judge under the existing order, and it was necessary that the judge should reach out his mandate to every man by name whom the other side claimed to be elected and say to him, "You shall not participate;" and so by these two contrivances were got together on the 9th of December, 1872, that body of men that styled itself the Legislature of the State of Louisiana and that demands as a right under the Constitution of the United States that a man of its selection shall be the Senator of that State for six years.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator yield to me for an inquiry?

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it is for an inquiry, I will indulge the Senator; but if for a speech, I will yield the floor presently.

Mr. HOWE I will wait for the opportunity to make a speech; I now ask permission to make an inquiry. It is whether any man was kept out of the Louisiana State-house by virtue of the restraining order issued in the Antoine suit?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was not there and I do not know. All I know is that here is the order, and I assume that it was obtained and issued for a purpose; and with the well-known reverence for law that exists in the State of Louisiana I must suppose that every one of the people who were enjoined obeyed the injunction. I will read the order to my friend and see if I am mistaken in that:

Circuit court of the United States in and for the district of Louisiana.

C. C. ANTOINE vs. H. C. WARMOTH et als. } No. 6861—in equity.

Restraining order.—Issued December 7 1872.

Whereas the plaintiff herein has this day filed and exhibited his bill of complaint against the said defendant, H. C. Warmoth, and the other defendants named in said bill of complaint, and has therein prayed that injunctions, pendente lite, issue against the defendants therein, and that a restraining order be also issued restraining the said defendants, as prayed for in said bill, from doing or permitting to be done the acts in said bill complained of:

Now, therefore, on motion of J. R. Beckwith and E. C. Billings, solicitors for complainant, it is ordered that the defendants named in said bill do show cause, on the 11th day of December, 1872, why injunctions, pendente lite, should not be allowed as prayed for. It is further ordered that said defendants, each and every one of them, be, and are hereby, commanded and restrained to the extent and effect as in said bill of complaint prayed [the clerk will attach to this order a copy of the prayer for injunction as set forth in said bill of complaint] until the hearing and determination of said rule for injunction, and until the further order of the court in the premises.

Now here comes the prayer:

And that a writ of injunction also issue to the said J. J. Mellon, &c.—

Quoting about sixty-five names, being the persons returned as elected by the De Feriet board and not returned as elected by the Lynch board—enjoining and restraining them and each of them from participating in any manner in the organization of the house of representatives to be convened on the 9th day of December, A. D. 1872, or at any time thereafter, or from doing any act or thing toward, in, or about the organization of the same, either by casting a vote or otherwise, unless his name shall be and appear on the list of names of members of said house transmitted to the clerk of the same by George E. Bovee, secretary of state, as having been elected to the same.

And a similar injunction against the members of the senate. That was an injunction against every member returned as elected by the De Feriet board that had the returns, including these twenty-seven, but excluding them in effect by this qualification at the end, "unless his name appears in the returns furnished by the Lynch board." My friend from Wisconsin asks me if I have any evidence that any of these people were prevented—I suppose he means as a fact—from attempting to participate in this organization. I have not any means of knowing that; I do not know what the fact is.

Mr. HOWE. By that order?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Prevented by this order. The order says that a writ of injunction issue to these people by name—

Enjoining and restraining them and each of them from participating in any manner in the organization of the senate to be convened on the 9th day of December, A. D. 1872, or at any time thereafter, or from doing any act or thing toward, in, or about the organization of said senate, either by casting a vote or otherwise, unless his name shall be and appear on the list of names of members of said senate transmitted to the secretary of the same by George E. Bovee, secretary of state, as having been elected thereto.

If that is not a prevention in the sense of a prohibition I confess I do not understand the force of language.

Mr. HOWE. Undoubtedly it was a prohibition, but then the Senator remembers very well that that order was issued on the 7th of December and the State-house had been closed under the midnight order of the day before.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So it had. That is exactly what I was saying. I said it was not thought to be safe that the military should have taken possession of the State-house; they might let in these claimants who stood upon the original returns; it was not safe, because perhaps the President of the United States, who was known to be an honest man, would find out that people were being excluded who had as good an apparent title to their seats as these people had, whether in fact they had a title or not, and perhaps he could not be relied upon, if he should get hold of the real truth about it, to stand in the way of the right of those who had such evidence of title as this, be it good or bad, to get in; and therefore it was necessary that Durell under this arrangement should reach out to the very men themselves, one by one, and say to them, "I take hold of you personally, and no matter whether the troops will let you in or not, you shall go to jail as in contempt of my court if you undertake to do anything touching that organization."

Why, Mr. President, filing a petition setting forth your right as a member, if you sent it by an attorney, would have been a breach of that injunction; and, if Durell had had as much courage as he had some other qualities, if any one of these members had undertaken to send a letter to the speaker of the house of representatives or to Bovee, secretary of state, stating that he wished to appeal to the good sense of the body of men who were assembling there to be heard in the premises, he would have been guilty and brought up for punishment.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator remembers, I suppose, that two weeks before that the same court in another suit had issued an order prohibiting all persons from pretending to give any certificates except the Lynch board, and that that was not obeyed at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, Mr. President, I remember, and I also remember, and I hope the Senator does, that Durell had never issued any order prohibiting the De Feriet board from giving any certificate about anything, and that was where, as the report of Senator Carpenter and General LOGAN and Senator ANTHONY and General ALCORN point out, the advantage was in this fighting of two devils, Warmoth, the head devil, and the other fellow. When he found that Durell's injunction was going to prevent the Warmoth board from making any returns at all, Warmoth then by the exercise of a constitutional power, as it is conceded upon all hands, abolished the Warmoth board by an act of the Legislature, and then, exercising the same power that the President of the United States has a thousand times done under our Constitution, he filled up the vacancies created by that law in the vacation of the Senate of Louisiana by appointing the De Feriet board, who not being under any injunction, and being fresh, as the saying is, from the people, if there are any people there in the true sense on any side, proceeded to canvass the returns and to publish and promulgate the result in strict accordance, upon the force of the papers, with the constitution and laws of Louisiana; whether in real accordance is quite another question. So there is no getting away from the unpleasant fact—and I say it the more freely from the circumstance that it is unpleasant to me—there is no getting away from the unpleasant fact that the body of men who elected Mr. Pinchback were assembled together and selected out of the citizens of Louisiana by a series of contrivances that I think it safe to say is without a parallel in the history of any community governed by law. The operations of the other board and of Governor Warmoth and the operations and contrivances of that election parallel it in many respects, and in some respects more than parallel it; but we must not forget that we are not now trying the question of whether the McEnery legislature was a good one or not; we are not trying whether the McEnery governorship is a good one or not; we are trying this man upon his title; and it does not follow because some other body of men were as bad as this, because some other body of men had as much of fraud and as little of law and truth to stand upon or more than this, that this man has any rights. The question is not, as I say, whether McMillen would be entitled; but the question is whether this man was elected by the real and constitutional Legislature of the State of Louisiana, who alone under the Constitution of the United States and of that State have a right to send here a Senator. That is the question. It does not help it, therefore, to doubt whether the other body of men was a good one; it does not help it to know that the other body of men was not a good one if we do know it; it does not help it to believe, as I believe, that the election in that State in that year was carried by a systematic and vigorous scheme of fraud and of intimidation. We cannot because a State has gone to chaos, we cannot because a State (as Lynch himself swears he acted upon the idea of its being) was in a state of revolution, say that we will take any man as a Senator who is picked up by any body of men who choose to assemble themselves together. We should violate our duty and become a party to irregular and revolutionary and fraudulent governments the moment we set our seal of approbation upon a proceeding of that character.

It would be curious if we had time to go through with the history of this body of men. It is unique. This body of men, made thus secure by the soldiers of the United States under guise of supporting legal process, as they were, legal in form, and under an injunction against everybody else who could possibly set up a counter-claim, was got together on the 9th of December, 1872. The very first act they did, I believe, certainly on that day, was to exercise the august powers with which they had thus been invested by impeaching Governor Warmoth. I think it quite probable that Governor Warmoth ought to have been impeached; but I believe the constitution of Louisiana requires that a house of representatives shall impeach a governor, and not a body of men who have got together without any authority of law. That was the first step. Then, under the laws of Louisiana, Governor Warmoth was said to be suspended. Suppose Governor Warmoth had been unwilling to be suspended and had said "I will not submit." Ah, but there were the injunctions of Durell and there was the power of the United States upholding the authority of judicial law. What chance had Warmoth to resist? Mr. Pinchback, I believe, by some very extraordinary state of the law and of steps taken under it, suddenly came to be governor. He had only been a senator; his term had expired; but never mind; by one of these curious things that the supreme court of Louisiana can undoubtedly explain the private citizen, Mr. Pinchback, was suddenly transformed into governor of the State of Louisiana, and he communicated with this Legislature, and Governor Warmoth was stranded, as probably in justice he ought to have been; but it should have been justice by regular methods. There is this to be said, that the moment this impeachment had been filed and the suspension accomplished the zeal of the impeachers for judicial proceedings seems suddenly to have ceased, and the impeachment was never, so far as I have heard of, prosecuted. I may be wrong about that. It had suspended the objectionable functionary and had worked its office. Then the Legislature adjourned to meet at the regular time on the 14th or 6th of January, or whatever the day was. They met again. The same twenty-one only, or twenty-seven if you make the most of it, of the persons who according to the returns from the parishes had been elected, appeared again with their seventy or eighty confrères picked up by Mr. Lynch and his associates upon such information as they could obtain, guided, as I believe I have said, by their previous knowledge of the political state of affairs.

Well, Mr. President, if such methods are rightful, I should be glad for one to be the returning board for the next House of Representatives of the United States. I could pick up on such information as I could possess, guided by my previous knowledge of the state of political opinion, a republican majority in that body, because Iocould show that for fourteen or fifteen years there had been heavy republican majorities in the greatest number of the congressional districts of the United States. Guided by that fact I could reason myself to the conclusion that if the people had had a fair chance to reflect and think and get over the flood of democratic lies that were shed over the country everywhere, they would have elected good honest republicans, and if that method be rightful I could with a clear conscience furnish the co-ordinate branch at the other end of the Capitol next December with a very respectable republican majority. And yet, Mr. President, I do not suppose that even my brothers here who do not think as I do about this business, and whose sincerity and patriotism I do not question—I rather question the correctness of my own ability to understand this case when I see how many differ from me—would hardly think that it would be a good thing for the whole body of the Union, however it may do for Louisiana, to find out who compose the House of Representatives by methods and contrivances like that. I know they would not. It would shock us all. It could not be done; I do not mean could not be done physically, but it could not be done in the moral sense of any body of men who could be got together, because the great body of men in every country that has been successful in a government of law and of liberty combined has found its chief corner-stone in the reverence for law and for orderly procedure which pervades the whole body of the people. So long as you have that, whatever temporary misfortune may occur, you will have liberty and you will have progress. But when you cast loose from that, you will have what you see follows wherever you have cast loose from it—revolution and the guillotine, as in France; tumults and disorders of every kind, as in Louisiana; and on the other hand you will do a still greater evil in lowering the tone of that respect for law and for orderly methods which now, as I say, is the chief and only foundation of government in our own Northern States. When a people only respect law because it is backed by power, instead of respecting it because it is the true expression of the public will and right of itself, that people will very soon either become the abject slaves of a tyrant or they will produce an explosion which will carry them, as it often has, to an extreme of anarchy and confusion, worse it may be for the time being than the very tyranny which they had rebelled against.

Then I feel, I confess, Mr. President, some hope that I shall not lose the little standing that I possess among the brothers of the republican party in holding on to what I consider to be the sheet-anchor of our security. We have stood by the law; we have insisted that our southern brethren should stand by it and obey it. The point that we have made to them and against them has been that they have not respected the rights of their fellow-citizens under the law. Let us be careful that we do not make an example greater even than any that they have given us, in one sense, by departing from the clear line of the law in order that a temporary advantage or a temporary sentiment, as the honorable Senator from Mississippi puts it, may have a little sway.

But, Mr. President, we have been told that we are estopped, as the lawyers say, in this business by the decisions of the supreme court of Louisiana. Indeed, it seems to be the chief ground upon which, on the merits of this case, the honorable Senator from Indiana presses us to vote in favor of the admission of this claimant. He says this is a question of local law, and when the highest tribunal of that State has solemnly pronounced that Kellogg is the governor and that the Lynch board is the true returning board and so by consequence that this body of men is the true Legislature for the time being, we have no authority to revise or to overrule or to disregard that judgment, and that whatever that court has said the Legislature of that State is is binding upon us and forecloses the question.

Sir, I take leave to differ from that proposition. I differ from it upon two or three grounds. In the first place, the Constitution of the United States has for the purpose that we now have in hand made us, and not the supreme court of Louisiana, the judges of what is the Legislature of that State. In the second place—for I need not enlarge upon this—neither the constitution nor the laws of Louisiana itself authorize or profess to authorize the supreme court of that State to pronounce at all upon what body of men is the Legislature of that State. They have as little power to pronounce upon that, in my opinion, as I, an individual citizen of Vermont, have. The frame-work of the governments of these States, as of the Government of the United States, was based upon the idea that no one department, not even the judicial department, should have any authority to interfere with or control the existence or the functions of the other departments of the Government. They may decide causes between men, and so far as they affect the men who are the parties to the cause and the consequences which are to follow from it to those men their judgments are in general binding; but no court, no matter how broad its jurisdiction may be, can in a government framed like ours, either State or national, undertake to declare to be binding in any sense upon Congress or upon the Legislature of a State whether a particular body of men in the State are its Legislature or not. The thing itself involves a contradiction. Suppose there is a Legislature, as in Louisiana, exercising actual power, as this body of men were exercising it, and there is a supreme court. If they say that Legislature is not a Legislature, that is an act of treason, and the first thing that would happen, the first thing that ought to happen, unless that Legislature were to be driven out at the point of the bayonet, which no court can do, would be that every one of the judges who concurred in such a decision would be justly impeached and deposed from office, because it would be one branch of the government declaring that the other branch in possession of and exercising power was usurping the functions that belonged to somebody else, and that branch of the government of necessity must immediately exercise its functions and depose the body that made war upon it. How long would it be—if I may refer to such a lofty tribunal, whose judgments are entitled to, as they always receive, so much respect—if that august tribunal sitting in the space between us and the House of Representatives should declare some day that the body of men exercising legislative power, whether rightfully or wrongfully, at the other end of the Capitol were not the House of Representatives at all, that they had no business there—how long would it be before a committee of that body of men would appear at the bar of this Chamber with articles of impeachment against that body of judges? I say that the moment you reflect upon it, the idea of bringing into judicial determination the legal existence of another branch of a government framed as ours is, with a view to its having any effect upon that existence, a power which is absolute, is totally inadmissible; they cannot stand together.

But, Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator is through on that point I should like to ask him a question right here, because I want to know his opinion. In reference to his statement as to the court having no knowledge or power to decide, I ask him is it not a fact that the court of a State is bound to take judicial notice as to the Legislature, so as to know what the laws of the State are? Is not a court bound to take judicial notice of it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that the question?

Mr. LOGAN. That is one question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a very easy question and is very easily answered. I answer yes; and the moment the court fails to take judicial notice of the body that is exercising the functions of a Legislature, that moment that body will put its foot upon the court. That is exactly what I am saying. The court is bound to take judicial notice, and being bound to take judicial notice, it cannot draw into question for decision a thing that in the language of mathematics is an axiom——

Mr. LOGAN. But, if the Senator will allow me, following that, I will ask him this question: If the court is bound to take judicial notice as to what body the Legislature is for the purpose of passing upon the laws or recognizing the laws, suppose there were two men claiming to be the governor of a State, two bodies claiming to be the Legislature, both passing laws, the laws of both being signed by these two governors—I ask the Senator then how the people are to ascertain what the laws are that they are to obey?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will tell the Senator how they are to ascertain. They are to ascertain in exactly the same way that people always must ascertain when they get into a political convulsion how they are to get out of it. If there were fifty governments sweeping over a country one after another or all together, I hold that no one of the courts who exercise functions can undertake to say that any other government is the true one, for what the Supreme Court says in Luther vs. Borden——

Mr. LOGAN. But, Mr. President, the Senator——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Gentlemen, do not all speak at once. I have not quite finished the Senator on that topic yet, and then I will receive another.

The Senator's puzzle, if it is a puzzle to him, is not a difficult one to those who have known the course of political events. The moment in his case the court were to undertake to say, as I stated, that they were pronouncing upon the right of either one of those boside of men to be the Legislature they would receive the destruction which they would merit in a legal sense from that Legislature which had the power to depose them. No Legislature can give up its individual power at the judgment of any court. The Senator does not contend that, but he says how are the people to know what are the laws under which they live. Do the people find out what are the laws under which they live from courts? I never knew that, except as they receive punishment when they violate them. I supposed that people find out what the laws are, to use the Senator's illustration, by taking judicial notice, if I may use such a phrase as applied to private citizens. I supposed that most people knew the axiom which pervades all systems of civilized society, that every citizen or subject of the country is bound to know what the law is and he is bound to know what is the head of his government. He has no right to go to a court to inquire what is the head of a government or to know whether he is bound to obey the law. No man can shelter himself in that way; no man could ever try to shelter himself in that way.

The only difficulty that the Senator has stated is that there may exist a system of anarchy in a particular State, or a system of a double tyranny, where two factions have been contending for the sway and where both of them are exercising power at the same time. That is a difficulty undoubtedly, it is an unpleasant state of things; but to hold that any court deriving its authority from the same frame of government is to determine for that people which of these two political bodies which the constitution says, speaking of the true one, if you can only find out which it is, is the political body, is to be obeyed by them, is to assert a proposition that can never be maintained, because the result of that is that, instead of having a balanced government, you have thrown the whole government into the hands of the judiciary—just as I suppose Mr. Kellogg and his confrères in Louisiana presumed that they would throw the government of Louisiana into the hands of a friendly judiciary and settle the question, for effect at least at Washington, by the determinations that they obtained from that court; but it is only just to that court to say, as I understand it, that that court has not undertaken to decide this question; it has only undertaken to say that in a given case, on an application for an office under the form of law, a particular man was entitled instead of another.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon, the court say expressly that they are bound to recognize the legislative body for the purpose of passing upon the laws. Now the Senator has answered the question and answered it adroitly, but I do not think he has given a square answer to the question I put. My question is this: If two Legislatures set up in a State, both pass laws, and the laws should be in opposite directions, two governors signing these laws, how are the people—and the presumption is against the people, the presumption of law is that the people know the law—how are the people of the State to determine in their course of conduct as to which statutes they will obey?

Mr. EDMUNDS. They must determine as they always have done under such circumstances, with their lives and their fortunes in their hands. They must determine it by adhering to one government or the other, and the one they do adhere to they must give their blood and their strength to maintain. That is the way they must determine it and the only way it can be determined in the case stated by the Senator.

Mr. LOGAN. That then is sustaining a government by force?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir; two governments in exactly that relation are sustained by force. The judiciary cannot sustain them.

Mr. LOGAN. Then it is a question of power and not a question of law?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is it.

Mr. LOGAN. As to whether the government shall be sustained? And that is the reason of the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is part of the reason of the Senator, and I am not sure but that it is better stated by my friend than it could be by myself. I think, if the Senator will refresh his knowledge of history a little, he will observe that all the history we know anything about in this world has shown that to be exactly the case, that people found out what government they were living under by adhering to that or making war upon it and taking the consequences.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will see that the direction in which I was tending is to place the condition of things as I have supposed them and then have him to show us the road out of the dilemma. The point I intended to arrive at is to see the road out of the dilemma that he places us in by holding that force must decide it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sure that I need not spend any time to show my honorable friend from Illinois, who has carved with his good sword a road out of greater dilemmas than that, any way of getting out of the dilemma which raises a mere question of defending yourself by force. The Senator knows how to do that, and he has done it most nobly and bravely a great many times, and the Senator cannot fail to see—he sees it now, it is unnecessary to pursue that topic any further—that where two governments are contending for the sway, both of them cannot be obeyed in a space of country and at the same time and over the same subjects, unless you go back to the old times of history with which my friend is so familiar, where they tried the experiment of obeying two distinct governments and powers running at the same time; but it did not work; they gave it up after a very little. So the dilemma my friend sees is no dilemma at all, except the one I have stated, a dilemma that misfortunes and tumult bring upon the people.

Suppose there were too judiciaries, to vary it a little. How are the people to find out, if there are two supreme courts running, which is the true one? Here is a mandate from this court and a mandate from that. A cause is sued in one court and a cause is sued in another; the same question is pending in both courts at the same time. What are you going to do about it?

Mr. THURMAN. There were two supreme courts in the Southern States during the war.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, there were, as the Senator says. What are you going to do about it? One court proceeds on its own jurisdiction and cares no more and pays no more attention to the other court than it would to a foreign court in a foreign country. It has nothing to do with it. It only says, "these are our judgments; here is our mandate; obey it or take the consequences." The party does obey it, unless he can shield himself not by the opinion but by the power of the contending party on the other side. So that every question of that kind must come at last, unless one party or the other recedes, to the unfortunate arbitrament of the sword. The god of battles, as the saying is, must be the arbiter between the two contending factions in a case of that kind, and there is no help for it. And were it not that this very State of Louisiana is one of the component members of this consolidated family of nations, as I may call them, and if therefore the rest of the family had no legal or moral interest in their welfare, it would not be a question of dialectics here or anywhere else what is the government of Louisiana. It would be a question, as it has been in France and in Spain and in Mexico, and here too, of which party is the strongest in maintaining the sovereignty that it asserts. So I say were it not for the interest that the Constitution of the United States compels us to take, and were it not for the fact that this State is a member of the nation and the nation cannot tolerate a revolution in States, we should not be troubled about any such questions as this, the courts of Louisiana would not be troubled with any such questions, independent and sovereign as they would be under such circumstances nevertheless. The power that was the strongest would establish its own courts and would put down all others, not by the judgments of tribunals, but by the force of sovereign authority making war in defense of itself.

But, Mr. President, there is another thing about this supreme court which ought to be said in reference to its decisions. I can agree with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. ALCORN] when he says he has no respect for its judgments. I have listened to these debates now for two or three years, and to the best of my recollection I can truthfully say that I have not heard the most zealous advocate for the Kellogg and Pinchback side anywhere attempt even to maintain the soundness of these decisions of the supreme court of the State of Louisiana that are relied upon. If any such argument has been made it has escaped my observation, for I say, and I say it with deliberation, if you will take the constitution of Louisiana and the act 1872 that was approved by Warmoth when he abolished the Lynch board, and the decision of the supreme court of that State holding, if they have gone so far as that, that the Lynch board was not abolished in respect of its capacity to perform the functions of its office, and compare them, you will feel, with a certain sense of humiliation, that any tribunal that professed to administer law for the sake of law which could say that in the face of that constitution and of that statute was deserving of something less than respect.

A supreme court or any other court whatever, standing in awe of the power of this body of men, holding its existence at their will, a court which had seen a governor hung up by an impeachment passed within an hour of the assembling of the Legislature and pressed no further, and who could see its own members in the prospect as easily disposed of if they failed to recognize whatever any causes brought before them which it was necessary to recognize—I say a court which, seeing all that and yielding to it and holding that an act of the Legislature, confessed to be valid, which in express terms repealed all laws and all offices connected with elections theretofore existing was not to take effect until such convenient season as the court should think it was suitable for the persons holding under the old law to perform the function with which the old law had invested them, is a humiliating thing. Therefore inasmuch as the Constitution of the United States has in this instance made me the judge of whether the body of men who elected Pinchback was the Legislature of Louisiana, I must take leave, as the Supreme Court of the United States said in a recent case, to follow my judgment and not theirs.

The Senator from Indiana stated the other day, as illustrating the binding obligation of the decisions of courts of the States, that the Supreme Court of the United States was bound to follow and did follow the judgments of the courts of the various States upon questions of the interpretation of the laws of such States, and therefore by analogy we were bound, being in some sense as he supposed a coordinate tribunal, to acknowledge the force of these decisions in the State of Louisiana. Now let me see whether my honorable friend was quite correct in his statement of the law as administered by the Supreme Court of the United States. The Supreme Court of the United States a year ago, at the last term preceding this one, were called upon to determine what was the law of the State of Michigan touching the power of a municipal corporation under its constitution and laws to issue bonds in aid of a railway enterprise—a case which you will see as I state it, Mr. President, is as perfectly within the competence of local administration as anything can possibly be. If there is any one thing in respect of which it could be truly said that the administration and adjudication of local law is to be respected and obeyed it is that which relates to the powers of a municipal corporation in a State, a corporation that exists entirely for political purposes, a corporation which has no autonomy or possibility of existence outside of the dominion in which it is created, a corporation which no obligation in respect of the performance of contracts binds a State to respect for a single moment—it may abolish it or set it up And yet the supreme court of the State of Michigan having declared that this municipal corporation, the creation of its own sovereignty, had not the power to issue bonds in aid of a railway enterprise, the Supreme Court of the United States, in a unanimous decision, declared:

It is insisted that the invalidity of the statute has been determined by two judgments of the supreme court of Michigan, and that we are bound to follow those adjudications. We have examined those cases with care. With all respect for the eminent tribunal by which the judgments were pronounced we must be permitted to say that they are not satisfactory to our minds. We think the dissenting opinion in the one first decided is unanswered. Similar laws have been passed in twenty-one States. In all of them but two it is believed their validity has been sustained by the highest local courts. It is not easy to resist the force of such a current of reason and authority. The question before us belongs to the domain of general jurisprudence. In this class of cases this court is not bound by the judgment of the courts of the States where the cases arise. It must hear and determine for itself. Here commercial securities are involved. When the bonds were issued there had been no authoritative intimation from any quarter that such statutes were invalid. The Legislature affirmed their validity in every act by an implication equivalent in effect to an express declaration. And during the period covered by their enactment neither of the other departments of the government of the State lifted its voice against them. The acquiescence was universal.

The general understanding of the legal profession throughout the country is believed to have been that they were valid. The national Constitution forbids the States to pass laws impairing the obligation of contracts. In cases properly brought before us that end can be accomplished unwarrantably no more by judicial decisions than by legislation. Were we to yield in cases like this to the authority of the decisions of the courts of the respective States, we should abdicate the performance of one of the most important duties with which this tribunal is charged, and disappoint the wise and salutary policy of the framers of the Constitution in providing for the creation of an independent Federal judiciary. The exercise of our appellate jurisdiction would be but a solemn mockery.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator state what volume he reads from?

Mr. EDMUNDS. O, yes; the nineteenth volume of Wallace; the case of Pine Grove vs. Talcott; the page I have forgotten. And I could read many more similar decisions for the benefit of my honorable friend if I did not too much tax the time and patience of the Senate in so doing. It would indeed be a solemn thing if, sworn under the Constitution of the United States to determine by whom and how this claimant is elected, we were to say, "this has been determined for us by a court in the very State whose political character is now drawn in question in upholding one faction at the expense of the other." There could be no greater mockery, because there could be no consequence more dangerous to the peace and security of this country than for the Senate of the United States to abdicate its great powers in determining who and what bodies of men are to make up the political associates of this great council chamber of the nation, who are to determine for us and for all the States how this country is to be governed. No, Mr. President, when this people are so far gone either in fanaticism or whatever it may be that they change their constitution so that Senators shall be selected by the judges of the supreme courts of the various States, it will be time enough then for us to say that we bow to the decision of such a court in determining the character of the body of men who have presented this candidate to us.

There is one other thing that I ought not to forget, although I had almost done so. This case is pressed chiefly, I almost might say exclusively, by those who have it mainly in charge, upon the ground that, after all, we are not taking a dangerous step, because there is still left to us the power to inquire into the real merit of this question and expel or unseat this gentleman after he shall have come in, if on inquiry it turns out that he ought not to be here; and that all we are now called upon to do is to say that prima facie he appears to be entitled to a seat. Well, sir, a good deal has been said about what is prima facie, but I had supposed that the learned Senator who has brought forward this convenient and certainly excusable method of getting over a very serious difficulty would have seen that prima facies would have been a good deal better horse to ride in 1873 when this man's credentials were presented than it is now. When they were first presented, of course there was nothing upon the face of the paper which need excite suspicion. It was publicly known probably that Mr. Kellogg was actually exercising the powers of governor of Louisiana and that he had in his possession the great seal of the State and that no other person was exercising the powers of governor of Louisiana. Whether any other person had in his possession the great seal might perhaps meet a different answer, for I believe some of the witnesses said here that great seals were as plenty as blackberries down there; certainly everything else was; returning boards, secretaries of state, governors and lieutenant-governors and legislators were thick enough everywhere; you would stumble upon one whenever you turned a corner.

So then, Mr. President, this document bore upon its face the sweet impress of prima facies when it came here; and yet my honorable friend from Indiana, if I am not mistaken, himself, not yet being advised how much stronger the prima facie case would be than the real one, on the 20th of January, in this body made this motion:

Resolved, That the credentials of Hon. P. B. S. Pinchback be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections; that the committee have power to send for persons and papers, and be instructed to investigate the circumstances attending the election of said Pinchback to a seat in this body.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. What year?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Eighteen hundred and seventy-four. I have made a mistake in my chronology and have read the last prima facie committal to the Committee on Privileges and Elections instead of the first; it struck me more at the time it was made, and hence I have turned to it first. On the 4th of December, 1873, it was—

On motion by Mr. MORTON,

Ordered, That the credentials of P. B. S. Pinchback and W. L. McMillen, claiming seats as Senators from the State of Louisiana, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

And on the 15th of December, 1873—

Mr. MORTON, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of P. B. S. Pinchback and W. L. McMillen, claiming seats in the Senate as Senators from Louisiana, reported that the committee were evenly divided upon the question as to whether Mr. Pinchback is, upon his credentials, entitled to be sworn in as a member, and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject and to refer the whole matter to the determination of the Senate.

Thus we had remitted to us by the Committee on Privileges and Elections the whole matter. Then came afterward, after this whole matter had been remitted to us, upon what information or upon what motive I am not advised, this motion of the Senator from Indiana to recommit the credentials of Mr. Pinchback to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which was done at a later day, I do not know but at the same session, "with instructions to investigate the circumstances attending the election of said Pinchback to a seat in this body." On motion of the Senator from Indiana I think himself that committee was also at the proper time instructed to inquire into the existence of a State government in Louisiana, and to report to us what the circumstances of political affairs in that State were. That has been done, and the result of that is this body of report and testimony, signed, as I have said, by the Senator from Wisconsin, (Mr. Carpenter,) the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. ALCORN,] and concurred in by the other Senator from Illinois then a member of this body, (Judge Trumbull,) concurred in by the Senator from Indiana himself, if I correctly understand his minority report in respect to the facts which the committee found and reported. I do not observe—if I am mistaken my friend will correct me, because I do not wish to overstate it—I am unable to observe in the report of the Senator from Indiana any difference in respect of the substantial history of this transaction. There could not be really, because this report seems to have been drawn, so far as it affects the question that we now have in hand—that of the Kellogg legislature—from the testimony of persons most favorable to it, like Mr. Lynch, on whose authority alone it stood, and whose testimony therefore as far as they state it, where it is against the end which they had in view, must have been taken to be correct, for they had no motive to misrepresent; quite the reverse. So that, these credentials being under consideration by the committee and by the Senate, the committee under the order of the Senate, in order as I must suppose that the Senate might have possession of everything that touched this question—for it was too fundamental for mere prima facie (if I may so use the term)—directed this committee to give us the whole history of the case. We have then, like a court, the special verdict of this jury of our own selection, which covers every question that has yet been disclosed and which I have undertaken to discuss touching the right of this man to a seat. So then all the evidence, all the facts which can touch any future Senate or any future members of the Senate or ourselves to-morrow, if this man were to be admitted to-day or at any future time, in making up our judgment upon the real right which he may possess, are already before us.

That being the case, I confess it is with some surprise that I hear my honorable friend from Indiana say that it is the duty of the Senate, without regard to the real merit or demerit that appears from these real facts, to say that this man shall be seated upon a paper the very validity of which is drawn in question by the very testimony that the committee report.

Why, Mr. President, to my humble comprehension it is an utter confusion of terms to say that this gentleman has a prima facie case. He either has a real case, standing upon a real right disclosed by full testimony, or he has no case at all. There is no half-way business about this. The transaction in every phase of it is before us in an authoritative and a judicial way through the very and only methods that this body can ever adopt to ascertain the truth and to decide upon the merits; and to be told, now that the whole evidence is in, that the whole subject has been brought up, that everything is known, that we will admit a man upon one part of his case and consider at some future time whether we will reject him upon the other part, which is already before us, is, I must say with all respect, a mockery of justice. It is not only unjust to the other States who are interested that no man shall be here whose right it is not to be here, but it is an injustice and a mockery to him to say "We will receive you upon this piece of paper whose validity is drawn in question, and we will expel you to-morrow if on looking into it we think you ought not to be admitted." It is a mockery, sir, as it seems to me, with all respect.

But, Mr. President, I have occupied too much of the time of the Senate. There is, however, one other topic that I think I ought to advert to before I sit down. If I read the RECORD correctly, within a day or two my honorable friend from Indiana has said that the state of this case is somewhat, I do not know but conclusively, changed by the circumstance that the President of the United States has recognized the Kellogg government; that he having recognized that government we are bound to recognize it in all its departments, which have no necessary connection with each other; for Kellogg may have been elected and yet the one hundred and ten men returned by the Lynch board may not have been elected to the Legislature. We know that in the State of Massachusetts quite recently the gubernatorial election and the election for members of the Legislature did not compare at all. We had a democratic governor, but we had a heavy republican majority of members of the two houses of its General Assembly. To say therefore that the President's recognition of Governor Kellogg implies even a presidential opinion that these one hundred and ten men that came from nowhere so far as the evidence shows—I mean the official evidence—are the Legislature of Louisiana, might be quite another thing.

Mr. MORTON. Does the Senator remember that the President recognized the Legislature as the lawful Legislature before Kellogg was inaugurated? That is where the recognition began.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, Mr. President; I am coming to that. I have not the faculty that some of my friends have of doing more than one thing at a time. I was beginning with the Executive. I say that the recognition of Kellogg by the President of the United States would not imply by any means that he recognized the Legislature, and I was about to say that his recognition of the Legislature would not imply by any means from that fact that he recognized Kellogg, because I had shown in the instance of Massachusetts that it does not follow logically or necessarily, or perhaps presumptively, because a governor upon one ticket is elected that therefore the members of the Legislature running with the same party are in a majority also. It frequently happens otherwise. But has the President of the United States recognized Governor Kellogg? I say he has not. The Senator may think that is a pretty broad statement, but I make it advisedly. The President of the United States recognized, fifteen hundred miles off, the duty of everybody to obey the mandates of the judiciary, without knowing what they were. Then came what Mr. Lynch said was a revolution, and that revolution found when it came to the eyes of the President of the United States this man Kellogg in possession. Then the President of the United States, as he has stated to us in a message at this very session, thinking with the narrow means that he had for investigation that Kellogg had as good a right as anybody, thought he would take the man whom the courts had got into possession and hold him until Congress, to whom he had appealed again and again as the rightful power to settle the question, should act. Now, if the Senator from Indiana claims that that is a recognition of the Kellogg government or the Kellogg legislature such as can have any influence upon this subject under any circumstances, he is welcome to make the most of it.

Mr. MORTON. Did I understand the Senator to say a moment ago that the President had not recognized the Legislature?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I say what I said before, that the President did not recognize Kellogg; and now I will come to the Legislature. I say as to the Legislature that I do not understand that the President of the United States has recognized the Kellogg legislature. I am not forgetful of that celebrated dispatch which went from the Attorney-General's Office to the city of New Orleans, addressed to somebody, authorizing him to give all persons to understand that the President or somebody else recognized the body of men assembled at Mechanics' Hall—if that was the name of the place—as the lawful Legislature of Louisiana.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to read that "celebrated dispatch?"

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. MORTON. It does not leave any doubt on the subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very glad to have it read, for I may wish to have my friend read some things when he comes to make his speech.

Mr. MORTON. The dispatch is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 12, 1872.

Acting Governor PINCHBACK,
New Orleans, Louisiana:

Let it be understood that you are recognized by the President as the lawful executive of Louisiana, and that the body assembled at Mechanics' Institute is the lawful Legislature of the State, and it is suggested that you make proclamation to that effect, and also that all necessary assistance will be given to you and the Legislature herein recognized to protect the State from disorder and violence.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, Mr. President, and on what page is that?

Mr. MORTON. On page 59 of the report. I will send the document to the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I find it now. It is dated December 12, 1872. This was three days after the impeachment of Warmoth and one day after the President had been notified from New Orleans that the "democratic members of the Legislature were taking their seats," and that "most, if not all, of them will do so in the next few days."

Let it be understood—

Says Williams, the Attorney-General, to Pinchback—

that you are recognized by the President as the lawful executive of Louisiana, and that the body assembled at Mechanics' Institute is the lawful Legislature of the State, and it is suggested that you make proclamation to that effect, and also that all necessary assistance will be given to you and the Legislature herein recognized to protect the State from disorder and violence.

If the Senator were an enemy of the President of the United States—I mean a political enemy—and not his friend, and wished to make use of sticking in the letter at the expense of the substance, and were to endeavor to draw from that language of the Attorney-General the conclusion that the President of the United States had, in hot haste and without any opportunity to inquire into the circumstances or the title by which this one of two bodies of men claimed to have been elected, undertaken to set them up in advance of any inquiry and to hold to them, then he would make use of the argument which in his way of reading he seems to endeavor to make use of. But I do not construe this dispatch in the way that the Senator does. It will bear, literally speaking, the construction that the Senator puts upon it. I think perhaps he might say with some force that it makes on the face of it a prima facie case quite as strong it may be as these credentials are in favor of Mr. Pinchback; but if the Senator will do the President of the United States the justice to take all that he has said upon the subject, take all his dispatches, take the motive that led him to authorize the sending of the first ones, "stand by the Federal judiciary and the orderly administration of law;" take his immediate communication to this body of the circumstances that had attended his interference and that of his officers; take his constitutional demand upon this body that they should take order, as the rightful judges, of the subject, and relieve him from this temporary order of things which he had been obliged by force of circumstances to recognize, then he would come nearer in my opinion to defining the attitude of the President of the United States than he seems to do.

But, sir, I will not waste your valuable time in further discussing that question. I am bound to say as a Senator of this body that the attitude of the President of the United States as President upon this subject is absolutely immaterial to me. I know of no clause in the Constitution or in the laws that gives the President of the United States any right whatever—and I know, if I know him, that he would be the last man to claim it—to affect the judgment of this body upon a question which the Constitution has remitted to this body alone; and if the Constitution has remitted the decision of this question to this body alone, then it does not do to say that we can be foreclosed and coerced into coming to a particular conclusion by any action of the President of the United States or anybody else in respect of any of the limits which are necessary to a proper decision of the question by us. If we have a right under the Constitution to decide upon the election of this man, can the President furnish conclusive or any other evidence to us of his election by saying that he recognizes one Legislature or another Legislature? There is nothing, as I have said, in the Constitution of the United States, there is nothing in its laws, there is nothing in the spirit, as I understand it, of the frame of this Government, which gives any act that the President may have taken or can take any place whatever in this discussion. It is not a question of who has recognized that Legislature; it is not a question of how many laws it may have passed since; it is not a question of how much it may have been administered or recognized by its courts, for all that was done by the confederate legislatures for years and years, who held undisputed sway in the States that were in rebellion, and whose acts so far as they affected private rights must be upheld upon principles of universal jurisprudence and of humanity. And yet it would be a strange argument for the Senator to maintain that because those legislatures had existed, had defied their origin, had outgrown the infirmities in their existence, therefore a Senator whom they might elect should be received here! The question for us is, Were the body of men who on the 15th of January, 1873, elected this man the true Legislature of the State of Louisiana? For the Constitution says that only the true Legislature of the State of Louisiana shall elect a Senator, and the Constitution says that this body shall determine whether the man who claims to be a Senator has been elected. Therefore we cannot escape from facing the question and facing it upon our own responsibility and not under the shadow of any executive support, if there be any, as I know there is not. I know it of course just as everybody else does, from the course of this history. We must face the question, I say, and we must declare once for all whether the one hundred and ten men in that house of representatives, selected as they were by that board that had expired and that in addition to having expired had no one of the papers that the constitution and the laws of that State say are the only evidence upon which they shall act, are entitled to act for the State of Louisiana and to send a Senator here.

It has been said that the State of Louisiana is entitled to two Senators, and that it is a wrong to her that she does not have them. That is true, but it is two Senators that the State of Louisiana is entitled to, and unless this man be her Senator we commit a gross outrage upon her by giving him a place here as her representative, and it appears clear to me that he is not.

Mr. President, if there is any policy in this business, although I know of no policy but that which in looking to the past seeks for the truth, it seems to me that it is the policy of a strict adherence to the law. That is the guide which, in the heat of conflict and in the tempest of passion and in the tumult of politics, is the sole star that guides our ship of state to a safe haven. If you turn away from that and speak of party wishes or party sympathies or races or expediencies, you are lost in the sea of chaos and tumult that has ruined so many republics in the history of our times. I for one, sir, shall stand by the law. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, it had not been my intention to take any part in the debate upon the pending resolution for the admission of Mr. Pinchback as a Senator from the State of Louisiana, and it is not now my purpose to engage the attention of the Senate for any considerable length of time in the discussion of the questions involved in it; but differing as I do from my distinguished colleague, [Mr. MORTON,] by whom the resolution has been introduced and pressed with great ability and earnestness, I have thought it right to state the reasons which will control my vote upon it.

It has been repeatedly said during the progress of this discussion that the questions involved in the resolution are judicial in their character. This is undoubtedly true. We are sitting here to pass judicially upon the "election and qualifications" of one claiming a seat in this body, and the power to do so is by the Constitution of the United States as well as by parliamentary law vested in this body alone. No other tribunal or department of the Government has any jurisdiction in the premises, either original or appellant. Of the questions involved we are the sole and exclusive judges, not only of the ultimate questions of election and qualification, but of every other arising in the progress of the cause or necessary to the determination of those questions. If this is true, then no action or decision of any other department or branch of the Federal Government nor of the State can be held to be binding upon this body. This proposition has been so clearly stated and demonstrated in the able arguments of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FERRY] as to put it out of my power to add anything to it; and it at once disposes of the claimed authority of the executive recognition of the Kellogg government from which the claimant derives his right, as also of the binding force of the decision of the supreme court of the State of Louisiana so much relied on by my colleague.

Nor do I see that the rule of decision of the courts of the United States in administering the laws of a State according to the settled decisions of the highest court of judicature of such State has any bearing on the question. This rule is never applied except where the questions in the State courts are no longer to be regarded open; nor has it any application at all when it is manifest that the decision of the State court has been based upon a false statement of the facts and is always in the control of the Supreme Court of the United States so as to enable it to do substantial justice in the particular case under consideration. The sole purpose of it is to render the laws as well as the administration of them as near uniform as possible in the several courts sitting in the same State.

But even if the rule was as broad and sweeping as my colleague has claimed it to be it could not bind us, for that would put it in the power of the State court to settle for us one of the main questions involved in the election of a United States Senator, namely, the legal existence of the body by whom he was chosen. This case, as well as all others of like character, must be tried here as an original cause, in which any question which enters into it must be determined upon its merits.

The law of the case is plain enough, and is to be found in those clauses of the Federal Constitution in which the Legislatures of the several States are empowered to select qualified persons to represent the States in this body. The fact to be ascertained is, whether the body of men claiming to act as the Legislature of the State of Louisiana were in fact the Legislature of that State at the time they selected the claimant as Senator. If they were not, then it is manifest that no subsequent recognition of their legislative capacity by any other branch of government, State or national, could legalize their act so as to confer upon the claimant a right to be seated here.

The election held in Louisiana in 1872, at which it is claimed the Kellogg government, including the persons who acted in the General Assembly as its members, were elected has been fully investigated by the appropriate committee of the Senate of which my distinguished colleague is chairman, and the report, as well as the testimony upon which it is based, in an official form is before us. And it is not too much to say that if any valid election took place on that occasion, the men who composed the Assembly which acted in the selection of the claimant were not the men who received a majority of the votes polled. It is also clear that but for the usurpation of a Federal judge, sustained by the military power of the Federal Government, these men would never have been in position to perform any act having the semblance of legislative authority, much less to select a person to represent a people whom they did not represent. Yet my colleague claims that in deference to State rights the person so selected by them must be admitted here without question, and thus consummate the fraud upon the State of Louisiana which had its inception in the unlawful act of this Federal judge.

But the admission of the claimant is urged upon a much more indefensible ground, which is that, presenting as he does the usual evidences of title to the office, he has the right to claim his seat upon the prima facie case thus made; that his admission must precede investigation; and if upon investigation it shall be found that he is not entitled to hold his seat, then the Senate must get rid of him by expulsion. In this branch of the case much stress is laid upon what is claimed to be a prima facie right, and many precedents have been cited to support the argument based up it.

A prima facie case is but a presumption of law, and stands only in the absence of proof to the contrary. It is the presumption which the law raises in favor of the general rule, and vanishes before the actual facts of the case. A promissory note is prima facie evidence of debt, but when there is proof that the debt has been paid or that the note was given without any consideration the prima facie case falls, and the verdict must be made upon the whole testimony.

In many cases, and I think this ought to be of that class, the legal presumption is affected by lapse of time. It is now more than two years since the date of the commission upon which this claim is made. One Congress has passed away since it was first presented to the Senate, and it would seem to be rather late in the day to claim much potency for it. But in the mean time all the facts upon which it rests have been investigated and are before us in an official form, so that the resolution upon which we are about to act must be deemed our judgment upon the whole case as now presented, and if adopted in the form presented by my colleague must be final; for I do not suppose the Senate will admit the claimant upon his credentials and then expel him upon the report of the committee. In this belief I shall vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] and against the original resolution.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I was obstinately resolved not to inflict upon the Senate any further observations upon this much-worn topic, and I yield only to the solicitation of others, not to any disposition of my own, while I now ask the indulgence of the Senate a few moments longer.

I have listened to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] this afternoon, as I always listen to him, with pleasure; I have listened to him this afternoon, as I always listen to him, with profit, but with more than ordinary profit this afternoon. If I had any doubt of the correctness of the conclusions to which I came by dint of my own examination long since, the Senator from Vermont would have removed that doubt. He is an able and an acute lawyer. If a case could be made against the claim urged here on behalf of Louisiana, that Senator could make the case; but, in my judgment, he has utterly failed to present such a case.

It is always a delight to hear a republican make a democratic speech. I say it is delightful as a mere intellectual exercise. Whenever you are privileged to witness such a performance, you see a man who is able to turn his back on all his party prejudices to follow that which he thinks is right; and that is a noble exhibition of humanity, though his convictions may for the time mislead him when his prejudices would have led him aright. I say that is a delightful intellectual exercise to witness—not the most delightful I can think of. If I could have my choice, I think I should enjoy better hearing a democrat make a republican speech.

Mr. MORTON. You never heard that.

Mr. HOWE. That is an entertainment very rare I know. I would enjoy that better, simply because we should see then a man soaring above the prejudice of party to follow not merely what he thinks is right, but to follow what is right.

Mr. President, it is not my purpose to follow the course of the argument urged here so ably and ingeniously this afternoon. I cannot help, however, calling the attention of the Senate to one of the points upon which he was driven by my raiding friend from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] Putting behind him with a wave of his hand the judicial authority of a State to pass upon the authority of any other department of its government, the Senator from Illinois put to him a very pregnant question: But suppose there are two tribunals each claiming to be the Legislature and two governors each claiming to approve their acts, how shall the people know which is the true Legislature and which is the false? I was utterly astounded, I must confess, to hear so good a lawyer as the Senator from Vermont answer, "Ascertain by the exercise of their own private judgment; authority is at an end. If there be but one body claiming to be the Legislature, the courts take judicial notice whether it be the Legislature or not; but if there be two, the courts cannot take judicial notice which is the true Legislature, but every individual in the State must take judicial notice and follow the one or the other at his peril." That is stated to us this afternoon on the floor of the Senate; and is that law?

Why, sir, improving, or rather extending by a single suggestion, the interrogatory propounded by the Senator from Illinois, suppose these two rival Legislatures should undertake to confer the same identical right upon two different individuals in a State like Louisiana which has but one form of government, which has but one constitution, which has but one body of laws, which has but one judicial department; that is the predicament, but did have once, however it may be now, two tribunals which claimed to be Legislatures; suppose the two rival Legislatures had undertaken to confer the same identical right upon two different parties, would every citizen of Louisiana be remanded to his own conscience to determine which was the true Legislature and which individual should enjoy the grant? No; it cannot be so at all. Suppose it was a grant of land, one party I take it would get possession, no matter which. Is anything more certain in the wide world, is there anything more certain in that wider domain, the domain of the law, than that whoever was found in possession, the rival claimant might commence a suit against him in ejectment or any other proper form appealing to the one judicial power, and that the judgment of that court would be, if it was the court of highest resort in the State, absolutely conclusive of the right? It is but a few years since when I saw myself two rival claimants to the office of governor of the State to which I belong impleaded before the supreme court of that State, and that court was called upon to determine by a direct judgment which was the true and which was the false governor, and that court proceeded to give its judgment, and having given judgment, I am glad to say the people of Wisconsin universally acquiesced, and I am glad to believe that not one in that State could have resisted the execution of that judgment without having incurred all the penalties which are denounced upon treason against the government of a State. No, Mr. President, revolutions are not so handily legalized, and political broils cannot be clothed with the authority of prima facie right in the slipshod manner pointed out to us by the Senator from Vermont, and I am thoroughly satisfied that if the question had not been propounded to him quite unexpectedly, he would not have answered it as he did.

I have noticed for the few years during which this debate has been protracted, that it is quite the fashion of those who dispute upon one side to urge the idea that their opponents are guided by political considerations, moved by party interests, inspired by partisan ambition. I have not hitherto felt called upon to reply to that suggestion. I want to say now, in defense of our common humanity more than in my own defense, that if any man on this floor or within the sound of my voice supposes that I am capable of ignoring a fact or a principle, that I can shut my eyes to a single syllable of the law which governs the case, to a single fact in the testimony which underlies the case, for the purpose of subserving the interests of the republican party, he mistakes me and he mistakes my views of the interests of the republican party. Sir, I have, and I confess it, belonged to the republican party ever since we had an organization called republican, only for one reason. It was because I believed, fondly if you please, honestly I declare, that it was the one party which adhered more closely to the right and to the law than any other. I adhere to that party to-day, but only for the same reason to-day, because I believe it still adheres to the right and to the law more closely than any other party; and if I am not vehemently mistaken in myself, I shall follow the republican party but a very little way after that sad time when I shall have discovered that it had turned its back on the right, on the truth, and on the law. No, sir, I have not a word to say to-day in defense of the republican party. The few words I wish to say I shall urge in defense of Louisiana, that State which upon my solemn conviction I declare has been more brutally hacked and mangled since this controversy arose than any State of whose history I ever read. And believing thus, I was profoundly sorry, to say the least of it, when the distinguished Senator from Vermont felt called upon to draw his ax against her breast to-day.

Mr. President, I have been provoked two or three times since this struggle commenced to announce my conviction that at the election in 1872 William P. Kellogg had a majority of the votes deposited in the boxes at the several election precincts in that State. I have been made quite conscious from time to time that that was not the popular impression in this Chamber; perhaps it is not outside of the Chamber. It was my impression or I should not have stated it. Having stated it and finding so many who appear to dissent from it, perhaps a decent respect for the opinion of others calls upon me to say a word or two either in vindication of that opinion or in excuse for it.

I want to invoke to my aid here in the outset an authority introduced to the Senate the other day by the honorable Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] He undertook to instruct us that in the consideration of contested elections by legislative bodies, those bodies are not bound by strict legal evidence, and he cited from a former member of Congress this testimony.

Said Mr. Smith, of South Carolina:

> The House had been told that hearsay testimony was unworthy of attention; but he wished to remind them that they were not, like a court of law, restricted to proceed upon regular proof and not to go beyond the letter of it; they were entitled to hear and weigh everything advanced, and to form their opinion from the general conviction arising upon the whole circumstances."—Contested Elections, 1789–1834, page 80.

I may have occasion to recur to this authority again. I start with it. What was the result of the election so far as it bears upon the office of governor, as made known to the world by what is called the Forman board? That board, speaking for the democratic party, and by whose declarations that party has so far been willing to be bound, declared McEnery's vote to have been 65,579 and Kellogg's vote to have been 55,973. This was the board which held what the Senator from Vermont says it was indispensable to hold, the returns of the supervisors, what he calls the official returns. As they state the result gathered from those returns, McEnery's majority was but 9,606. There are two editions of the returns made by that same board, communicated to us in this same volume. The other return, found on pages 575 and 576, coming from the same board, remember, professing to give us the result of the same returns from the several parishes, states McEnery's vote to have been 66,403 and Kellogg's to have been 59,760. According to that edition of the Forman return McEnery's majority was but 6,643. Now I am going to lay this last statement aside. I am going to take the largest story the Forman board dared to tell, and I mean to contradict that. I have called the attention of the Senate more than once to the fact that in that biggest calculation there were six whole parishes which held elections in which the people voted but from which no single vote was counted by that board at that time—six whole parishes. Remember we are considering the question which of the two men had a majority of the votes cast by the people on that day for governor. In determining that you certainly must ascertain as well as you can how many votes were given to these different candidates in those six parishes. The Forman board does not tell you anything about it. You must go elsewhere for information upon that point. I am driven to the returns of the Lynch board, so called. Well, I cannot help blushing, in view of all that has been said of the conduct of the Lynch board, when I refer to it for anything; but, after all, what is the objection to the testimony of the Lynch board? They say it had not the official returns before it. No, they had not; they could not get them, and nobody did have the true returns. What else is said? Why, that they gathered their information from all sorts of sources, from the newspapers even, and made a return of the result of the election based upon such testimony. So they did; and I think it a little extraordinary that I should be caught here defending the testimony of newspapers. Nevertheless the newspapers, you know, sir, do convey intelligence, and especially political intelligence, not only with remarkable celerity but with very great accuracy. The very morning succeeding the election of November 4, 1872, while I was at my breakfast, a dispatch was brought to me announcing the result of the election held the day before in the State of Pennsylvania. That is a large State; and yet from the election of the day before in that State the results were obtained, not accurately, but so near accurately that a dispatch announced to me, twelve hundred miles distant, very nearly the result.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to refer him to an instance in regard to this question of having the returns?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I read from the testimony of the present governor of Arkansas in regard to the organization of the Legislature which convened the recent convention for framing a new constitution and which has been held to be the established government of Arkansas. That Legislature was organized upon a list made out by the secretary of state, and I give the testimony in regard to it. Mr. Garland, the present governor, was the deputy secretary of state; and this is his testimony:

> Question. Had you the returns from the election officers?
> Answer. No, sir. I had no records at all in reference to the election of these men. In regard to your first question, I supposed you meant the general records of the office. I had some records of the office, but nothing in regard to the election of these men. I had nothing at all from the office referring to it.
> By Mr. HOWARD:
> Q. State how, as deputy secretary of state, you did make that list.
> A. I made it from the old roll and from the proclamation of Governor Baxter, calling the special elections, and from the returns as published by the newspapers, the Little Rock Gazette and Little Rock Republican. The list was not made from papers on file in the office, but from papers in my possession as deputy secretary of state. Those papers gave me the information on the subject. All of those members who came to take their seats were sworn in. The records were then in the State-house, which was in possession of Brooks's forces.

Here the Legislature was organized on a list made out at a hotel from the newspapers, and the action of that Legislature has been held to be valid and the constitutional convention it called into existence has been held to be valid and the constitution formed by it to be the constitution of Arkansas to-day. I simply refer to it to show how history repeats itself. That is indorsed on one side, but the other is not, as my friend from Illinois [Mr. OGLESBY] suggests.

Mr. HOWE. Sustained by the authority just read by the Senator from Indiana, I dismiss the blush with which I before introduced the Lynch board, and I say with a good deal of confidence that I may in the absence of all better proof recur to the evidence submitted by that board. That board ascertained that in those six parishes which the other board did not find a vote from or count a vote from there was a majority given for Kellogg of 3,327 votes. There is one correction to be made. That number must be deducted from the aggregate majority of 9,606 found for McEnery. I am counting against the largest majority claimed.

There is another correction to be made. The returns from four parishes, Mr. Ray testified before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, were forged; not true returns but forged returns. How much will you deduct for that inaccuracy? What were the true returns from those four parishes? They were the parishes of East Baton Rouge, Grant, Madison, and Point Coupee. I again recur to such aid as I can get from the evidence submitted by the Lynch board; and that board found a majority of 3,669 in those four parishes for Kellogg. Thus correcting the vote in the ten parishes, you find a majority for Kellogg of 6,996 not recognized in the return of the Forman board. If you deduct that from 9,603, the largest majority which that board dared to claim for McEnery, you have but 2,610 left. Deduct the same corrections from the smallest number claimed by the Forman board, to wit, 6,643, and you will find that majority wiped out entirely and a majority for Kellogg. Deducting it from the larger number, you have a majority of 2,610 left for McEnery. But were those votes thrown? The Committee on Privileges and Elections did not attempt to go back to the election precincts to see what was actually done there; but there was laid before that committee and is found in their report an abstract of some testimony sent to the President of the United States, and I gather some very instructive facts from that abstract of testimony. For instance, that testimony shows, as you will find on page 506, that in one precinct of the parish of Caddo, by virtue of that process known as stuffing the ballot-box, there was a change made of 310 votes against the republican candidate. In Point Coupee, by the like process, there was a change made of 440 in one precinct, of 230 in another precinct, of 215 in another precinct. In the parish of Jefferson there was a change made of 500 in one precinct; in the parish of La Fourche a change made of 150; in Webster a like change of 230. It also appears from the same testimony that that process of stuffing the ballot-boxes was resorted to in the parishes of Rapides, Saint Mary, Saint Helena, and in one of the wards of the city of New Orleans. The witnesses did not state the number of votes which were changed in those parishes; but, adding up those different numbers which I have read, you have a majority of 2,085 for the republican candidates to be deducted from 2,610. If a change of 600 was made in the parishes of Rapides, Saint Helena, Jackson, and Orleans, there goes the whole majority claimed in the largest calculation submitted by the Forman board, and more than 3,000 more than the smallest majority claimed by that board. So since I am authorized by the authority furnished me by the Senator from Maryland "to weigh everything advanced and to offer an opinion from the general conviction arising upon the whole circumstances," I think I was not at all wild in expressing the opinion here the other day that Kellogg and not McEnery had a majority of the votes actually put into the boxes on the 4th of November, 1872.

But, Mr. President, I submit to the Senate that this is an immaterial inquiry, an inquiry quite immaterial to the case before us. The election of governor in Louisiana did not depend upon the number of votes actually put into the boxes. That is one of the elements which go to make up an election, one of the factors which determine it, not all the elements by any manner of means.

The Congress of the United States has placed upon your statute-book this command, that if any man qualified to vote at an election shall offer to vote and shall be denied the right to vote by reason of race or color, that vote shall be counted in determining the right of the person for whom it is offered. If in addition to the republican votes deposited in the boxes on the 4th of November there was a constituency, large or small, denied the right to vote because of race or color, you, if you have the power to supervise the results of that election, must ascertain how many of those votes there were and you must count them all. Were there any such votes? The other day I called the attention of the Senate to the fact that although it was extremely difficult for a citizen of Louisiana to secure registration prior to that election, yet there were forty thousand who did by dint of the most persistent efforts secure registration—more than the whole number of republican votes returned in the State. I can open this volume and read to you affidavit after affidavit sent up from different parishes in that State showing what exertions were made by these voters at different precincts to get their votes accepted and how unavailing those efforts were. I am not going into that. I fall back upon the authority offered to me by the Senator from Maryland. I call upon you to take into consideration all the circumstances surrounding this case and then to say, if you dare say, that there were forty thousand colored men who subjected themselves to the toil and the effort necessary to get their names upon the registration-books and then were so careless about the right that they never offered their votes at the polls. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. OGLESBY] reminds me of what every Senator must know, that if they were free to vote the effort to vote was all accomplished when they had got their names on the registration-book.

Mr. President, I conclude that out of those forty thousand stifled voters there were a great many thousands who went to the polls seeking to vote, and if they did not vote it was because they were denied the right to vote. More than four thousand of those citizens made solemn oath, in the case of Kellogg vs. Warmoth and others, that they did so try to vote and were denied that right. But, after all, why do we waste any time upon this question whether Kellogg or McEnery had a majority of the votes at that election? Before I attempt to answer that question I want to call your attention to one other consideration. I have been insisting that Kellogg had a majority of the votes. If he did not have a majority of the votes, I ask the Senate why in the name of all that is wonderful were such extraordinary means resorted to to cover up the actual state of the voting at the precincts? If the returns from all the parishes showed a majority of votes for McEnery, why did not the McEnery board produce to the world all those returns? If the true returns showed that majority, that was all they wanted; and if that was shown by the true returns, why in the name of all that is wonderful did they resort to forged returns from four different parishes? Men do not resort to knavery for the fun of the thing, I take it; not even the Warmoth party in the State of Louisiana does that. I have no sort of doubt that they would just as lief be honest if honesty led to the same advantages. Why did they resort to these extraordinary expedients, forging returns and suppressing returns? Let me give you an idea of what those expedients were. Madison Parish, I reminded you, is one of those parishes the returns from which were said to have been forged. Here is an affidavit introduced to show that forgery:

STATE OF LOUISIANA, Parish of Orleans, City of New Orleans:

Personally came and appeared before me, Robert H. Shannon, United States commissioner in and for the district of Louisiana, John P. Montamat, of the city and State aforesaid, who, being duly sworn, doth depose and say that during the month of November, 1872, and for four years before, he was a justice of the peace for this parish of Orleans; that in the month aforesaid, after the election held in this parish for governor and other State and parochial officers, "what date I cannot recollect, but it was while they were counting the votes at the State-house, at the Mechanics' Institute, situated on Dryades street," one Jack Wharton, also of this city and parish aforesaid, came to my office, situated No. 33 Exchange alley, near Custom-house street, in this city and parish aforesaid, and requested that I should go with him in a certain place in this city of New Orleans, in order to administer the oath to one of the supervisors of election in and for the parish of Madison. At said request I went with Jack Wharton, who took me in a house situated on Gravier street, somewhere near Barronne street; the entry-doors were closed, and at the signal given by Jack Wharton, (three consecutive and hard raps,) the doors were opened. In the said room I saw one Cahoon, whose first name I do not know, but whom I had seen before in this city; he, the said Cahoon, then and there informed me that he was the supervisor of election for the parish of Madison, appointed by Henry C. Warmoth, then governor of Louisiana, and that he wished me to swear him as to the returns of the late election. I saw there several persons whom I did not know; they were making up tally-lists of the returns of the election for the parish of Madison. The lists were signed in blank by the commissioners of election. I inquired from Cahoon, the supervisor, how it was that he had not prepared the lists and the returns in the parish where he came from. He told me that he could not count the votes there; it was a republican parish, and that he had to run away because he wanted to count the votes, and admit no one except a few, and he would have it his own way, and would here in New Orleans return such persons as he thought proper. I swore him to several tally-lists and returns. I believe, to the best of my knowledge, that the greater part of the tally-lists were yet in blank when I swore him.

JOHN P. MONTAMAT.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 3d day of February, 1873.

[L. S.] R. H. SHANNON,
United States Commissioner, District of Louisiana.

Now, Mr. President, this board of returns, by which title you designate Mr. Wharton and Mr. Warmoth and their associates, knew perfectly well what the result was in the different parishes at this time for governor; the newspapers had informed them. Through a thousand avenues, or a hundred at least, that information had come to them. If McEnery had a majority of 9,000 votes or 5,000 votes they knew the fact. Why did they not tell Cahoon "Bring out your true returns; we do not want any forgeries; the truth is good enough for us?" But this was a plain forgery; very simple, very vulgar.

There were other frauds resorted to which were almost sublime in the amount of invention they required. I am going to weary the Senate with a reference to one of them. Iberville is one of the parishes which were not counted in the return I have been considering. I want to show how this Forman board got rid of the vote of Iberville. Iberville was a strong republican parish. The Lynch board claimed that there were 2,239 votes given for Kellogg in that parish and but 691 for McEnery. There was a very large colored population in the parish, 8,675, to 3,603 white. The election was held at the different precincts in that parish. When the voting was concluded at six o'clock on that day, the boxes were taken from the several precincts to the parish supervisor to be counted. Some colored men, apprehending that the republicans were to be cheated in the count, presumed to follow from some of the precincts the boxes to the county seat. There are thirty-five pages occupied with letters and affidavits to excuse the throwing out of the returns from that parish, to excuse the refusal to count the vote of that parish. Not an act of violence was offered to any human being. It is said that the colored men demanded that the votes should be counted. They waited outside the court-house all night and all the next day, and then the commissioners of election from the different precincts sat down and gravely drew up certificates of which this is a sample:

PLAQUEMINE, IBERVILLE, LOUISIANA,
November 5, 1872.

SIR: We, the undersigned, commissioners of election of poll No. 2, of the first ward, parish of Iberville, Louisiana, do hereby positively decline to be present at the counting of the votes in said box, on account of threats of violence, and as we fear an armed interference.

W. A. SMITH,
L. V. FELTUS,
GUY JOS. HEBERT,
Commissioners of Election of the First Ward of Iberville, Louisiana.

J. L. THARP,
Registrar of the Parish of Iberville, Louisiana.

A similar certificate was drawn up with great formality and signed by the commissioners of poll 2, and so of poll 3, and so of poll 5, and so of poll 7, and so of poll 8, all addressed to the supervisor of the parish. Recollect, sir, nobody was assaulted; nobody was threatened. Only one demand was made, and that demand was that the votes should be counted; and when that demand had been pressed for twenty-four hours, long enough to have counted the vote half a dozen times, these gentlemen certified that they were afraid to count the vote, and so they walked off; and yet that declaration that they were afraid to count the vote was a naked falsehood. I say that because they did count the vote and they took that count to New Orleans. I have shown you that there were two editions of the return of the Forman board, that they differed in their results something more than 3,000 votes. In the second edition you have the return from Iberville included, and they not only show that they had the vote of that parish, but they have it differing only by a very few votes from the return made by the Lynch board. Mr. President, I ask again, if McEnery had actually a majority of the votes cast in the different precincts, why did they not count and return in the regular way Iberville Parish? Why resort to all that effort, to all that perjury, to all that knavery for the purpose of excluding the vote of that one parish?

But I was about to say that the question whether Kellogg was or was not elected has but very little to do with the inquiry before the Senate. The question before us is, was Pinchback elected to the Senate of the United States? not whether Kellogg was elected governor of the State of Louisiana. The governor of Louisiana does not elect Senators. Senators are elected only by the Legislature of a State. Was Pinchback elected by the Legislature of Louisiana? If so, no matter whether Kellogg had a vote or not, Pinchback ought to have his seat in the Senate of the United States. True, if we are considering the mere prima facie question, if we are considering just how much credit we shall give to the certificate of Mr. Kellogg, then it is very well for us to know whether Mr. Kellogg was governor or not. If he was not governor either de jure or de facto, then we can give no credit to his certificate. But I have got away beyond the prima facie case. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] assumed the other day, in that very candid and judicial opinion which he read here, that this whole government stood upon a mere prima facie title.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I beg pardon; I did not assume that that was the only case. I referred to the report to show that there was no de jure government.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator's language was——

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I referred to what was disclosed by the report.

Mr. HOWE. I thought I had the Senator's language marked. He is undoubtedly correct in his own report of his own speech. I was only about to say that I have dismissed the prima facie case long ago—got away beyond that. If Kellogg was not governor in fact, and if Kellogg never had a vote given in his favor in Louisiana in 1872, still I say the question remains, Was there a Legislature in Louisiana in 1873, and did the Legislature of that State select Mr. Pinchback for a Senator of the United States? Certainly there was a tribunal which claimed to be the Legislature. What do you understand by the Legislature of a State? Ordinarily we understand it to be that tribunal which makes laws for a State. There is one thing that we cannot help knowing, if we try to shut our eyes to it ever so much. There were, I know, two bodies at one time, two tribunals in that State, each of which claimed to be the Legislature. This we know, that there was but one body which made laws for Louisiana. I am not advised that the mock tribunal ever went through the forms of enacting a bill into a law; but if it did, so far as I am allowed to take judicial or senatorial notice of the political condition of that State, not one of those enactments, if there was one, has ever received the slightest credit or had the slightest influence upon Louisiana affairs. There was one body, however, which made laws for Louisiana, and laws which Louisiana has obeyed, right or wrong; and that tribunal which made laws for Louisiana is the very tribunal which selected Mr. Pinchback for a Senator of the United States. But the fact that it made laws shows perhaps no more than that it was a de facto Legislature, if there can be such a thing as a de facto Legislature. Was it anything more than de facto? Unless I am vehemently mistaken, it was a Legislature which holds by all the title which any Congress of the United States ever held or the Legislature of any State in the Union ever held.

What composes the Legislature of Louisiana? Two houses, as you know, one called the senate and one called the house of representatives. Who elects them? The constituencies in the several senatorial and representative districts of the State. Who determines primarily who has been elected from a representative or a senatorial district? The law of Louisiana answers you—the board of returns of that State. It has been read very often. I think I had better read it once more. The authority is so clear, the language of the statute is so plain and so imperative:

Within ten days after closing of the election said returning officers shall meet in New Orleans to canvass and compile the statements of votes made by the supervisors of registration, and make returns of the election to the secretary of state.

That is what the board of returns is to do: "make returns of the election to the secretary of state." But that is a command which has relation to all the officers of the State—the governor, the lieutenant-governor, the administrative officers, the legislative officers, the judicial officers, the parish officers. What about the returns of the board touching the members of the senate and house of representatives of the Legislature? Out of these returns made to the secretary of state by the board of returns, the fifty-sixth section says:

That it shall be the duty of the secretary of state to transmit to the clerk of the house of representatives and the secretary of the senate of the last General Assembly a list of the names of such persons as, according to the returns, shall have been elected to either branch of the General Assembly; and it shall be the duty of said clerk and secretary to place the names of the representatives and senators elect, so furnished, upon the roll of the house and of the senate, respectively; and those representatives and senators whose names are so placed by the clerk and secretary, respectively, in accordance with the foregoing provisions, and none other, shall be competent to organize the house of representatives or senate.

There is the supreme law of Louisiana declaring as explicitly as language can be found in the dictionary, that the names of the persons transmitted to the secretary of state by the board of returns as having been elected representatives and senators shall be entered on the roll of members by the secretary of the senate and the clerk of the house, and that those individuals and none other than those individuals shall organize the house of representatives and the senate.

Mr. President, you know that every representative and every senator who took part in the election of Mr. Pinchback to the Senate of the United States was one whose name had been placed upon the roll of the senate or of the house by the secretary or the clerk in accordance with the list communicated to him by the secretary of state, and that that list was drawn from the certificate submitted to him by somebody claiming to be the board of returns for Louisiana. That statement, although I meant it to be accurate, is not quite so. I should have said that every one of those names was transmitted to the secretary of the senate or clerk of the house by one claiming to be the secretary of state, and that he received their names, every one of them, in a certificate issued to him by a tribunal claiming to be the board of returns for Louisiana. That leaves us, if I do not misunderstand the situation, but two questions to settle: Was that man, Bovee, who transmitted the names of those senators and representatives to the secretary of the senate and clerk of the house, in truth or in law the secretary of state for Louisiana? and if he was, Was that tribunal which communicated those names to him, in truth and in law, the board of returns for Louisiana? There were two men each of whom claimed to be secretary of state. There were, as you know, two boards each of which claimed to be the board of returns. How shall their rival pretensions be settled? I said on a former occasion that those pretensions were settled by the adjudication of the supreme court of Louisiana. I thought so. In a suit at law both those questions were submitted to the determination of that court, and that court did give judgment that Bovee was secretary of state and did give judgment that the Lynch board was the true board of returns. That judgment is final upon those questions or it is not.

It has been said on this floor more than once, and was said with great force by the Senator from Vermont this afternoon, that the supreme court of Louisiana cannot determine who is or who is not a Senator of the United States. I do not think a more manifest truism than that could well be stated. The supreme court of Louisiana has never attempted to determine any such thing. The supreme court of Louisiana did undertake to say who under her own laws was entitled to the office of secretary of state and who under her own laws was entitled to discharge the duties and functions of a board of returns. One thing is dead sure, we cannot reverse that judgment. We can disregard it, I know. There is no law on any statute-book that we cannot disregard, both as a Senate and as Senators, sometimes without penalty and sometimes with penalty. We cannot reverse that judgment. There it is of record. We may follow it or stamp upon it. It is the law in Louisiana. There is no amount of railing against the character of that court, there is no amount of vituperation that can be heaped upon the logic of their reasoning, which can shake the authority of those judgments in that State. Still we may be utterly deaf, if we choose, to the voice of that court; utterly blind to what they have declared. We may be utterly regardless of all law when we come to determine the question who is a Senator of the United States. We may say in spite of Louisiana that Pinchback is not Senator; we may say that McMillen is; we may pick up any vagabond we find on the street and plant him here. Our judgment is final upon that question. The man we seat here and keep here is a Senator. The only difference is that if we pick up the straggler out of the streets and put him here we shame the law, we outrage right and duty. You drive Pinchback from your doors and you outrage the law of Louisiana not one whit less in my judgment; you are absolutely regardless of the most explicit terms of her Legislature and you are absolutely regardless of the solemn judgment of her highest court.

Sir, I claimed in the outset that I spoke in defense of Louisiana's authority this afternoon. Here I present you the authority of Louisiana. Try it yourself; you cannot couch the same authority in more explicit terms in the very laws she has enacted. Well, sir, so far we have come on our way. The election of every representative and of every senator who took part in the election of Mr. Pinchback was certified by that board declared by Louisiana's supreme authority to be the true board of returns. There is her law, declaring to you that those individuals and only those shall take part in the organization of the house and the senate. Those men did organize the house and the senate, taking their seats by virtue of these certificates granted them by the board of returns. Suppose they were not elected, one single soul of them, suppose not one single soul of the whole number ever received a vote at a single election precinct. I know what an immense crime it was for the board of returns to give that certificate to them in that case, but they did it and the law gives but one effect to the certificates. It is prima facie. Once received, it may be as false as language can be, it has but one effect—it is prima facie. There is but one tribunal in the world that can correct it. That is the body composed of just these very men. Every man of them may be manufactured, but the law says the certificate is prima facie; he shall organize and only he who holds the certificate shall organize. It is monstrous, says the Senator from Vermont, that this should be so. Why? Why, then he says you may ignore elections altogether; you need not refer to the people at all; let the board of returns just say that A is elected and B is not, C is elected and D is not; and A and C take their seats, or take their offices. Yes, prima facie they do. No, says the Senator from Vermont, only when the board of returns issue the certificate in accordance with the returns sent up by the supervisor of the parish. He is wrong, Mr. President, if a lawyer ever was wrong. That is not the construction of the Louisiana law. If it were, it would not lessen the difficulties one whit against which the Senator from Vermont contends. I know if you give this prima facie validity to the certificate of the board of returns, they may put pretenders into the house or senate; they may trample upon the returns of the parish supervisor, and manufacture a certificate on behalf of a man who did not have a vote. Are you any safer when you give the same authority to the supervisor? How do you get rid of the difficulty? How does the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will excuse me for interrupting him. Suppose the board of returns had filled the house of representatives with pretenders, and before their right to seats had been settled by the house itself, these pretenders had attempted to elect a United States Senator, and it was made known to this body that he was elected by these pretenders, what then would be the power of the Senate over the validity of such an election? I should like to hear the Senator upon that point.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I beg to assure my friend that that precise case is not pending before us. It would be a great scandal if a board of returns should put into the fire the returns from the several parishes and then make out certificates to a hundred representatives not one of whom were voted for, and it would be a great scandal if that house of representatives so constituted should, in conjunction with a senate made up equally fictitious, send a Senator here, and, if they did it, "what then," is the question of the Senator from Massachusetts. I do not know exactly what then; but I will tell my friend what I think I should do. I should say that if that case had been shown to us, "yes, this board of returns have in the exercise of that extreme power which, inasmuch as it must be delegated to somebody, was delegated to them, turned their backs on every principle, they have done not only what was false, but what they knew to be false, and they have made a fictitious body which the law of their State declares to be prima facie the house of representatives, and that body not representing, and without the slighest pretense of representing the people of Louisiana, have sent us a man for a Senator." Now I should, I guess, look over the shoulder of the Senator from Massachusetts and read our own Constitution and see how absolutely we are the judges of the election of our own members, and I should say that, being loyal to what I know to be the will of the people of Louisiana and exercising the absolute authority which the Constitution vests in us, as a Senator I will not let this man take his seat.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to ask the Senator if the precedents of the Senate will bear him out in that and if the Senate has heretofore had occasion to pass upon that question?

Mr. HOWE. I wish the Senator had not asked that question for two reasons. First, I do not know——

Mr. DAWES. I will state what was in my mind——

Mr. HOWE. I have no doubt the Senator had a good many reasons. I regret his having asked that question, because I do not know what the precedents of the Senate are. I take it for granted that upon this one case now suggested by the Senator there is no precedent, because no such case has ever happened in our history. How soon it may happen hereafter I do not know; I hope it will be very long after I shall have departed from the body. Another reason is that I do not believe there is any rule of adjudication, any possible or conceivable rule of adjudication upon like questions which the unbroken precedents of the Senate will sustain.

Mr. MORTON. If it meets the approbation of the Senator from Wisconsin, I will move a recess until half past seven o'clock.

Mr. HOWE. I will conclude in a very short time. Do you move to take a recess now?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWE. I would rather conclude.

Mr. LOGAN. Let us take a recess at the conclusion of the Senator's speech.

Mr. MORTON. I move then, that, after the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Wisconsin, the Senate take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLAYTON in the chair.) The Senator from Indiana moves that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin the Senate take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President——

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. With the consent of the Senator from Wisconsin, I move, as the Senate is going to take a recess, that before we do so we go into executive session for a short period to receive some nominations from the President.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to that motion?

Mr. HOWE. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until half past seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The unfinished business is the resolution for the admission of P. B. S. Pinchback as Senator from Louisiana, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to insert the word "not" before the word "admitted," on which the Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, when the Senate took its recess I was endeavoring to argue that there was provided by the laws of Louisiana a tribunal which could give prima facie title to an office—title not absolutely good, only conditionally good, good for the time being, good until some superior tribunal had investigated and passed finally upon the right. I was insisting that that tribunal in Louisiana was the one known as the board of returns, and I stood upon the very text of the Louisiana law in maintaining that position. When that board of returns says a man has been elected to office, prima facie that declaration confers the office upon the individual. To this theory the Senator from Vermont starts two objections. He says, first, that the certificate of the board of returns does not confer prima facie right unless that certificate conforms to the returns from the parishes, to the certificates of the supervisors. Secondly, he says that the returns of the Lynch board, so called, did not give prima facie right to office, because that was not the true returning board of Louisiana.

As to his first objection, one word. It is almost an absolute necessity that there should be in every State some tribunal to pass upon this prima facie title, to sum up in some way, good or bad, the results of an election for a parish or county officer, for a State officer, or for a legislative officer and confer upon some individual the right to act for the time being. Such a tribunal I think is found in the laws of nearly all if not all of our States and is almost indispensable. Without it there is endless confusion. Take the very case of a Legislature. We know perfectly well that the house of representatives in Louisiana, as in other States, is the ultimate tribunal which determines the right of its members. So of the senate. But who shall determine the right of a man to enter into the house or enter into the senate, take part in its organization and thus become a part of the body which exercises this ultimate jurisdiction? The law of Louisiana says it is the board of returns. But the Senator from Vermont says their certificate confers this prima facie title only in case it conforms to the certificate of the parish supervisor. The law is not so; the text of the law is not so. I will not read it again. But if it were as the Senator says not one of the difficulties against which he inveighs would be removed. He objects to the construction of the Louisiana statute for which I contend because he says then the board of returns might certify that a man was elected when he never had a vote, and if they could certify to one such man, they could certify to a majority of such men. Clearly that could be done. How is this difficulty avoided? If you say that the board of returns shall conform their certificate to the very text of the certificate sent up by the parish supervisor, then the parish supervisor becomes that tribunal instead of the board of returns, and then the board of returns is a mere ministerial officer, so to speak, a mere secretary to take the letters. Remember the parish supervisors do not send up a ballot, do not send up a tally-list, do not send up a registry-book; they send up a letter to the governor of the State, and in that letter they say, each supervisor speaking for his own parish, that in that parish so many votes were given for this man for governor and so many for that man, so many for this man for judge and so many for the other man, so many for this man for representative and so many for the other, and if it be true that the law requires the board of returns just to copy that letter in order to make their certificate prima facie, if their certificate is prima facie evidence when it does conform and is not prima facie when it does not conform to that letter sent, then you have planted the difficulty just one step back. Then the supervisor may do just those iniquities which the Senator says the board of returns may do. He may say—and in parish after parish in the State of Louisiana in the year of our Lord 1872 the parish supervisor did say—that a man was elected who was not elected. Besides, as we have seen, in several parishes they refused to say anything. We avoid no difficulties by adopting that interpretation. We increase the difficulties by one inasmuch as we override the very letter of the Louisiana statute.

The Senator objects, secondly, that the Lynch board of returns which undertook to give this prima facie title to the members of the house and the senate which elected Mr. Pinchback was not the true board of returns. I am not going to spend the time of the Senate in the argument of that question. There the Senator from Vermont goes face to face in conflict with the authority of the supreme court of the State of Louisiana. Every Senator on this floor may follow the Senator from Vermont if he chooses or may follow the decision of the supreme court if he thinks it his duty. I think it my duty to follow the decision of that court. I think it fair to assume that that court understands its own laws as well as we can understand them. I follow the decision of that court in this case with all the more alacrity because I think in giving judgment the court conformed to the most peremptory requirements of the constitution and the laws of the State.

The Senator from Vermont undertook to argue this afternoon that that Lynch board was abrogated by a little trick of state performed by the governor of that State on the 20th of November, 1872. On that day, there being no Legislature in existence in Louisiana, no possibility of convening one until the result of the previous election had been ascertained, the governor pulled from a pigeon-hole an old bill which received the assent of both houses during the winter before and he put his signature to it. That is claimed to have abrogated the law under which the election of 1872 was held. That raises a very grave constitutional question which I shall not stop to argue. I was glad to see that though the Senator from Vermont by the stress of the occasion was obliged to seek some sort of support from that act of Warmoth's he claimed that support with a great deal of hesitation and diffidence. He urged merely that it was said that the governor had the constitutional power to so change the laws of his State. I will not affirm that he has not heard it so said. It is a most extraordinary power, so easy to abuse, that I should come to the conclusion it was vested in the governor only by the most peremptory considerations. It never could be abused more scandalously than it was abused on that occasion. But conceding for the sake of this argument that on the 20th of November Governor Warmoth by his own individual act, by writing his name at the end of an old bill did change the election laws of the State, I stand here to deny that by changing that law he abrogated the board of returns which existed under that law. The constitution speaks in such a case as that. When he wrote his name to that bill Lynch and his associates were the board of returns. The Senator from Vermont does not deny that. Nobody can well deny that. Well, the constitution of Louisiana says in express terms that being the board of returns it shall continue to be the board of returns until their successors are inducted into office.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. If I understand the Senator he says that on the 20th day of November, 1872, Lynch and his associates were the lawful returning board and that nobody denies that fact. Am I right?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir, not entirely right. I said that the Senator from Vermont did not deny that and nobody could well deny it.

Mr. THURMAN. The majority, every member of our Committee on Privileges and Elections who expressed an opinion upon it at all, and that makes all of them but one, do deny that on that day Lynch and his associates were the returning board and conclusively show that they were not.

Mr. HOWE. I will not take issue with the first part of the statement of the Senator from Ohio. I have not studied the various reports of that committee as diligently as he unquestionably has. I will not undertake to say that they do not all or nearly all deny that up to the 20th of November Lynch and his associates were the board of returns; but when the Senator goes further and says that they "conclusively show" that they were not the board of returns, I take issue with him very broadly. They neither show that nor can it be shown in my judgment. Before Governor Warmoth ventured upon that trick the eighth district court had declared, sitting in judgment upon that very question, that Lynch and his associates were the true board. That decision was not final, for an appeal might have been taken to the supreme court, but Governor Warmoth evidently thought that an appeal would not secure a reversal or he never would have ventured upon the very extraordinary maneuver he did. An appeal was taken, but instead of securing a reversal it secured the affirmance of that judgment.

On that day, therefore, I still say this Lynch board was the true board of returns for Louisiana; and the constitution of that State says, being so, they shall continue to discharge the duties of their office until their successors are inducted into office. The new statute which Warmoth signed on that day declared that the board of returns should be elected by the senate of the State. There was no senate of the State in being. There could be no senate until the board of returns had canvassed the certificates of the supervisors and ascertained who the senators were.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Shall I disturb the Senator if I ask him a question?

Mr. HOWE. Very likely, but I shall submit to the disturbance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly then I shall not disturb him.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator knows perfectly well that he cannot ask a question without running great risk of disturbing whoever it is put to; but I submit to the question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the Senator from Wisconsin would point out to us the clause of the constitution of Louisiana upon which he relies, and having done that (I think I understand the clause or rather know where it is) if he would answer this question: Supposing the Legislature of Louisiana at its session, and without having a pocket law made by the governor in vacation, had abolished all these prior election laws and all prior boards without substituting any in their places, would the old officers have continued in office until they chose to consider that their mission had been finished?

Mr. HOWE. I can only be just as wise as the law:

> All officers shall continue to discharge the duty of their offices until their successors are inducted into office.

The office of a board of returns was preserved in spite of the repeal.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, but that is not the point. I ask the Senator, suppose this office had been absolutely abolished, it being one created by law, whether under the language of the constitution these gentlemen, whoever they were, would have continued until their successors were inducted into office, which would have been forever, as no successors were provided for?

Mr. HOWE. I rather think that I shall be obliged, upon a careful consideration of that question, to confess that the Lynch board could not have continued in the office of a board of returns any longer than the office of a board of returns existed; and if the office of a board of returns was abrogated, I guess Lynch and his compatriots would go. But that did not happen to be the case on the 20th of November. The office was preserved and the constitution lived, after a fashion, and still spoke, and said this board of returns "shall continue to discharge the duties of their office until their successors are inducted into office."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Was it the same office?

Mr. HOWE. I think it was the same office—the same office fulfilling the same function in the State, known by the same name, created by the same fundamental authority, to wit, the Legislature of the State, provided that Warmoth was the Legislature on that day, and if he was not then his act was a mere nullity.

So, Mr. President, I do not feel at liberty to fly in the face of the authority of that board. I cannot understand that it is exposed to the very severe measure of criticism which has been measured out to it not only to-day but on former days during this protracted debate.

Mr. President, I will bring these remarks to a close. I professed in the outset that I was not to speak this afternoon in the interest of a political party, that the party to which I belonged has no interest involved in this debate nor hanging upon the issue. Unless I am grievously mistaken I have been speaking in defense of the rights of Louisiana. Other gentlemen take a different view of those rights, other gentlemen come to conclusions quite variant from mine. I know this, that when I say that the roll made up of the members of the senate and of the house of representatives by the secretary and the clerk of those bodies contained the very names transmitted to them by the secretary of state, and that those men only could participate rightfully in the organization of those bodies, I but repeat the very terms of the law of that State. When I say that the man who acted as secretary of state and transmitted that list to the recording officers of the two houses was the secretary of state, I stand upon the authority of an express judgment of the judiciary of the State. When I say those names were certified to the secretary by the true board of returns, there again I am sustained by the authority of the judiciary of the State. I repeat once more that that court, if that is to be considered here, is sustained, as I understand it, by the express letter of their constitution and by the very text of their statutes.

But if Senators will go behind all this authority I ask them to go carefully, not in the spirit of affirmation but in the spirit of inquiry; go, if they will, not back to the supervisors of the parishes, go if you will to the election precincts, but going there I think I could challenge any rational or any candid man to deny that by the voice, the fiat, of the people of Louisiana they did give their assent to the election of the men who acted as the Legislature of Louisiana and their assent to the election of the man who from that time to this has acted as the governor of Louisiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have not been.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, it is so late in the day that I had about concluded not to say anything on this question; but inasmuch as there seems to be no one else desiring to occupy the time, I will do so for the purpose of giving my views in reference to this question and the effect of the decision of the Senate in this particular case.

In listening to the arguments of Senators on both sides, I have noticed that there is one point made by the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the majority report that has not been observed as the pivotal point upon which this case turned before the committee. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] discussed the question to-day quite elaborately, that is, that the election laws of Louisiana under which this election was held and the returning board authorized by that law were unconstitutional. It is upon this point, as a starting point, that the majority of the committee came to their conclusion. If that election law is unconstitutional, as stated by the committee and as argued by the Senator from Vermont, the returning board had no validity whatever; their return as a matter of course was a nullity. It was upon this hypothesis that the majority of the committee arrived at the conclusion that if any government should be recognized by the Senate of the United States without further action it should be the McEnery government, on the ground that the returns, the only evidence which would be legal evidence if these laws were unconstitutional, were in the hands of the governor, and that was the only evidence upon which an opinion could be based in reference to the result. It was on that ground that the Committee on Privileges and Elections made their report; but in making that report there is a little history connected with it which ought to be observed in order to come to a proper conclusion, in my judgment at least, as to our action in the premises now. We reported first that in our opinion if the facts could be placed before the committee correctly and the election returns made properly McEnery would not have been elected, but upon the evidence we had before us we decided that if either was elected it was McEnery, but that there was no valid election on account of the magnitude of the frauds on both sides.

In making that report to the Senate we first proposed to the Senate that the Congress of the United States should pass an act authorizing an election to be held in the State of Louisiana and thereby determining this question. Second, we proposed to the Senate a resolution that there was no existing State government in the State of Louisiana. These two propositions were presented by the committee to the Senate of the United States for their action. The committee acted, as I said, upon the theory that the election law of Louisiana was unconstitutional, and that we had no legal data before us except that which, if we held the unconstitutionality of the law, would decide the election of McEnery. We then supposed that the Congress of the United States would take action and either pass the bill authorizing a new election with the safeguards placed around it as we had suggested, or something similar, or that they would declare that no State government existed and provide in some way for a State government.

The Senate of the United States utterly failed and refused to act upon the resolution declaring that there was no State government having an existence in the State of Louisiana. On the bill reported from that committee, a law to be enacted for an election to be held in that State, the Senate voted down the proposition, and on that vote every democrat in the Senate voted against the law, and sufficient republicans to defeat it. How then does the case stand? The resolution declaring that there was no State government was ignored by the Senate. A bill prepared for an election in that State was voted down by the Senate. What action then could be or ought to have been taken?

That is the situation as the case stands to-day before the Senate of the United States. Pinchback presents his certificate. McMillen was elected by one Legislature. The Senate of the United States can either declare the Kellogg government a lawful government to-day, or they should declare the McEnery government a lawful government, or they should declare that no government at all exists and provide for a government. Suppose there is no action on the part of Congress at all? You then leave the State of Louisiana without form so far as a government is concerned and no one to act, if our position was correct. Unless the President of the United States should act and sustain and support a government all is chaos and confusion, and revolution and bloodshed must inevitably be the result. That then was the position.

I was told the other day by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] that he would like to see some way made for certain gentlemen to get out of a dilemma they were in. What dilemma? I suppose the Senator intended to suggest that those who made the majority report asking that the Senate and House of Representatives take action in this matter and who now claim the right to seat a Senator in this body from that State have changed their views to such an extent that they were in a dilemma. Let us see. After the Senate refused to act, after Congress refused to do anything, I, as a member of that committee, was required to ask myself the question, what is to be done? The President had recognized Mr. Kellogg as governor of the State of Louisiana. It was my duty to sustain the arm of the Government in preserving peace and order in that State, and I did so to the extent of my ability. There was but one course left, and that was for the President to recognize one government or the other and maintain that government, execute the laws, enforce the decisions of the courts. Since that time the question as to the constitutionality of their laws, commonly denominated the election laws of Louisiana, has twice been decided by the superior or supreme court of that State. The supreme court in the case of the State ex rel. Morgan vs. Kennard, at their March term, 1873, decided the law to be constitutional; and also in the case of the State of Louisiana vs. McFarland, at the June term, 1873, the court not only decided the election laws constitutional, but expressly recognized the Kellogg legislature as the lawful Legislature of that State. The recognition of that State government then has been by their own courts, by the President, and by the other branch of Congress. We are then left in a position where we must either sustain the Kellogg government or admit that there is no government there at all of any kind de facto or de jure, and authorize by that means revolution and bloodshed.

I have examined the question in reference to the constitutionality of the election laws of Louisiana. I know it would be considered presumptuous for me to attempt to reply in any way whatever to the learned Senator from Vermont in his legal argument to-day on the constitutionality of those laws. I know that he is considered the oracle of the Senate so far as the law is concerned. Not only that, but when he talks law in the Senate and retires from it, everybody else seems willing to retire and consider that that is all that need be said in reference to the question. The very moment certain gentlemen in the Senate give their views of the law, if the rest of the Senate do not retire, they usually retire themselves, as much as to suggest that what they have said is all that need be said. Now in my feeble manner I propose to examine this question for a moment and see whether or not the proposition of the Senator from Vermont can be answered.

Probably he will say to me, "Why, you once decided this law unconstitutional yourself." I did agree to report that it was unconstitutional; but inasmuch as courts, according to the Senator from Vermont, are not bound by the decisions of other courts and nobody is bound by the decisions of courts, I suppose the gentlemen who pretend to be lawyers, whether they are or not, are bound only to their own conclusions from examination, let those conclusions be what they may. The Senator from Vermont says the law appointing the board of canvassers of Louisiana is unconstitutional. The Senator says the law that requires the returns to be made to that board, instead of being made to the secretary of state under the constitution, is unconstitutional. Let us see. The constitution of Louisiana in the forty-sixth article provides:

> Returns of all elections for members of the General Assembly shall be made to the secretary of state.

All returns shall be made to the secretary of state. By whom are they to be made to the secretary of state? All returns in the State of Illinois under the constitution are required to be made to the secretary of state; but because the constitution requires the returns to be made to the secretary of the state, is that any reason why those returns cannot be canvassed and the result known before they are so returned? I presume there are many gentlemen here who represent States which have a constitution with a similar provision requiring the returns of the votes for members of the General Assembly, for governor and lieutenant-governor, and State officers to be made to the secretary of state. A number of the constitutions of the different States have precisely this provision and this requirement. But are there no intermediate steps that can be taken by enactment of the Legislature to ascertain the voice of the people before the returns are in the hands of the secretary of the State? Is it not a well-known fact, and is it not a proposition that is known to be lawful, too, that every member of the Legislature elected in many States, and especially in my own State, gets his certificate from the secretary of state? The returns are made up in the different counties by the boards of canvassers in the counties. They certify to an abstract of the votes to the secretary of state and on that abstract a certificate is given so far as a majority is concerned. The returns are sent to the secretary of state to be filed in his office, but the certificate is issued to the member of the house of representatives or senate at once. The legislators are known, are designated and certified prior to their meeting as such representatives. But, according to the Senator from Vermont, the returns would have to be made to the secretary of state of the election of members of the General Assembly, and that General Assembly must meet for the purpose of opening and counting those votes as presented by the secretary of state, as he said, sealed and unbroken until the Legislature should meet. Of course the Senator from Vermont is not listening to me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like him to explain to me his proposition that the Legislature meet for the purpose of having the votes opened by the secretary of state in their presence. In the presence of what Legislature? In the presence of the Legislature elected for the purpose of convening at that time. If the votes are not to be opened and canvassed prior to the time when they are to be opened by the secretary of state in the presence of the Legislature of the State, how are they to ascertain that they are elected members in order to be there for the purpose of witnessing the canvass of votes? That constitution means just what the constitution of every other State that is in precisely the same language means, that the returns are opened for the purpose of attesting the truth and verifying the fact that has gone to the world that such and such persons have been elected, and for no other purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Which returns, may I ask my friend, those for the members of the Assembly or those for the governor?

Mr. LOGAN. Either.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean to say that by the course of a constitutional government in the various States where there are no returning boards the secretary of state is to open and canvass the returns for governor and send in the result to the Legislature?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; I did not say any such thing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But he does open the returns for members of the General Assembly, and according to those returns he does make his list; is not that it?

Mr. LOGAN. He makes up his list as the returns are certified to him by the canvassing board. I suppose the Senator will not deny that. Each county—at least it is so in my State—has a board of canvassers; it may be the county judge and two justices of the peace; but there is a canvassing board in every district that elects members to the Legislature. That canvassing board makes out a certificate, but they send the returns to the secretary of state.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not my proposition, because I have not stated anything about that particular thing; but the Senator is quite right, no doubt, in stating what the course is in his State, that the local officers who are brought into contact with the people make up a statement of how the people have voted according as they have sworn they will; they then send it to the chief scribe of the State, so to speak, the secretary, who thus is enabled to know who are the persons who appear from the various local returns to be members of the General Assembly. He makes the list of those men who thus assemble and have a prima facie right to their offices and then proceed to determine upon each other, and so on.

Mr. LOGAN. This is just the difference now between the case of Louisiana and the case of other States: Louisiana preferred to have a canvassing board, made up of five persons. The State of Illinois prefers to have a canvassing board in each district. That is the distinction precisely. We make a canvassing board in each senatorial and representative district. Louisiana made a canvassing board of five members for the purpose of counting all the votes and then returning them to the secretary of state, the same as the canvassing board in the legislative districts does in other States. If the constitution requires the returns to be made to the secretary of state without providing that they shall be made through any intermediate board of persons, and the Legislature may provide that a canvass shall be made in the districts and then sent to the secretary of state for the purpose of opening and canvassing himself, I ask you if the constitution authorizes the Legislature to make a canvassing board in the representative district if it has not the same power to make a canvassing board for the whole State? If the power exists in the one instance, does it not exist in the other?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not desire to interrupt my friend. He knows that I respect his views. He knows that I have followed them down to this very day; that, perhaps, is the misfortune under which I labor; but the distinction is, I will suggest to my friend, who can see it quite as readily as I can, that in the case of all those local officers, no matter what you call them, they are the primary fountain of ascertainment from the people themselves in each district of what the vote has been, from the very nature of the case. Now, in this instance the Legislature of Louisiana has undertaken to say that between those primary officers of the people in their respective and separate localities and the final grand court of the State, its Assembly, there shall intervene a set of judges, or board, or whatever you call them, who are to sift out the returns and do this and that with them and make up a list. It may not affect this case, but I do not think the two propositions are the same.

Mr. LOGAN. All the distinction is that in the one case a board is provided for a representative district; in the other case the board intervenes for the whole State to count the votes and give the returns to the secretary of the State. And so it was in the State of Louisiana in reference to that law.

But I was going to say, without continuing any further in reference to this proposition, that I also, having some respect at least for the opinion of the courts in my own State, must give the same respect to the opinions of the courts in other States. The supreme court of the State of Louisiana, having this question before them arising in the case of one of the judges and in the case of a sheriff and clerk, decided the question, leaving it open no further so far as that point is concerned. Although it has been said that the Senate is not bound by any judicial opinion, by any act of any other parties, by any decision that may be made by any branch of the Government, either State or national, but that Senators act independently and are the judges themselves without any other power intervening, yet I at least am led to my conclusion in deciding a case of this kind by the evidence, by the decisions of the courts, by the recognition of the Government, by all the surrounding circumstances combining together to produce a result. Hence I have come to my conclusions in this case.

In our report of two years ago we incorporated a dissenting opinion of the court of Louisiana and based our argument mainly upon it, declaring that the court had no jurisdiction to decide the question of the returning board, and for that reason we ignored the Lynch board; but in the two cases decided in Louisiana subsequently to our report and subsequently to the other decisions quoted in it the court recognized the existence of this board and recognized the constitutionality of the law which organized it. Therefore I say that we are not precluded from judging so far as we ourselves are concerned; but at least it is a fact before us that the court has so decided, and we should have some respect for the courts of the different States deciding the laws of their own States, especially in reference to matters of election.

But I will pass over that for the present and call the attention of the Senate to the proposition of the Senator in reference to the right of the courts to determine questions as to elections in a State. If the courts of a State have no right to decide as to what body is the Legislature of the State, have no jurisdiction or right to decide as to who is governor of the State, where the question arises before them, I ask the Senator, or any Senator on that side of the question, to tell me what tribunal has a right to decide. Suppose there are in a State two opposing pretenders for the gubernatorial chair; suppose there are two contending legislative bodies acting under the same constitution, having one court, both claiming the right to enact laws, both governors claiming the right to sign bills, both governors claiming the right to execute laws, if there is no power in that State to decide who the legislative body is, or who the executive of that State is, I ask the lawyers to tell me who has the right to decide? Where does the power exist? In what department of the Government does it reside? Suppose that neither Legislature calls upon the President of the United States for troops, suppose that neither pretending governor calls upon the President to interfere, I ask you then to tell me where is the tribunal to make the decision?

How does the President intervene where there are two opposing governors? The President intervenes on the call of the governor or the Legislature of the State, asking him to interpose his authority for the purpose of preventing bloodshed by suppressing violence. Suppose neither of these authorities or pretended authorities calls upon the President and the State stands there by itself with two Legislatures and governors and one court. I ask some man to tell me who is to decide which is the right one. If there is any answer to it, I will thank any man in the Senate to tell me what it is. I will thank my friend from Vermont, my friend from Michigan, or the Senator from Ohio or any other Senator on that side of the House, to answer me where the power exists to maintain either one of those governments if it does not rest in the judicial power of the State.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I will say to the Senator that that point is wholly immaterial to this question of the election of Mr. Pinchback; it would be very appropriate on the other resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.]

Mr. LOGAN. That is, however, not an answer to my question. Wholly immaterial to this question, the Senator says it is, therefore it is not in the case. But it is a material question to know which one of these Legislatures was the proper Legislature, and there were two Legislatures. Is it not material for us to know here which Legislature was the true one if either one was? Then I say it is material in this case to know what power can decide that question.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. My point was that neither was the true Legislature; there was no true Legislature there.

Mr. LOGAN. That is upon the ground that there is no government there at all; but I am arguing upon the hypothesis that there are two pretending governments; I care not whether either of them is lawful or not. I want the information; I want to know where the power exists to enforce the law or where the power exists to give the citizens of the State a knowledge of the law. I said to-day, and as the Senator from Vermont in reply answered, every citizen is presumed to know the law and every citizen is regarded and held accountable for his action whether he ever heard of the law or not. If every citizen must know the law and is held responsible for his acts to the law, I ask Senators to tell me if there must not be some means by which he may ascertain the law. The reason for the presumption of the law is that there is a means through which and by which the citizen may ascertain the law. If he fails to ascertain and understand the law, the law considers it his own fault; but if there are no means for his ascertaining the law, then I ask you why apply the presumption to him?

This point, although it has been dodged, and although Senators evade it by saying that it has no relation to this case, has a striking relation to it. From the beginning to the end, it is for us to know who the Legislature is, for us to know who the governor is, for us to know if there is one or if there is not one. If there is no Legislature in Louisiana, no governor in Louisiana, it is our duty to find some way and some means by which a governor may be chosen and a Legislature may be there. The reason that I make this point is, as I said, that when our committee asked you to pass a law, and you refused to do it, for an election in Louisiana, when we asked you to resolve that there was no State government there and you refused to do it, this question then arose in my mind, how the people of Louisiana are to know whether they have a government or not, how are the people to be protected in Louisiana in their rights if there is no power to give them protection, if there is no power to declare the government, if there is no power to declare the law, if there is no power to execute the law? Then I ask you the condition of the State of Louisiana. Its condition, according to this doctrine, is chaos and confusion, left to wild, mad mobs, for the purpose of exercising authority by force and only by force. The doctrine that there is no power to declare a legislative body in a State is a revolutionary doctrine, it is the doctrine of bloodshed, and not the doctrine of peace and good order.

The Senator from Vermont to-day, in response to my inquiry, answered it in this way: He said the Senator from Illinois knew well how it was to be decided. He referred to my having engaged in conflict in this nation, and therefore I might infer how it is to be decided. What is that inference? That it is to be decided by the sword and by the force of numbers and not by law, not by the exercise of law upon the people, with its peaceful influence and protecting care.

Let us carry that doctrine a little further. That is the doctrine proclaimed in the Senate to-day by the gentlemen who refuse to admit that there is a government de facto in that State. The very doctrine that has been announced in this Senate Chamber on all sides of it against a de facto government in Louisiana is the doctrine of State destruction, it is the doctrine of revolution, it is the doctrine of anarchy, and it is the doctrine that, carried to its logical and legitimate results, will deny the power of the National Government to preserve the life of a State. It is the very doctrine opposed to the theory upon which this Government maintained its existence against secession and treason in this country.

Now, sir, let us see where we are carried with this new idea—no, not a new idea, an old one. Where are we carried by it? In the first place, you obliterate the rights of the States; according to this theory you deny the right of a State through any department of its government to preserve itself. In the second place, you deny the right of the National Government to save its life; because the Senator who answered me a moment ago, and for whom I have great respect not only as a man but as a lawyer, a gentleman who sat long upon the bench, whose opinions I would bow to as readily as to the opinions of any man in this country, said the other day that the power did not exist in the National Government—I do not quote his language precisely—to recognize a State government de facto unless that government was lawfully instituted.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I said it might acknowledge the fact that it was in possession of power, but not whether rightfully or not.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will allow me to read what he said:

> Had Kellogg and his Legislature already been in the possession of power, and in the actual exercise of the offices they claimed, and in the actual government of the State—without any act on the part of the Federal Government they might be a de facto government. That is the point. Further on the Senator said that the argument is in a circle, that the induction being unlawful we come back to the same place we start from, that it is all unlawful. That was substantially what the Senator said.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The recognition of a government which had been set up only by the Executive of the land, would be a recognition only of the Executive's own act.

Mr. LOGAN. A government set up by the Executive only! Now I will answer that. That means that if no person had participated in it but the Executive, if he merely without an election, without law, without right, had set up a government himself, that would be the position. I will not dispute with him further on this point except to ask him what is the result of his doctrine? If the government of Louisiana cannot be made a de facto government at all, either by the courts of the State or by the executive authority of the United States, I ask him how can Congress make it a lawful government?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. My present view of it—it is not a question that I have examined carefully—but my present impression is that even Congress could not make it a lawful government.

Mr. LOGAN. I supposed that would be the answer.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Congress might provide for an election.

Mr. LOGAN. I supposed that would be the answer of the Senator for the reason that his argument led to that conclusion and to none other. Congress then, although this government has been in existence for two years, cannot legalize its acts. Congress cannot make it a government either de facto or de jure. If it is not a de facto government on account of its own acts, Congress cannot make it a de facto government. If it is not a de jure government on account of its own acts, Congress cannot legalize its unlawful acts. That then is the conclusion of the Senator from Michigan.

Now let us see where that leaves us. That leaves us in this condition: According to the argument of the Senator from Vermont the courts of the State cannot recognize at all either the Legislature or the governor; the President cannot recognize it because it is unlawful; Congress cannot recognize it. Why? Because it is unlawful. Then nobody can recognize it, and what is the condition? If it cannot be recognized by any one, by Congress, by the courts, by the President, what is its condition? Its condition is a mass of human beings thrown together with the law of "might makes right" without anything to restrain their acts whatever, no executive power, no judicial power, no legislative power! How then are they to be controlled? If this is the condition of Louisiana to-day, every sheriff in the State that has executed a writ is liable for it; every man who has collected a dollar of taxes might be liable for it; every court that has given judgment and every order of execution where a man's life has been taken would be murder.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Is not that the legal result in all cases where unconstitutional acts have been performed?

Mr. LOGAN. That is the result, and I am only saying that that is the result now according to the theory of the Senator. If a man executes another that has no authority in law to do it, of course he is a murderer. If no authority can be conferred on Governor Kellogg or the Legislature or the courts of that State by the President or the courts or Congress, then the whole government would be unlawful even to being responsible for the execution of criminals.

The Senator from Vermont and other Senators here have argued that we are not bound by the decisions of the courts. That is true; nor are we bound by anything. When we say we are not bound, we may exercise our own will. We may pass unconstitutional laws, those that are in the face of the Constitution, known to us to be such at the time we enact them; but would we not make ourselves a laughing-stock before the world if we should do it? We have the power to do it, but we have not the moral right to do it. We are compelled to obey the Constitution; that is, we feel compelled. Many times we may make mistakes. The inferior courts are bound to obey the decisions of the superior courts. How bound? Bound just as we are bound here to perform our duty, that the decisions of the courts may be uniform, that the laws may be understood, that there may be no confusion. The inferior must follow the superior for the benefit of the law itself and of the citizens, to preserve the rights of the people. So in reference to the States. The States have been so tenderly regarded by the courts of the country that the Supreme Court of the United States will follow the current of decisions of the State courts except in a case where the Constitution of the United States may intervene or some question arise that is a question belonging to national matters. Why? My friend from Vermont to-day denied that proposition and he read from a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States to prove that they had denied that they were bound to follow the decisions of the courts of the State or that any one was. But if the Senator had only read the next paragraph he would have found the reason for the particular decision, and I do not propose to criticise this opinion of the court in the case of the township of Pine Grove vs. Talcott; but I do say that those who have read the dissenting opinion of two judges of that court would perhaps be somewhat confused in the law when they came to compare it with the opinion of the majority of the court. But when you look at the majority opinion, you find that the court say:

> The general understanding of the legal profession throughout the country is believed to have been that they were valid—

Speaking of the contracts—

> The national Constitution forbids the States to pass laws impairing the obligation of contracts.

Therefore the Supreme Court will not decide otherwise because the case would impair the obligation of a contract under a State law, and that would be in violation of the Constitution of the United States; and hence the court say they are not bound by the decision of the State court. That is the reason in this decision for their not following the rule as generally laid down that to do so would infringe upon a provision of the Constitution of the United States by allowing a legislative act of a State to impair the obligation of contracts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator to point out to us how it is that the decision of a court in a State as to the original powers of a municipal corporation, that they have not original power to do a particular thing, impairs the obligation of a contract?

Mr. LOGAN. Well, I cannot answer the Senator any better than to hand him this decision, and he can read it over again and there he will find exactly the reason. The Senator knows very well that the Supreme Court so decided.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, I do not.

Mr. LOGAN. That is my reading of it at any rate, and I think that is the general reading of the decision as far as I know. But I do state the proposition to be, and it has been stated here frequently, that the courts of the United States almost uniformly follow the decisions of the courts of the States when deciding questions that belong to the States. So they would in a case of this kind; and in the case decided from Rhode Island, which has been read here often, of Luther vs. Borden, the Supreme Court say positively that they follow the decisions of the State courts in reference to these questions and that it is their duty to do it. That has been the rule, at least so far as I know. I do not pretend to so extensive reading in the law as some of my friends in the Senate. I do not claim great legal lore. I was before I came to Congress a practicing lawyer. I do not say how much law I knew. I do not pretend to know very much; but I do sometimes know what I read, and it is not always the man who makes the greatest pretensions that knows the most law either. I have heard men in the Senate Chamber talk about the ignorance of other men in the law. That is very well for a man to do, because it is as much as to notify the world "I am the embodiment of all the legal lore in this land!" That is about what a man says when he talks of the ignorance of others. I heard that said the other day to the Senator from Indiana, that because he has not been in the courts for a good while, therefore he must be very ignorant of the law. I have nothing to boast of so far as my knowledge is concerned; I lay claim to very little; I know however that there are others who do not know any more, who claim to know a great deal. [Laughter.]

Now, if the doctrine of these Senators is correct, that we are not to follow the decisions of courts, that we are not to follow the decisions of Legislatures, and that the superior courts of the nation are not to be bound by the decisions of the courts of the States in questions relating to their own laws in matters that do not infringe the Constitution of the United States, then I ask if we are not wide at sea without any guide or compass whatever? Where shall we land? The Senator from Vermont told us to-day where we should land. I asked him after several questions to tell us how to get out of this dilemma. What dilemma? Why, you say the President has no right to recognize, Congress has no right to recognize, the courts of the State have no right to recognize, and what condition are we in? We are certainly in a dilemma that we need to be extricated from. How does the Senator from Vermont extricate us? He says that each citizen must be the judge for himself upon his own responsibility as to which Legislature is the proper Legislature and as to which governor is the proper governor. That is to say, if there are a dozen men claiming to be governor and a dozen bodies claiming to be the Legislature, each man must take his part of the responsibility by deciding for himself which law he will obey enacted by either of those Legislatures. That would be a nice condition of things! I will say, as was said by the Senator from Wisconsin, you authorize me by one Legislature to hold a certain position, you authorize another man by another Legislature to hold the same; we come in conflict, both attempting to exercise the authority that we claim, conferred upon us by the respective Legislatures that we bow in obedience to. What is the result? The result is that we must arbitrate that question; we must leave it to the judicial opinion of the courts, or else we must settle it by wager of battle, we must settle it by a conflict of arms. If we come in collision with the authority conferred upon both by different Legislatures, it is a question of power as to which one has the physical force to bear down the other or else it must be submitted to a court. Then if the court decides the question in favor of the gentleman having the opposing authority to me, where do I appeal? The court has settled it, has adjudicated upon our rights. There is the decision. I must bow to that decision of the court, for it is the only court of the land empowered to decide, and in obstructing its judgment I should be a violator of the law and subject to punishment.

But we are told that this is not a Legislature, that there has been no election. I have said before that there was nothing that we could decide upon so as to declare that there had been any legal decision as to which man was elected governor at the election. We did declare in our report that, in our opinion, by a fair election Kellogg would have been elected governor of the State, because there was a clear republican majority in that State. That was the declaration of our committee; but, as I said, from our starting point, declaring the unconstitutionality of the legislative act, we arrived at the conclusion, and could arrive at no other, that there was no valid result. Failing to have action by either House of Congress, I ask some Senator to tell me where we are to land; I want to know. Are we to stand for four years and submit to turmoil, tumult, and bloodshed in Louisiana? Yes, say able Senators, we are to do that; why? Because we have no power to do anything else; we have no authority to do anything else. Well, I only remember too well that in 1861 there was no power according to the theory of many learned men in this country to make the people of a State behave themselves Where is that power in the Constitution; where does it reside in the Government? they asked. Where do you find the power to coerce a State, or the power to regulate the affairs of a State? Where did we find the authority for a reconstruction of certain States after they had ceased to be States of the Union? Where is it in the Constitution? That power exists in the Government, and in all governments. Why? Of necessity it must exist. Under the law of self-preservation it must exist. That power must be found in every government—the right to preserve, protect, and defend itself. We have a right to protect, preserve, and defend the nation against its enemies, and to cause peace where confusion and bloodshed reign. The power must exist for the benefit of the citizens of the Government and for the benefit of the integrity of the Government. The power must exist in a State to protect itself against disorder in its own State or to call on the General Government to aid it. It is a necessity, a law of necessity that, requires it to be done. But our constitutional lawyers do not believe in laws of necessity. They do not understand the law of necessity which flows out of our very form of government and incident to and coextensive with our Constitution. It must be found in the Constitution just in so many words or else you cannot act!

Now I want these Senators to answer me one question. The government set up at Richmond by Jefferson Davis was an unlawful government set up by force; and yet though unlawful and set up by force this Government was compelled to recognize it as a de facto government—not in terms expressed by a law of Congress, not by a resolution of Congress, but by every act regulating the conduct of war between nations, by the exchange of prisoners, by communications with the enemy, by the visiting of committees and conferring for the purpose of combining the governments again. In every way, except by act of Congress, we recognized it as a de facto government; and yet we cannot recognize a government set up in one of our States, the Senator says by force unlawfully set up. How unlawfully set up? Set up just as lawfully as any government is set up where men claim that they are elected and the evidence is not sufficient to show it and yet they claim the offices and take possession of them. It makes no difference how they get possession of the offices. Said the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] when speaking of the Penn rebellion, if they get possession they are in lawful possession provided they were entitled by the election. That was his theory. Now according to his theory it makes no difference how this man Kellogg obtained possession of the office of governor, so that he is now in peaceful possession and recognized by the President. I do not go to that extent myself, but that is the argument of Senators on the other side of the Chamber in reference to the other side of this question.

Mr. President, finding this government in the condition it is in, finding ourselves situated as we are, what result are we going to produce by our act? That seems to me to be a point that ought to be considered. Suppose we refuse to-night or at any time to recognize the Kellogg government. O! but some Senators say, "We do not want to admit Pinchback, but we will vote to recognize the Kellogg government as a lawful government." Now let me say to Senators who say that, that in my judgment they put themselves in a false position. The very moment you recognize the Kellogg government as a lawful government, that very moment Mr. Pinchback's credentials are lawful credentials, and you cannot gainsay them. You have to declare that Kellogg is unlawfully the governor of Louisiana, or else you are bound to admit that Mr. Pinchback has a prima facie case on his papers if you recognize the Kellogg government. Some say that is different from the Legislature. Sir, the very same power that declared Kellogg elected declared every one of these members elected and returned their returns to the secretary of state and the secretary of state made out the roll with the name on it of every one of these members in that Legislature under the law the same as for Kellogg. When you recognize the legality of the Kellogg government, that moment the same rule applies to the Legislature, and gentlemen cannot avoid it because the reports show the very same action precisely. So one case is as broad as the other.

But suppose we leave it so and say we will not recognize either. The President has declared Kellogg the lawful governor. The President has declared the Legislature the lawful Legislature. The courts of the State declared the same thing. The House of Representatives passed a resolution—I do not remember just the language, but certainly in effect recognizing the Kellogg government either as a de facto or de jure government. This House, however, fails to do so. Suppose when the next Congress comes in the democratic House of Representatives recognize Mr. McEnery. Suppose the Senate refuse to recognize Mr. Kellogg, and refuse at the same time to recognize Mr. McEnery, what is the condition then? In what position are we? The House of Representatives, the Representatives of the people, tell the President that "McEnery is the right governor;" the Senate will not tell him either one; and in what position is he? What can he do? Is he to act upon his own volition and will, without reference to the declarations of either or both Houses of Congress? Is that the position we are to take?

But let us take another view of the case. Suppose you refuse to seat Mr. Pinchback upon the theory of my friend from Vermont, who says the men who elected Mr. Pinchback had no certificates made according to the constitution, but the men who elected Mr. McMillen, the McEnery legislature, had; he did not say so but I say it for him, because the returns were in the hands of the governor and through the secretary of state recognized by him as the lawful one they were certified as members of the Legislature; and according to his own argument then McMillen would be entitled to the seat.

As I said, I was in favor of a new election; I was in favor of declaring the government a nullity and electing officers; but you failed to do it; and now you must face the condition of things as they are, and that condition is that you either recognize Mr. Kellogg as the governor of the State and Mr. Pinchback as the Senator, or you recognize Mr. McEnery as the governor and McMillen as the Senator. If Senators think that Mr. McEnery was elected governor of the State, it is their duty to so say. If they think the Legislature under Mr. McEnery was the lawful Legislature, it is their duty to so say and declare it. I say to my friends on the opposite side of the Chamber that if they would substitute a resolution here to put McMillen in place of Pinchback, according to the theory of my friend from Vermont he would be bound to vote for it. I think it would be well for them to do it, because they would get one vote on our side according to his argument. You cannot escape the proposition that if this House does not recognize Pinchback the next Congress will recognize McEnery, and it is as much your duty to recognize McEnery to-day in this Senate if you believe he was the man who was elected in Louisiana as it is to recognize anybody else.

But I want to call the attention of the Senate to the last precedent of the Senate in reference to seating a Senator made not quite a year ago—those of you who insist that Pinchback is not entitled to his seat because the members who elected him had no certificates. The same gentleman who wrote this report against Kellogg—not against Pinchback for Pinchback was not a party to it, though as my friend from Michigan said he was called as a witness, but it makes no difference, his evidence is in the case anyhow and I do not desire to dodge it in any way—the same Senator who wrote the report declaring the election law of Louisiana unconstitutional and declaring McEnery elected if anybody was elected and his Legislature the proper Legislature if any Legislature was proper, because they had certificates, wrote also the report which I hold in my hand; and I want to read one paragraph. I will state first, however, the situation. Mr. SPENCER holds his seat to-day from Alabama on a prima facie claim. In Alabama there were two Legislatures. When the day for the meeting of the Legislature came, there was a quorum of the senate and a quorum of the house, with certificates, presided over by the lieutenant-governor and the old speaker. The republican portion of the Legislature did not take the oath there but they went to the court-house, as it was called, and there organized themselves into a Legislature. The governor at the time the Alabama Legislature met and organized, recognized the State-house Legislature. Two days afterward, when they counted the votes for governor, as they did under the constitution, a man by the name of Lewis became governor, and when he became governor he recognized the other Legislature called the court-house Legislature and sent his message to that body. The State-house Legislature elected Mr. Sykes to the United States Senate, the court-house Legislature elected Mr. SPENCER to the United States Senate. There were nine members in the Spencer legislature who had no certificates of election, and by counting those nine in the Spencer or court-house Legislature without certificates a quorum was made. But the nine men from those districts who had the certificates from the secretary of state being in the State-house Legislature gave a quorum to that body. Hence there were eighteen representatives where there should have been but nine. Mr. Carpenter in writing this report, which seated Mr. SPENCER from Alabama, said:

The persons in the two bodies claiming to be the senate and house of representatives who voted for Spencer constituted a quorum of both houses of the members actually elected; the persons in the State-house Legislature who voted for Sykes did not constitute a quorum of the two houses duly elected, but a quorum of persons certified to have been elected to the two houses. Were the Senate to hold Sykes's election to be valid, it would follow that erroneous certificates, delivered to men conceded not to be elected, had enabled persons who in fact ought not to vote for a Senator to elect a Senator to misrepresent the State for six years. On the other hand, if we treat the court-house Legislature as the legal Legislature of the State, it is conceded that we give effect to the will of the people as evidenced by the election. So that, to state the proposition in other words, we are called upon to choose between the form and the substance, the fiction and the fact; and, considering the importance of the election of a Senator, in the opinion of your committee the Senate would not be justified in overriding the will of the people, as expressed at the ballot-box, out of deference to certificates issued erroneously to persons who were not elected.

There were nine men certified to be elected who had the returns stating that they were elected, but by an examination of the votes in the districts that these nine men assumed to represent our committee came to the conclusion that they were not elected. We came to that conclusion from the fact that some of them were afterward unseated by a compromise made at the suggestion of the Attorney-General and the others put in their places who at that time had no certificates. The certified members were in one Legislature and the uncertified members in the other. We seated Mr. SPENCER on the evidence showing that the majority of the people had decided in favor of the uncertified men. That is a precisely parallel case to what we say in this report, and the truth is I must confess that the two reports do not read very well together. We say in this report written by the same Senator, a very able man:

A careful consideration of the testimony convinces us that, had the election of November last been fairly conducted and returned, Kellogg and his associates, and a Legislature composed of the same political party, would have been elected.

That is what we say in our report, at the same time that we declare that according to the legally-certified election returns McEnery must have been elected according to the face of the certificates. We declare that if the election had been fair and fairly returned Kellogg and his associates would have been elected. Less than a year after that report was made we make a report in Mr. Spencer's case, in which we seated him by the votes of men uncertified and ignored the certified men on the very grounds that we declare there that Kellogg was deprived of his election.

Our friends on the other side of the Chamber have talked frequently during this contest about this question rising above party. It does rise above party. It is a legal question. It is a question as to the existence of a State government. It is not altogether legal, however, in my judgment. It is as much a political (but I do not mean it in the sense of party) as it is a legal question, but they say let us rise above party. I am glad to see our friends doing that, but I would like for them to point me out a single solitary instance where any question of this kind has ever come before the Senate when they did not rise above party so much as to vote solidly against the republican. You cannot show an instance in the Senate—not one since I have been here—where you did not vote solidly against the republican, whether he was reported for or against. Yet it is always a matter of conscience, always a matter above party, always a question of constitutional law! And when you appeal to the consciences of men on our side (and I have no fault to find with that) you always find plenty of conscience on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where else would you expect to find it?

Mr. LOGAN. I never hunted for it anywhere else. [Laughter.] All conscience on one side and all above party on the other! That is well. But if the time ever does come when our above-party friends can find it in their consciences to vote to seat a republican Senator where there is a contest, I will begin to think that probably "a change has come over the spirit of their dreams;" but I am absolutely within the last year or two so much astounded at my own course, that I sometimes question it. I find the democrats always solid on every question; they always have the law on their side, always have justice on their side, and half the time a portion of our Senators on this side vote with them, proving the fact that it is on their side, and I get caught voting without conscience so often that I begin to suspect that I have not very much. [Laughter.]

Thus conscience does make cowards of us all.

If it has not made cowards on this side of the Chamber, it has done its work very poorly, not in this case alone but in many. For there is more talk of conscience among our friends than among the same number of men elsewhere on the globe. [Laughter.] In the Spencer case our committee reported as unanimously for Spencer to be seated here as we reported against Kellogg, and yet the democrats voted solidly against him. They think our committee is a great committee when it is on their side, but a great set of ignoramuses when it is on the other side.

Now, Mr. President, I want to ask the Senate a question with reference to the future of the Legislature of Louisiana. If Mr. Pinchback is not seated, that is, if the word "not" is voted in the resolution and the resolution then passes that excludes him from this Chamber forever; that ends him. Then I suppose Mr. McMillen will come in with his claim, and then our democratic friends will rise above party again and every one of them will vote to seat him.

My friend from North Carolina argued that Penn and his colleagues were elected lawfully and that it was no revolution to unseat Kellogg and take possession of the government, and I presume all my friends on that side of the Chamber believe the same thing. When McMillen's name comes in then, you on our side of the Chamber having ignored Pinchback have got to take McMillen or else you must say they must not have a Senator at all. If then you refuse McMillen, what next? Then I suppose the Legislature that is being concocted over in New York for the benefit of Louisiana will elect a Senator, and you will have him to examine. You Senators who are waiting for a legal Legislature to elect a Senator so that you can vote him in from the State of Louisiana are perhaps waiting for a thing that has not occurred there for twenty years, according to your idea of legality. There is a little committee over in the city of New York of ex-members of Congress exercising authority that they have no right to exercise, for the Congress to which they were elected has expired. They are in New York now with a few conservatives sitting down in a room concocting a Legislature to have a compromise, and they agree that they will recognize Kellogg if you will only fix up a Legislature for them. When you do that, Senators, I say to you there is no legality to that Legislature any more than there is to this, and not so much. The idea of a committee of Congress, an expired Congress, making a Legislature two, three, four months after the election, for a State, and then we to be asked to put a Senator in here elected by a Legislature of that kind and declare this one an unconstitutional Legislature and that constitutional! How then are you going to get a Senator and when are you going to get one? I know it was made sport of here the other day when it was suggested that the Constitution of the United States said that each State should be entitled to two Senators. Our friend from Michigan said that was all well enough but they must be Senators; that the people of Louisiana would rather not be represented at all than to be misrepresented, thereby suggesting that Mr. Pinchback was not a representative of Louisiana and therefore he ought not to be in the Senate. Does my friend from Michigan know or not that Louisiana has fifteen thousand colored voters in majority over the white voters, and will he say that this man Pinchback is not a representative of the majority of that State, when he has been elected governor, been elected to the Senate twice, and the Legislature that they are trying to get up now elected him a few weeks ago by an almost unanimous vote? Is he not the representative of the people of that State? Our friend from Michigan has not examined the statistics of the State of Louisiana very closely or he would have known better than to have made that statement.

But now let me take his proposition. Does he mean to say that a man is not a fit representative in the Senate because he presumes that the man does not represent the State? Is that what he means? Let us carry that out. Here is New York with one democrat and one republican. Which one represents the majority of the people in the State of New York? I am not going to decide that question. Here is Pennsylvania with one democrat and one republican. Which one represents the majority of that State? Sometimes we find States largely republican electing a democrat to the Senate, by the meandering perhaps of the districts of the State, and sometimes vice versa. A democratic State elects a republican occasionally to the Senate. Is that an objection to a man? Is it an objection because perhaps a majority of the people of the State do not agree with him politically? If it was, it would not apply in this instance; because if this man is not a true representative of the majority of the people of Louisiana, I do not know where you will find one.

Mr. President, unless we act on this question, unless we settle the status of the State of Louisiana, if there is more bloodshed, more riot, more confusion in that State, the blood is upon your own heads. I said in the Senate Chamber two years ago on this very floor about this time of night, appealing to the Senate then to pass a bill for an election in that State, that if they did not do something blood would flow in the streets of New Orleans. Murder and assassinations have been that which we have seen and heard of. Scenes of riot, tumult, confusion, have reigned throughout the borders of that State. Anarchy, according to the arguments of Senators, must exist there for the next two years. Revolution may take place; any day the government may be overturned and the President again called upon to suppress insurrection against the laws of the country. You have it in your power to decide it to-night. You have it in your power to decide this matter either one way or the other. It is a duty devolving upon this Senate. If you fail to do it, it is but sticking in the bark to tell me that there is no lawful government there when the President has recognized Kellogg and the people have submitted, and when the courts have declared his election valid, every court in the State in three different decisions; and not a court, as the Senator from Michigan says, set up by the Executive alone—no, sir, a court independent of the powers that they decide for, a court four years in existence in Louisiana prior to the Kellogg election, a court not appointed by Kellogg, a court not appointed by Pinchback, but a court appointed by Mr. Warmoth. One of the decisions was made in reference to Judge Morgan, not when he was on the bench, but in reference to his right to sit on the bench. In that decision they decided the constitutionality of the election law and recognized in express words that it was their duty to take judicial notice of the legislative body so that they can pass upon the laws that are made by that body. They do recognize it.

By that recognition of the courts, of the President, of one branch of Congress, it is your duty this night to either recognize the Kellogg government by seating Pinchback or to recognize the McEnery government by seating McMillen, so that there may be a recognized government in Louisiana—one or the other. Or if not that, either declare Kellogg governor or declare McEnery governor, one or the other. It is your duty to do it. Every instinct of humanity appeals to you to do it. The blood of the men murdered within the last two years cries to Heaven and asks that this Senate Chamber, having the power to give peace to that land, shall decide the question once for all and save that people from further riot and bloodshed.

I say to you to-night although I am in favor of recognizing Mr. Pinchback, although I shall vote for him to be sworn as a Senator, yet it would be better, rather than do nothing, to swear a democrat in on the other side and give peace to the country. Let somebody be governor; let somebody be Senator; let peace exist once more in that land; let the power of the Government be felt at least again, so that we may not have the scenes that we have had truthfully stated and depicted before this country that have occurred there within the last two years. Why, sir, it would be better that party lines should be obliterated, that party should sink forever and be unheard of during future ages; it would be better that either the democratic party be wiped out or the republican party wiped out and all parties destroyed than to have murder and crime and confusion in the land. Republican as I am, and one I believe of the strictest of the sect, I appeal to God to witness the truth of my statement when I declare that I would rather see this Senate Chamber reversed so far as politics is concerned than to see our land flowing with blood and our people crying for protection, and children and mothers seeking the cover of the night in the forest to hide them from the assassin on their track, if that reversal would change this scene in that State, which I fear it would not. To you, Senators, I appeal. Decide this question one way or the other.

Men may talk to me about changing my notions in reference to the seating of one of these men or in reference to the existence of a government in that State. I care not for that. I care not what may be said; I speak for humanity, and I appeal for peace in this border. The only way to give it is, as I said, not to stick in the bark. The people of that State are entitled to a government of some kind. You cannot pass a law for a new election. That has been tried and failed. There is but one of two things to do: it is to give the democrats the governor and Senator or to give them to your own faith. Somebody was elected. We declared the election void on account of fraud. I still stand by that; but at the same time we must confess and must admit that somebody got some legal votes. Either one or the other of these candidates for governor got votes that were legal. The election was on the day named by the law, at the time appointed by the law, at the place appointed under the law, although outrageously appointed I must confess. Somebody voted for McEnery, somebody voted for Kellogg, that had a right to vote. Therefore, if we could get at the truth, somebody had a majority and semblance of right to the office. We tried, as I said, to declare the election void. You refused to do it in this Chamber when we appealed to you. There was no road left open to us but to appeal for peace by the recognition of one governor or the other. If President Grant had recognized McEnery instead of Kellogg I would have stood by him in supporting that government in order to give peace to that State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Most assuredly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator says that the Senate refused to follow the recommendation of the committee, if I understand him, and provide for a fresh election. May I not ask the Senator if that refusal was not after the recommendation of the committee had been departed from by the votes, I think, of some of the committee themselves—I am sure by the vote of the gentleman who made the report—and an entirely different method of carrying out the election had been adopted?

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is correct so far as that is concerned; but what figure does that cut? The Senate were in duty bound to provide some means, and the very means that they pretended they would provide when they changed our bill they voted down when the vote was taken on that. They refused to provide any means, and that is what I was saying; and it is therefore their responsibility. When they refused so to act, and they refused for two years, there was but one course left for me if I was in favor of peace, and what was that? It was to be in favor of some kind of government. Hence I stood by the President when he recognized Kellogg as I would have stood by him if he had recognized the other man. Having recognized Kellogg, with my view of that election, I believe he did right. I stood by him from that day to this, believing I was right in doing it. Not only that, I believe it is to-day a government upheld as you say by power, but it is not because the majority of the people do not favor it. That is a great mistake. But the republican majority in Louisiana are colored men, who shrink from contact and contest with the white man. They are timid in the presence of the white man; they have been his slaves. Ten thousand men armed in New Orleans, as the colored people of that State cannot arm themselves, can drive the whole people of the State into the Mississippi River. They have arms; they have kept down the expression of the majority in that State by force; and that is the reason why apparently the government is not administered according to the feeling of the majority of the people. It is because the majority speak not out, but the minority lay forcible hands upon them and destroy their voice in every possible way.

Whether Senators may think me justified or not in my course I justify myself, because it is the only course left for a man who has sympathy with man and wants so to act as to give peace to the country. I am willing to be taunted with changing my views; I am willing to have these things said, because my action from the beginning has been in the line of good government and peace and order. I at first wanted an election to settle the question. Afterward I wanted a government of some kind, and I still want it. If the Senate to-night would allow Pinchback to be sworn in, you would see in that State quiet and peace. If it would recognize the Kellogg government, there would be no more uprising among the people, no more bloodshed and murdering of negroes. All these things would cease. Why? Because there would be a government to execute the law, or at least the representatives of a government to execute the laws for its protection, one that could appeal to the National Government for protection, for sympathy, and for support. With these things peace would come; with these things the nation would be satisfied; with these things the people would shout and say, "Well done, good and faithful servants." Power is what is wanted; authority is what is wanted. You have not heard of a colored man being murdered since the denunciation of Sheridan for his "banditti" dispatch; you have not heard of murders and bloodshed there since that. Why? Because they felt that the power of the Government was behind Sheridan to protect life and property, and that is the reason for it. Whenever you give a legal existence to a government in Louisiana it will remain as peaceful the rest of the time as it is to-day. If you fail to do it, you may look for more trouble in Louisiana such as we have had before.

Mr. President, I have said more than I ought to have said, and I beg pardon of the Senate for having detained them so long.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, it has been said during the course of this debate that this question was above all party considerations. That remark should be amended. It should be said that this question ought to be above all party considerations, for, while I cast no imputation whatever upon the motives of our friends on this side of the Chamber, it is manifest to all that this question from the first has been made a party question by our democratic friends, that they have voted solidly upon it in regard to every proposition. If they did not regard it as a party question, they would probably not all think alike, as republicans are known to differ; but inasmuch as democratic Senators vote and speak as one man, we are not at liberty to suppose that they regard it in any higher light than a party question. If they have doubts in regard to this matter they cast them in favor of their own party; while, on the other hand, if republicans have doubts a great many of them cast them in favor of their enemies. Our democratic friends play this game of politics very much as they play cards, when in doubt they take the trick. They never allow any question of doubt to stand between them and an increase or strengthening of their power. No democratic Senator, so far as I know, aspires to be better than his colleagues, aspires to show himself wiser and more conscientious than his colleagues, by voting and speaking on the other side. In this respect I think we have the advantage of the democratic party, because we do have those who rise superior to all party, and show themselves to be wiser and better than the mass of the party to which they belong.

The reasons why the democratic party are opposed to the seating of Mr. Pinchback are twofold, perhaps threefold. In the first place, they do not like his color. Any colored Senator who gets into this body must have a very clear title. If any flaw can be found in it or any flaw can be created, he will have trouble in getting here. First, he will have the united opposition of all our democratic friends, and he will be very apt to find opposition to some extent on the moral considerations that lift men entirely above their party; and yet democratic prejudice against color, we know, melts away in the presence of royalty. We have seen grave and dignified democratic Senators in this body addressing King Kalakaua as "your Majesty," and walking proudly in his train to the other end of the Capitol. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, there is another reason why the democratic party are opposed to seating Mr. Pinchback. First, because if he is rejected they expect to get a democrat in his place. That is a high political consideration which they never overlook. They understand full well that if Mr. Pinchback is rejected it will create demoralization in the republican ranks in Louisiana, and they understand that a certain process is going on in the Louisiana Legislature by which they expect to obtain the supremacy in that body. They have therefore this high inducement to resist Mr. Pinchback by every means in their power. We know that a committee has been in session in the city of New York for several days making a compromise in regard to the house of representatives in Louisiana. We are informed by the evening papers that that compromise has been made and forwarded to Governor Kellogg and to others in New Orleans for their ratification. I do not know how true the statement is in the evening papers, but I have some evidence outside to believe that this statement is mainly correct, and I will ask the Secretary to read it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Colonel Zacharie, who represents the conservatives of Louisiana in the matter of the compromise of their political differences with the republicans, returned to this city from New York this morning, and will leave for New Orleans to-night. His presence in New York was to be within call of the Wheeler compromise committee in case he was needed. It is understood the basis of the Wheeler compromise, which has been sent to Governor Kellogg at New Orleans, is about this: One additional conservative is seated in the senate. The lower house of the Legislature is conservative by a majority of twelve, but the two houses on joint ballot will be tied on a party vote, and if the acceptance of the Wheeler compromise is assumed, it is probable, if Pinchback is not seated, that a conservative will be sent to the Senate. It is said of Speaker Hahn, that though a republican, he will vote for a conservative citizen of the State rather than join with his party in electing a republican not a bona fide citizen. His vote would be the deciding one in the contingency of the two houses being evenly divided.

Mr. MORTON. Our democratic friends, who have always been distinguished for their political sagacity, see the advantage. They are reaching out for it, and they are extremely thankful to any republicans who will aid them in the accomplishment of their purpose. And when I was listening to a speech this afternoon, a long and elaborate speech that had been long in process of incubation, I observed my friend the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] beaming with pleasure as they listened to that speech and looking their gratitude. Every vote against Pinchback is a vote in effect in favor of a democratic Senator from Louisiana. Of course this is an unworthy consideration, one that no republican would think about, because we take loftier views of all these questions; we are exceedingly conscientious, and we prove our conscientiousness by voluntarily throwing the power into the hands of our enemies! Every vote given to reject Pinchback in its effect is to demoralize the republican party of Louisiana, and not only so, but it is a vote in effect to disturb the public peace and to bring about a renewal of those bloody scenes that have been taking place in the State of Louisiana. But I forget. Here is my distinguished and poetical friend from Kentucky, [Mr. MCCREERY,] whose tender and delicate organization revolts at all species of bloodshed, although he does delight to indulge in tales of republican fraud!

Mr. President, that is the first reason why the democratic party are solid against Mr. Pinchback in this body. There is another reason, and that is the effect to be produced by the rejection of Pinchback. Pinchback is thirty years old and more; he is a citizen of the United States and has always been. Therefore he has all the qualifications under the Constitution of the United States. If he is rejected by this body, it is because he was not elected by the Legislature of Louisiana. A vote to reject Pinchback is a vote against the legality of what is known as the Kellogg government in Louisiana. When the Senate shall have put itself into that attitude, I ask what is to be the condition of the Administration; and that is a question that the friends of the Administration might deign to think of. The next House of Representatives will be democratic. Among the very first resolutions to pass that body, I predict, will be a resolution recognizing McEnery as the governor of Louisiana, recognizing the McEnery government, and calling upon the President to recognize it; and if the Senate has in advance rejected the Kellogg government by refusing to receive a Senator elected by it, I ask what ground the President has left to stand upon? Our democratic friends understand that perfectly well; they understand the trap into which we are deliberately walking, and they smile complacently while we go forward in this path.

Mr. President, although this is a question that is above party, yet I sometimes think that our democratic friends, if they are honest in their convictions in regard to democracy, are right in casting their doubts in favor of their own party; and if republicans believe in republicanism, if they believe the supremacy of the republican party is essential to the peace and the prosperity of this country, they might well follow the example and cast their doubts, if they have them, in favor of their own party. But it is too late, I presume, to exhort republicans on that subject.

Now, Mr. President, I propose to review very briefly the history of Louisiana from 1866 to 1872 for the purpose of understanding what took place in Louisiana in December, 1872. In 1866 the republicans held a convention in the Mechanics' Institute in the city of New Orleans for the purpose of proposing amendments to the constitution of Louisiana. About two-thirds of the members of that convention were colored and one-third white. The purpose for which they assembled was peaceable and lawful. They were attacked by the police of the city, seconded by a part of the State authorities, aided by a mob, and over two hundred men were killed and wounded in less than twenty minutes; and for that atrocious massacre no man was ever punished. In 1868 Louisiana was reconstructed under an act of Congress. The first election was held in May under the protection and surveillance of an officer of the United States. It was a fair election. At that election State officers were chosen. The republicans carried the State by over 26,000 majority, it being confessedly a fair election. In November following the presidential election took place. At that time the Army of the United States had been withdrawn; there was no protection left; and in the mean time the Ku-Klux were organized, and within sixty days before the November election of 1868 over two thousand men were killed and wounded in that State on account of their politics, as shown by an investigating committee sent down there by the House of Representatives. The committee state that in their investigations they did not get much more than half over the State, and the evidence taken showed nearly two thousand men killed and wounded. What was the result? A reign of terror was produced; Seymour, the democratic candidate, carried the State by 42,000 majority—a change of 68,000 votes in less than five months. There was a reign of terror. In some parishes Grant did not get a vote; in others he got one; in others, five; in others, one hundred; where the republican candidates in the spring had received thousands of votes. In other words, Louisiana was a great slaughter-house in 1866 and in 1868, and republican blood was shed upon almost every plantation in that State.

In 1870 another election came on. At that time the Ku-Klux had to some extent been broken up, and the republicans again carried the State by over 20,000 majority. But in 1872 a change had come around. Warmoth was elected governor by the republicans in 1868—a young man of fine talents, of good character, and great promise; but he became connected with certain schemes and was charged with having been guilty of certain acts of corruption, so that he lost caste with the republican party, and he was sloughed in and in 1872 he went over to the democrats, and, although they had denounced him as the worst man living and no epithets had been too vile to be applied to Governor Warmoth, they received him as their leader; and the evidence in that volume, for which my friend from Michigan has such a supreme regard, the evidence which he says he read, shows that they made this bargain with Governor Warmoth: that he should manipulate the State, that he should carry it for the democrats, and they counted his control of the election machinery as being equal to 20,000 votes, and that he in return was to be sent by them to the Senate of the United States. There is the volume containing the evidence of this base contract between the leaders of the democratic party on the one hand and Governor Warmoth on the other, by which an acknowledged notorious majority in the State of Louisiana was to be overcome. Governor Warmoth under the law had the appointment of supervisors of election in every parish or county. They in turn had the appointment of all registrars and judges of the election in every precinct and in every city, and in that State the governor of the State held the whole election machinery in his hand. They acknowledged that equal to 20,000 votes, and the majority of that committee which some Senators have in such high regard reported that the control of the election was in their opinion equal to 20,000 votes.

The republicans went into that election knowing that they would be cheated, swindled, and outraged at every step, and the evidence shows that they were, that their worst anticipations were realized. The republicans had this dread. They believed if the power passed into the hands of the democratic party that their lives were not safe, that the scenes of 1868 and of 1866 would be renewed. With them it was a struggle for life. It was not simply a struggle for property, not simply a struggle for equal rights, but they were struggling for their lives, and they fought for their lives. They did many things in that election you and I would not justify in Indiana or New York or any other State, and cannot justify there, yet there were great circumstances of palliation. You must take into consideration the fact that they had been hunted like mad dogs from plantation to plantation, had been murdered at every step in every town and at every cross-roads. I have here the dispatch of General Sheridan in which he says the evidence before him shows from 1868 to 1872, or up to that time, there had been over thirty-five hundred men killed and wounded in the State of Louisiana on account of their politics. These men were chiefly colored; and yet my friend from Vermont this afternoon took the worst view for the republicans at every step of the argument that he made. I am bound to say in justice to him that I have never heard a democratic speech on this floor that was more one-sided and was more partisan in favor of the democracy than was the speech of my friend from Vermont. I regret it deeply, but I am bound to state my conviction in regard to it. Not one word did he have to say about the circumstances upon the other side, about the enormous frauds, the reign of terror, the killing, the stuffing of ballot-boxes, the forging of returns—these things referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE.] Not one word, so far as I remember, did he have to say in regard to those things.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I suggest to my honorable friend that he must have been unusually deaf then? And may I ask him also—he says he has not heard a better democratic speech—if he did not hear better ones when he used to make them himself? [Laughter.]

Mr. MORTON. I used to make democratic speeches, but the last one I made was in 1852. If I cannot get forgiveness for that after nearly twenty-three years I shall never expect it in this world. [Laughter.] If I am to have democratic speeches made in 1852—and that was the last time I ever made one—thrown in my face, what extenuation is to be made for a man who makes a democratic speech on this floor in 1875?

Mr. EDMUNDS. None at all; he does not ask any.

Mr. SARGENT. Especially by a republican.

Mr. MORTON. Especially by a republican, as the Senator says.

Now, Mr. President, those are the circumstances under which the election in Louisiana came about in 1872. The parties were not standing on equal terms by any means. Although the republicans had notoriously a majority in the State of 20,000 votes, yet the power had passed to the other side. A base and villainous contract had been made, and the republicans felt if they lost that election they were in danger of losing their lives. It was under those circumstances that Judge Durell interfered. I never justified the interference of Judge Durell. I know that more able lawyers than I am do, but I never could; yet I never could give to his motives that color that other men have. He interfered because it was well understood at that time that the mob of New Orleans inaugurated the McEnery government. He knew what would be the result of the election. We have been told in this Chamber that but for the Army of the United States McEnery would have been inaugurated, and that but for the Army of the United States the Kellogg government could not stand to-day. I grant it. I grant that the assassins of 1866, the assassins of 1868, the assassins of Coushatta, of Colfax, and of the 14th of September are there now, and they were there in December, 1872, and but for the interference of Federal power I have no doubt that they would have murdered any person attempting to inaugurate the Kellogg government. But does that change the right? Does that prove that McEnery was elected? Does that establish a legal claim? Does the fact that the white-leaguers would to-day overthrow Kellogg but for the presence of General Sheridan and the Army prove that Kellogg is in the wrong and McEnery is in the right? Yet that was the logic of my friend from Michigan, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY.] He placed great stress on the fact that but for the interference of the Federal authorities the McEnery government would have been inaugurated. How? By the same men who committed those murders on the streets of New Orleans on the 14th of September. By the same men who in cold blood murdered one hundred negroes at Colfax By the same men who in cold blood murdered those men at Coushatta who were trying to get out of the State, although they were law-abiding, peaceable citizens, and among the best that Louisiana had.

Durell interfered. He interfered in the presence of this great danger. You may say it was wrong in point of law; but that does not affect the question. If the Kellogg government had a right to be inaugurated had Durell interfered a thousand times it would not take away that right. Now, what did Durell do? He issued what was called the midnight order to allow no one to enter the State-house on the day that the Legislature was to be organized except those having certificates from the secretary of state that they were elected members of that body and had a right to take their seats. That is the law of Louisiana; it was then, is to-day, and has been ever since it has been a State. It is the law of every other State that those only who hold certificates have a right to take part in the organization of the Legislature. Let me suppose the case at Lansing, in Michigan. Suppose on the day that the Legislature was organized which elected my distinguished friend to membership in this body the district judge in that city had issued an order that no person except those having certificates of election should enter the State-house, but all such persons should be allowed to enter, and that the persons holding certificates did enter and organize the Legislature; I ask him if that would vitiate the organization? The district judge of the United States kept out all lobbyists, all outsiders, all claimants for seats, all spectators, but as long as he admitted those who held the certificates, who had a right to take part in the organization, that order, illegal as it might be, would not vitiate that organization; and that is the Durell case in New Orleans. He issued an order admitting those who had the certificates of election, those who by the laws of Louisiana had a right to take part in the proceedings, and nobody else. They went in and they organized the Legislature, and now to say that that order vitiated the organization it seems to me is an absurdity.

I wish to refer right here, before going further, to the argument of my friend from Michigan. First I will call the attention of the Senate to his statement that Pinchback was a party to the investigation before the committee in January and February, 1873. I ask the Clerk to get out the credentials of Mr. Pinchback and see when they were referred to the committee first.

The CHIEF CLERK. The credentials were read on the 21st of January, 1873; December 11, 1873, referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. MORTON. They were first referred to that committee in December, 1873, whereas the investigation before the committee had been concluded in February before of that year, nearly a year before that time. So far from Pinchback being a party to that investigation, he was subpœnaed as a witness. I, as chairman of the committee, had him subpœnaed. He had no power himself to subpœna a witness; he made no attempt to subpœna a witness. He had no power to employ counsel to argue the question; he was not a party to that proceeding in a legal sense any more than the Senator from Michigan was. But the Senator from Michigan says that the investigation was had and the prima facie case destroyed. I am going to quote his language:

> For illustration, take the strong presumption in favor of innocence in a criminal case. After evidence has been introduced tending strongly to prove guilt, and from which the jury might properly find a verdict of guilty, what would be thought of the judge who should hold and instruct the jury that, no matter how strong the evidence, or whatever it might be, they must disregard it, because the law presumes innocence, and they must act upon that presumption alone, and acquit.

I will suppose a case. Suppose a prisoner is placed upon trial and the evidence taken before a grand jury in an ex parte proceeding, to which he was not a party, where he had no power to subpœna witnesses, was laid before the jury on this trial and the court would instruct the jury that that evidence was sufficient to convict, what would be the name of that judge? You would call him monster and his name would be Jeffreys. That is this case. Here was a proceeding to which Pinchback was not a party, where he was only present a small part of the time, where he had no power to subpœna witnesses, was himself subpœnaed as a witness and came in consequence of that subpœna, and yet imperfect as this proceeding was, which in point of fact never was concluded for not one-half the witnesses subpœnaed were ever examined, we are told he is concluded by that report and that he is a party to it. I was astonished to hear this argument made in regard to Pinchback.

Now I want to call the attention of the Senate to another part of the argument of my friend from Michigan. Speaking of the effect of the judicial decisions of that State he said:

> The effect of the judicial decisions of that State upon the question of the de jure character of that government will be considered when we come to consider the nature and origin of that government.

I was very anxious to hear what my friend had to say. He having so long been upon the supreme bench of Michigan I thought he must have a high regard for the State judiciary, and that he would never strike a blow at its authority. I listened to what he should say afterward as to the effect of the decisions of the supreme court of Louisiana, and here is all he said:

> I do not myself see how the decisions of the Louisiana courts, constituting as they do only one branch of this government thus set up—

Having before said that the government was set up by the President—> can be any more binding upon us than the action of the pretended Legislature, whether these judges were in office under previous existing governments, or, as was the case here, judges had been thrust out and others put in their places for the purpose of securing the desired course of decision.

Here the Senator avoids the effect of the decisions of the supreme court of Louisiana by two statements: First, that the court was part of the government set up by the President. That was not true. The Senator was mistaken. The President never had anything to do with the courts of Louisiana. All that he had to do with and all that he recognized was the governor and the Legislature. The supreme court of Louisiana had been elected in 1868. They hold their offices for eight years. The title of that supreme court was never disputed. It was accepted by both parties. There never was any controversy in regard to the rightfulness of that court. Therefore when the Senator said that that court was set up by the President he was entirely mistaken; he had not read this volume of evidence with good effect.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I did not say that the court was set up by the President, but that it was a branch of the government which had been set up by the President.

Mr. MORTON. That is what the Senator says, a branch of the government which was set up by the President. The President did not set up the constitution of Louisiana; he did not set up the supreme court of Louisiana or any other court. All he had to do with was another branch of the government; but the Senator made the statement that this is part of the government set up by the President, and in that my friend was entirely mistaken.

Now I come to the remaining statement. The Senator said that the judges of this court had been thrust out and others put in their places for the purpose of obtaining proper decisions from them. In that he was entirely mistaken. The facts are just on the other side. There were four judges on that bench, by the constitution, elected in 1868. One of those judges resigned about the 1st of December, 1872, while Warmoth was still governor, before that Legislature ever assembled, before the returning board had made their count. This judge was not thrust out by anybody; he resigned, and the vacancy had to be filled. The vacancy was filled. Pinchback, as the acting governor, nominated his successor and he was confirmed by the senate. The question of the validity of that appointment came before the other three judges who had been elected in 1868. They decided that the appointment and confirmation were valid, and those four men are on the bench of Louisiana to-day. Why then did my friend say that these judges had been thrust out and others put in their places for the purpose of obtaining decisions? He was entirely mistaken. The Senator stated that the President in the first place had set up the Kellogg government, that he had established it without right and in defiance of the wishes of the majority of the people of that State; that the other ticket was elected, but that the President set up Kellogg and the Kellogg government, and that after that he recognized it, and therefore he merely recognized his own creation.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. If the Senator will allow me, I made no such assertion as that the other ticket was elected.

Mr. MORTON. I will see how near my friend came to it. I will read two extracts, for I do not intend to misrepresent him.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I said probably having a majority.

Mr. MORTON. I will see how near the Senator came to it. He said:

It did not obtain possession of the government for itself by its own acts, nor by the acts or the will of the people of Louisiana. Left to themselves and the people of the State, it is admitted on all hands Kellogg and his legislature could never have become a de facto government or a government of any kind; and it is perfectly evident from the testimony that McEnery and his legislature, which had more of the forms of regularity about it and probably the majority of votes, though reeking with fraud and not free from intimidation and force, would without Federal aid have obtained possession of the government and constituted the government de facto but for the interference of the Federal Executive. Kellogg and his legislature had never been in power. His legislature had not yet assembled by whom the votes for governor were to be counted; no organization of his government had taken place when the Federal Executive interposed by military force, on the alleged authority of an order from the United States district judge, which all parties, at least all jurists and lawyers except perhaps the Attorney-General if that constitutes an exception, admit to have been void, and placed the Kellogg government in power and kept it there. It was this, and this alone, which gave it inception, which placed and continued it in power, and gave it its entire and only character of a government de facto.

Now my friend said right in the conclusion of his speech:

I have but one more point to notice. It has been gravely urged here that, Louisiana being entitled to two Senators upon this floor, it is a wrong to the people of that State to refuse them the enjoyment of that right; and therefore we ought, in order to avoid this wrong to the people of that State, to admit Mr. Pinchback. Now, according to my reading of the evidence and according to the report made to this Senate in 1873 and those recently made to the House, the majority of the people of Louisiana are opposed to the Kellogg government and to Pinchback as their representative in the Senate; and they would, of course, prefer being unrepresented to being misrepresented; and are not, therefore, likely to complain of any special grievance arising from his rejection.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Will the Senator allow me one word on that last citation?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. In explanation to the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST,] who cited that yesterday, I said to him that the reference to the report of 1873 was an inadvertence. It was in no way important to the point which I there made as to the hardship of denying to the State of Louisiana two Senators upon this floor, inasmuch as the majority of the people of that State seemed to be opposed to the Kellogg government and to Mr. Pinchback. The materiality of the question of the majority related not to the past, but to the present and the future; and therefore it does not weaken my argument at all. As I said yesterday, the reference should have been to the majority and minority reports of the House committee of the recent session.

Mr. MORTON. The substance of the statements I have read from the speech of the Senator from Michigan is that a majority of the people of Louisiana were opposed to Kellogg as shown by the report in 1873, that the McEnery ticket was probably elected, and that to force Pinchback upon them as a Senator would be to force him against the will of the majority. Now I want to say to my friend that he was entirely mistaken in regard to the report. The majority of the committee never said that a majority of the people of Louisiana were opposed to Kellogg. On the contrary they said just the reverse.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Nor do I say that they did. I say that was an inadvertence in referring in that connection and at that point to the report of 1873 at all, as I had already stated yesterday.

Mr. MORTON. The report of the committee shows that a majority of the people of Louisiana were republicans. The committee expressly state that if the election had been fair, Kellogg would have been elected and the republican Legislature would have been elected. The committee recognized the fact that Louisiana was republican, and that but for the frauds at the election Kellogg and his colleagues would have been elected.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I admit that the committee so stated, and I thought I had twice already explained that the reference to the report of 1873 in that particular connection at that point was entirely irrelevant and that it was an inadvertence; but the point is equally good with that thrown out.

Mr. MORTON. My friend perhaps forgets that in a previous part of his speech he refers to that government having been set up by the President against the will of the majority of the people of Louisiana; and now that brings me to the point that I want to discuss for a few minutes.

First, I take it as an established fact by all the reports, the report of the Wheeler committee, the report of the committee of this body both majority and minority, that Louisiana was largely republican in 1872; that if Kellogg was not elected it was because of fraud; and therefore whoever insists upon McEnery's election insists upon a fraud. My friend from Vermont in 1873, two years ago, when we had this question up—I do not see him here just now—argued that McEnery must be recognized. He was a McEnery man then, and I think I had the pleasure of saying to him at that time that if he insisted upon McEnery's election he insisted upon an acknowledged fraud. If McEnery was elected, it was because the fraud was successful and 20,000 majority had been overcome by the fraudulent means resorted to. I say that majority was not overcome. I have believed, I think the evidence shows that Kellogg had an actual majority of the votes that went into the box.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The Senator does not understand me as maintaining that McEnery was elected?

Mr. MORTON. Well, sir, somebody was elected; that is very clear. I never knew an election at which somebody was not elected. If the Senator says McEnery was not elected, then I say Kellogg was elected. There is always more or less fraud, perhaps, at every general election. That does not vitiate the election. I thought the committee committed an error in saying that the election was a nullity. I believe that one of those two men was elected, that one of the two had a majority of the votes put into the box legally. I believe that Kellogg was the man from many circumstances. My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] has shown not only to-day but more particularly some four or five weeks ago, by a close calculation of the returns from the different parishes, as conclusively as mathematics can show it, that Kellogg had an actual majority of the votes that went into the box.

Mr. STEVENSON. May I ask my friend from Indiana where he derives his fact that the statement of the committee was that the Kellogg government had a majority?

Mr. MORTON. I did not say that.

Mr. STEVENSON. You said he would have been elected if there had been a fair election.

Mr. MORTON. The majority of the committee say that.

Mr. STEVENSON. The Senator is as much mistaken in his facts as he charges the Senator from Michigan with being. The committee say what I will read:

The people of the State are almost equally divided in sentiment in regard to these two pretended governments.

They do not express any opinion.

Mr. MORTON. "Sentiment in regard to two governments;" I do not know exactly what is meant by that; but I will read what they said about the election; that is more to the point:

A careful consideration of the testimony convinces us that, had the election of November last been fairly conducted and returned, Kellogg and his associates and a Legislature composed of the same political party would have been elected.

There is no misunderstanding what that means.

The colored population of that State outnumbers the white, and in the last election the colored voters were almost unanimous in their support of the republican ticket. Governor Warmoth, who was elected by the republicans of the State in 1868, had passed into opposition, and held in his hands the entire machinery of the election. He appointed the supervisors of registration, and they appointed the commissioners of election. The testimony shows a systematic purpose on the part of those conducting the election to throw every possible difficulty in the way of the colored voters in the matter of registration.

And yet there are a majority of colored men registered.

The polling places are not fixed by law, and at the last election they were purposely established by those conducting the election at places inconvenient of access in those parishes which were known to be largely republican, so that in some instances voters had to travel over twenty miles to reach the polls.

And, as was shown in testimony read by the Senator from Wisconsin to-day, the polling places were only fixed on the day before the election, so that it was impossible in many cases for the people to know where the election was to be held.

The election was generally conducted in quiet, and was, perhaps, unusually free from disturbance or riot.

Of course. That has been often referred to. The work had been done before; the reign of terror had been inaugurated for six years before that time. Louisiana was tranquil on that day. It was not necessary to use the pistol and the bowie-knife at the polls. The work had been accomplished before that time; and therefore the very quiet produced by terrorism has been quoted as a circumstance in favor of that election.

Governor Warmoth, who was the master-spirit in the whole proceeding, seems to have relied upon craft rather than violence to carry the State for McEnery. In the canvass of votes which determined the McEnery government to be elected the votes of several republican parishes were rejected.

Certainly; I forget now how many the Senator from Wisconsin showed had been thrown out, while on the other hand they counted seven parishes the returns of which were shown to be forgeries out and out.

The testimony shows that leading and sagacious politicians of the State, who were acting with Warmoth, entertained the opinion before the election that Warmoth's control of the election machinery was equivalent to 20,000 votes; and we are satisfied by the testimony that this opinion was well founded.

Yes, the testimony does show that fact.

We believe that had registration been accessible to all, and polling places been properly established, the result of the election would have been entirely different. And although we cannot approve of such a canvass as that made by the Lynch board, who seem to have acted upon the principle of "fighting the devil with fire" and circumventing fraud by fraud and cannot say that Kellogg's government was elected, nevertheless we believe that Kellogg's government was defeated and the popular voice reversed by the fraudulent manipulation of the election.

Under those circumstances and with that report from the committee, it seems to me that my friends ought to cast their doubts in favor of the republican party if they have no other evidence at all before them.

Mr. President, I wish to notice one or two other things that have been said. My friend from Michigan said that the President of the United States had set up this government in the first place, then recognized his own creation, thereby making it a mere naked usurpation on the part of Kellogg and his coadjutors. He put the President entirely in the wrong, with no possible apology or excuse for him; a clear, naked, indefensible usurpation from the beginning, first set up in fraud and violence and afterward acknowledged by craft. But my friend went on to say, and I thought he took very much of it back:

> But looking, as I think the facts show that he did, upon the government he had set up as merely temporary, until Congress should take the matter off his hands, and doubting, as I think he did, as to the validity of the Kellogg government, he did what a wise and true-hearted statesman should have done under the circumstances.

He says here that the President looked, as he thinks, upon the government he had set up as merely temporary. I should like to know where my friend got that idea. Where has he found the evidence that the President regarded that government as temporary?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. From the fact he immediately at the first opportunity called upon Congress to make provision for the case.

Mr. MORTON. He called upon Congress to pass on the question, but it was not because he regarded the government as temporary. He regarded it as permanent and lawful, and so declared upon every occasion; but the ultimate decision rested with Congress and he called upon Congress to decide the question, and Congress by failing to decide the question did indorse and ratify his decision.

And now I want to call the attention of the Senate for a moment to the action of the House of Representatives. The House of Representatives passed a resolution declaring Kellogg to be the governor of Louisiana. The House say he is governor. He cannot be anything more than governor; and if he is the governor, he cannot be anything less than the governor. When the House of Representatives say that Kellogg is and was the governor of Louisiana, they give to him every quality and official function that belongs to that office. It is wholly immaterial whether they say he is the governor de jure or the governor de facto. They say he is governor; that includes everything. When I speak of the President, I do not say he is the President de jure or the President de facto; I say he is the President. That means everything and carries every implication along with it. When the House said that Kellogg was the governor of Louisiana, it gave to him all the functions that belonged to the office of governor.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator observe the distinction between the phraseology of that resolution and that in which he suggested the propriety of recognizing him as "the lawful governor?" The Senator seemed to have some distinction between the phraseology of the House resolution and his own resolution that is lying on the table. Will the Senator be kind enough to enlighten me on that distinction?

Mr. MORTON. If Kellogg is the governor of Louisiana, the actual, veritable governor of that State, it is not material, so far as his acts are concerned, the validity of his certificate of Pinchback's election, or his signature to a bill, to inquire as to how he became governor. If he is the governor, then his certificate must have every effect that the certificate of any other governor can have.

Mr. DAWES. I did not understand the Senator as discussing that point at the moment I interrupted him, but discussing the phraseology of the House resolution as being entirely a resolution recognizing Kellogg as the lawful governor, and that it was not necessary to say that they recognized him as the lawful governor any more than it was necessary when we speak of the President to speak of him as the lawful President. It occurred to me that the Senator had not used any unnecessary words himself; and therefore I should like to have my point out, if there is any distinction between his own resolution and that passed by the House; and if there is no distinction, why the Senator was so particular as to insist upon the fact that we should recognize Mr. Kellogg as the lawful governor? I am quite willing to vote for the Senator's resolution if he will strike out that word "lawful," and if that has no force I think the Senator would not object to accommodating me.

Mr. MORTON. In point of fact and logic it amounts to nothing. The word "lawful" was simply put in to emphasize the question that had been in discussion before the country, and that was all; but when we declare Kellogg to be governor, we make it wholly unimportant as to the origin of his title. We declare him to be the governor, by which full effect and consideration are to be given to every act that he performs in the discharge of the duties of his office.

Mr. DAWES. I know the Senator will excuse me if I interrupt him again. It does not make any particular difference, I know, but the Senator is insisting upon a force and effect being given to the resolution adopted by the House of Representatives which I do not think the House intended to give. The House found a man acting as governor of Louisiana, discharging the functions of governor of Louisiana, under such circumstances that the House felt that it was better to recognize that fact than it would be to stop and inquire whether he came into that office rightfully or wrongfully; and therefore the House studiously left out the very word which the Senator from Indiana so studiously inserted in his resolution.

Mr. MORTON. I think it is very likely that word was left out to get votes for it, but I am speaking of the legal effect of it, and it is impossible for my friend from Massachusetts, with all his ability and acuteness, to show a distinction between the actual and veritable governor of Louisiana and the lawful governor of Louisiana.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will permit me, I supposed there was a difference sometimes between a governor de facto and a governor de jure, and that there might be such a thing as recognizing a governor de facto. I supposed that would be its effect sometimes. I supposed that was the effect when the Executive recognized a governor in Rhode Island. He did not stop to inquire whether he was governor de jure or governor de facto. He recognized, for the purposes for which he was authorized by the statute, one of two men claiming to be governor of that State. He recognized the de facto governor, the one who was in fact exercising the functions of governor. That is just what the House of Representatives did. They recognized Mr. Kellogg as the person discharging the duties incumbent upon the office, exercising the functions of governor, many of them believed rightfully, many of them believed wrongfully. All of them thought it was better to give him the moral force of a recognition as governor without stopping to say whether governor de facto or governor de jure. And to assert that they by saying they found him governor, acting as governor under such circumstances that they thought it best to recognize that fact, declared in their judgment that he was governor de jure is in my opinion to pervert the purposes and the meaning of the resolution of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MORTON. I think the Senate understand the Senator from Massachusetts and myself; and now I will pass from that point with this single observation: If my memory is not at fault with regard to the affair in Rhode Island his is. The President did not recognize the governor of Rhode Island as a governor de facto but he recognized him as the governor of Rhode Island, and the charter government was recognized as the government de jure not only by the President but by the Supreme Court of the United States, because the courts of the State had recognized that as the lawful government of the State. And now I pass from that decision to the authority of the decisions of the supreme court of the State.

My friend from Michigan disposed of the whole question of the authority of the courts by two statements, in both of which he was mistaken. I have referred to them. The Senator from Ohio undertook to dispose of it by an absolute denial and intimating that I was rusty in the profession, and I think I succeeded in convincing all who were present that he was the gentleman who was slightly rusty, because his statement was right in the face of the law. What was my statement? I call the attention of the Senate to it and to the authorities, because this is a vital point and one which has not been answered. I said:

> Let me ask this question: whether the Supreme Court of the United States have not decided in many cases that they will follow the decision of the supreme court of the State upon all questions arising under the constitution and laws of that State, and not involving any question arising under the laws or Constitution of the United States? If the question arises under the laws or Constitution of the United States, then the Supreme Court of the United States will not follow the decision of the court of the State, but will lay down the law for itself; but if it arises entirely under the law of the State or the constitution of the State, then the Supreme Court of the United States in all cases follows the decision of the supreme court of the State.

And now when the Senator from Vermont stood up here for an hour to-day and argued that the law creating the returning board in Louisiana was unconstitutional, it did seem to me that his position was a strange one—I will not say ridiculous—when it was right in the face of the decision of the supreme court of the State. There was a decision made by the court of Louisiana upon a statute of Louisiana, and I think that that lawyer must be a very able and a very distinguished lawyer, not living in the State, who will undertake to decide that the decision of the supreme court of a State upon a statute of that State is wrong when he himself is not familiar with the body of the law of that State. Very much depends upon that. The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Luther vs. Borden had decided that question squarely. They had said in so many words that upon any question arising upon the constitution and laws of the State the Supreme Court of the United States would follow in all cases and were bound to follow the decision of the State courts. If it was a question arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States or a question arising upon the law merchant, a body of general law that does not apply to any particular State but belongs to the whole commercial world, then the Supreme Court of the United States would not be bound to follow the decision of a State court; but if it is a question arising upon the constitution of the State or the laws of the State, then they say in so many words that the Supreme Court must follow the decision of the courts of the State.

> Upon such a question the courts of the United States are bound to follow the decisions of the State tribunals, and must therefore regard the charter government as the lawful and established government during the time of this contest.

That is the substance of it; and I have a decision in 16 Wallace in which they lay down the same doctrine:

> It is undoubtedly true, in general, that this court does follow the decisions of the highest courts of the States respecting local questions peculiar to themselves, or respecting the construction of their own constitutions and laws.

The case referred to by the Senator to-day was a case where a municipal corporation created by the Legislature of Michigan had issued bonds that were held by the people of another State and suit was brought in the courts of the United States to enforce payment of the bonds. There the bonds were held to be valid by the courts of Michigan at the time they were issued, but afterward the supreme court of that State decided that the Legislature had no right to authorize that corporation to issue those bonds. The Supreme Court of the United States said that that was covered by the constitutional provision that no State should pass a law impairing the obligation of a contract.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The case to which the Senator refers did not come up from the supreme court of Michigan.

Mr. MORTON. I understood that it did.

Mr. EDMUNDS. O, no; it was an action by a citizen of another State brought under the citizen clause.

Mr. MORTON. I did not mean to say that it came from the supreme court of Michigan; the suit was commenced in the courts of the United States; but the decision relied upon to defeat the claim was made by the supreme court of the State, and the Supreme Court of the United States held that at the time the bonds were issued that law was held to be constitutional in Michigan, and therefore the supreme court of that State could not afterward reverse its decision so as to impair that contract. That decision was made under the Constitution of the United States. But in the same decision and in all of these cases the Supreme Court say that the decisions of the State courts made upon questions arising on the constitution and laws of the State and not involving questions under the Constitution of the United States will be followed in all cases, and that the courts of the United States are bound to follow them.

Now the question whether that returning board was lawful was a question arising upon the laws of Louisiana. It was not a general question; it was not a question arising under the Constitution of the United States, and the Supreme Court of the United States would be bound to follow it and we would in duty be bound to follow it. And so with regard to who constituted the Legislature, the supreme court of Louisiana said the Kellogg legislature is lawful. They had a right to pass upon that question. They were called upon to pass on that question. They said that Kellogg was governor; they had a right to pass upon that. It was a question depending upon the laws of Louisiana as to who had been elected under the laws of that State, and it was a proper question for that court to pass upon; and when that court did pass upon it, all the courts of the United States are bound by it and the Senate is bound by it.

Mr. President, I intend to bring this question down to as practical a point as I can. In what respect does this case differ from any other question of a fraudulent election? In 1868, to refer to a familiar case, the governor of New York was elected by a monstrous fraud. It was a patent fraud. Everybody in the United States understood that it was a fraud, that Hoffman was elected by regiments of repeaters in the city of New York who marched from poll to poll the whole day long. He was not elected the governor of New York, but he was counted in by the State authorities. The returning board of New York, those officers who had the power to count the votes, counted Hoffman in as governor; and yet the whole country knew that he was not elected. But those tribunals provided by the State to determine who were elected State officers decided that Hoffman was elected, and that was the end of the question. We had no right to inquire about it here; we were bound to receive him because the tribunals of New York received him.

What is the difference between that case and Kellogg's? If I were to admit—which I do not, for I deny it—that Kellogg had not been elected but had been counted in by the tribunals of Louisiana, I ask how you can get at him any more than you could in New York? I lay down this general doctrine, that as to all State elections, from the highest to the lowest, the questions of their election must be decided and determined by their own tribunals, because if they are not Congress may interfere and overturn the election in every State; Congress may be regarded as a canvassing and returning board for all State officers; and that would be the end of State authority and it would be the end of the State governments.

The attempt to get clear of State authority on the part of the Senator from Michigan was an utter failure; upon the part of the Senator from Ohio he was simply mistaken, entirely wrong in regard to the law; and I state now once for all, and I leave it right here, that the question as to whether that returning board in Louisiana was lawful was a question to be decided by the courts of that State, and when they decided it the decision is to be accepted as lawful by every other authority in the United States; and what is true in regard to Louisiana is true in regard to North Carolina and every other State in this Union. And when the courts of that State have recognized a certain Legislature as the lawful Legislature and have enforced the laws enacted by that Legislature, that is the end of that question. Every other State in this Union and every other department of this Government is bound to accept that as the Legislature of that State; and so with regard to the governor and with regard to every other officer. If there be a wrong, it is back at the polls where you cannot get to it. I venture to say that there has not been a Legislature assembled in this country in years in which there was not some member who was not lawfully elected. Even in the good old land of steady habits, Connecticut, I have no doubt that almost every Legislature contains somebody who has no business there, but he is counted in, and the legislative body is the exclusive judge of his election and qualification, and we cannot inquire about it. Take the case of my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON.] I do not know what his majority was, whether it was large or small; but suppose when he came here with his certificate and walked up to be sworn some Senator had got up and presented a memorial numerously signed by the people of that State stating that a number of the members of the Legislature equal to his entire majority had been elected by fraud, that they had no business there, and praying the Senate to refer his credentials to the committee and that he should not take his seat until the question had been examined, what would have been his answer? What would have been the answer of every democratic Senator on this floor, ay, and of every republican Senator too? The answer would have been, that although those men may have been elected by fraud, his entire majority, without whose votes he would not have been elected, yet that the Legislature of Connecticut was the exclusive judge upon that subject; we could not inquire into it; and he would have been sworn and would have taken his seat.

That was the answer in the Goldthwaite case precisely. There the memorial came up at the same time with the credentials, saying that the majority that Goldthwaite had was fradulent, that the men who gave him that majority had no right to seats in the Legislature of Alabama, and what did we say? We said that was a question to be determined by the Legislature of Alabama, and we could not inquire into it whether those individual members had been elected or not. What is good for Alabama is good for Louisiana. If there were members in the Louisiana Legislature who were not elected, the same rule applies to them. Each house was the judge of the election and qualification of its own members. You are trying to apply a law to Louisiana that you refused to apply to Connecticut and Alabama. You are trying to apply a law to Louisiana that has never been applied to any State in this Union before, and the rejection of Pinchback involves the trampling under foot of every law by which this body has been properly organized.

Mr. EATON. The Senator addressed me as the Senator from Connecticut. Do I understand him to say that the action of the Senate here would have reference simply to my taking my seat? Does he mean to say that prima facie I present a case, or does he mean to say that the Senate would not inquire into those alleged frauds thereafter?

Mr. MORTON. I mean to say both. I mean to say in the first place that he has the certificate of the governor, a man acknowledged to be governor of Connecticut, and he is entitled to take his seat and the investigation shall be made afterward.

Mr. EATON. I agree.

Mr. MORTON. But if it should turn out afterward on proof that the men constituting or composing his majority were fraudulently in the Legislature of Connecticut, still we could not go into it, we could not unseat them, we could not turn him out on that account. That is the precise case of Goldthwaite, the very question determined there.

Mr. EATON. I simply wanted to get the Senator's opinion, and not to express my own. Therefore a man may be elected by fraud; it may be proved that he had himself in his own Legislature twenty fraudulent votes, and this Senate would not unseat that man! I understand that to be the doctrine of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MORTON. If he procured his election by fraud, if he bought those men, hired them to vote for him, or procured them in some fraudulent way to vote for him, then the Senate could take cognizance of it and turn him out; but the question as to whether those men got into the Legislature by fraud, whether they had a majority of the votes at the polls, is a question that the Senate never did examine and I undertake to say never will. On the contrary we expressly refused in the Goldthwaite case to go into that question, and said we had no right to do so; and when our democratic friends insist that that question shall be inquired into in Louisiana, they are insisting upon a rule that was never applied to any other State in this Union.

Mr. President, in conclusion I will briefly recapitulate the points. First, the Kellogg government has been the actual government of Louisiana now for two years and two months. The Legislature of Louisiana that elected Pinchback enacted more than two hundred laws, which are the laws of Louisiana to-day, enforced by all the courts. The highest court of the State has recognized Kellogg as governor and the Legislature as the true Legislature of Louisiana, and the district court of the United States has recognized that government as being the lawful government. The President has recognized it by authority of the statute of 1795; and the House of Representatives has recognized it in the manner that I have already spoken of. It is covered by all the forms of law that any State government in this Union has, and I believe it is covered by right. If Kellogg is not governor, if that Legislature was not elected, it was because of the success of a monstrous fraud. Those who want to go in search of doubts can find them. People who go to hunt ghosts always find them, and those who start out to hunt doubts can usually find them. But I take this question broadly; I look at the actual condition of Louisiana and all the surroundings, and I would say, independent of technical evidence, that the Kellogg government was the lawful government of that State. Kellogg to-day represents a majority of 20,000 men in Louisiana. The Kellogg government represents a like majority in that State, because the sentiments of that people have not been changed. Take the State of Vermont, that has no democratic party scarcely. Suppose by fraud or by violence a democratic State government should be forced upon Vermont, would we not all pronounce it a fraud? Take Kentucky; suppose by such means a republican government should be enforced upon Kentucky when everybody knows that Kentucky has a democratic majority of 25,000 or 40,000 votes. Every presumption is against it. Every doubt ought to be cast in favor of the 20,000 majority; every doubt ought to be cast in favor of right and not in favor of wrong. I have thought it strange that distinguished Senators should go in search of doubts for the purpose of sustaining the monstrous fraud that was attempted in Louisiana in 1872.

Sir, the people of Louisiana and the colored people have much to contend with. They have lived with their lives in their hands. They have been murdered by the thousand simply because of their opinions. They have called for and have received the protection of the Government of the United States, and yet they are to be hunted down here, every act is to be examined critically, and every presumption is to be against them. Sir, my heart revolts at it. It is not common justice; I will not say it is not common decency.

Then, Mr. President, if we shall disturb this relation, if we shall bring on fresh tumults down there, the responsibility will be our own. I prefer that we shall act consistently. We have sustained that government for two years, and, as was said by the Senator from Illinois a while ago, it is either the one or the other. The Senator from Vermont two years ago was in favor of seating McEnery. He thought McEnery was entitled to it then.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know that I ought to interrupt the Senator, because his misstatements about me are not greater in this particular instance than in some others; but if he will be good enough to look in the Globe or the RECORD, he will find that he grievously misstates what I said.

Mr. MORTON. I think not. I think the Senator took that ground two years ago, and he took ground directly opposite to what he took to-day in regard to the authority of the tribunals of that State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the Senator would offer a little proof on that subject.

Mr. MORTON. I think I can without hunting a great way either.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator said in the debate two years ago, although he did not vote:

> The constitution of Louisiana has declared that in a certain way, by its tribunals and not by us, it shall be ascertained, not upon the report of this committee, not upon our judgment, (we are neither judges nor jurors,) who is the true governor and who ought to be. Whatever, therefore, I may believe as to the truth, my Constitution and the constitution of Louisiana tell me, as I understand them, that I have no business to act upon my belief. There is the difference. I am not the judge.

The Senator then recognized the State tribunals. He did not to-day. Now I will ask the Clerk to read what I send up. The Senator said so many things that it is hard to keep pace with them all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You can probably keep pace with one at a time.

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir. The Senator in one place expressly said that we had no power to make returns and that McEnery must be received. That is my recollection of what he said.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, but I prefer to be tried on the record rather than on the Senator's recollection, if I am on trial.

Mr. MORTON. You are entitled to the record. You will get enough of it hereafter, I have no doubt. I have come across a passage and I think it is not the strongest one by any means, because the book is full of what the Senator said for about forty-eight hours, I will ask the Secretary to read, commencing on page 1876 of the Globe, to where I have marked on the next page.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> I think we are obliged upon the evidence that we have to determine, as he agrees, either that we must allow the Kellogg government to go on and stand by it as the final and lawful government of that State, so far as the United States are concerned, or we must determine that it has been set up by us and not by the people of that State, and give to the other party who on the face of the returns appears to have been elected the office until by the proper process of law in that State, if he is not really entitled to it, it shall be determined that some other person is. I think that the more we look at it the better we shall be satisfied that there are less evils and less dangers in declaring one way or the other that the people of that State having had an election according to the forms of their law must have prima facie elected somebody to be their chief magistrate. If we say that, as it appears to me we must, then the question is who prima facie has been elected?
> The report of the committee, Mr. President, seems to demonstrate, if the facts they state are warranted by the evidence, and I must suppose that they are, that according to the forms of the law of Louisiana—I am not now speaking of realities—that according to the returns which the law required to be made up in the various parishes and to be transmitted to the seat of government, Mr. McEnery appeared to be elected governor; and according to the constitution and the laws of that State, as I read them, no returning board, even if it were a constitutional and a rightful one, had the authority to make any man elected who did not appear to be in any other way than by rejecting returns which, upon certain specific evidence which the law points out, appear to them to be irregular or fraudulent, or appear to them not to represent the real voice of a given parish upon certain grounds of fraud and violence that are to be proved in a particular way.
> Now, then, I understand from the statements in the majority report and from the evidence that guided by that rule these returns would show that McEnery is elected. I do not say, Mr. President—I carefully abstain from saying that they show what the truth really is, but that on the face of the papers rejecting irregularities and acting upon these returns precisely as the lawful board by the laws of Louisiana was bound to do, it would appear that this man was the governor of that State, and then the law goes on to provide for contesting the right of any person who is thus elected prima facie, and I am now using the very word of the law, that their certificates shall be prima facie evidence that the party thus appearing to be elected is elected.
> The law goes on to provide that a contest may be made. Not a contest here, Mr. President, in this tribunal; not a contest at the office of the Chief Magistrate of the nation or at the office of his Attorney-General, but a contest in the tribunal of the State which all acknowledge to be authorized to administer its own affairs. That is the contest which the constitution and the laws of Louisiana point out as the means of ascertaining who in truth is entitled to a given office after, upon returns made in a particular way and certified as an act of administration in a particular way, it has appeared that a particular man is entitled to it, although he may not be if, when the proof comes to be taken in the tribunal and under the methods provided by the State law, it appears that he has not received the majority of the votes.

Mr. MORTON. That is enough. I think there is a good deal more to the same effect; it is not necessary however to take time to read it. That shows what the Senator's position was at that time; that he recognized the authority of the State tribunals alone to decide and settle the question, and so do I.

Mr. EDMUNDS. To decide and settle what question?

Mr. MORTON. As to who was elected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As to who was elected to what?

Mr. MORTON. Elected to the office of governor and any other office in the Louisiana State government?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Ah, the Senator has imported into what I said precisely the difference between falsehood and truth.

Mr. MORTON. No, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not speak of falsehood in any application to him, but between the truth and its opposite. The right, as I stated to-day, of a particular officer who claimed a title under the law to an office, to be tried by the courts, nobody ever disputed; but the right of any court to try who are the members of a Legislature or who compose it, is quite a different question; and if the Senator is as astute in reading what I said as he is in stating his own points, he cannot fail to see the difference.

Mr. MORTON. Well, Mr. President, one word upon that point. The supreme court of Louisiana in one case where the issue was made by a contending party, that the statute relied upon by the plaintiff was not enacted by the Legislature of Louisiana, where the issue was directly made, said they were bound to take notice whether it was enacted by the Legislature of Louisiana; and so I say that in that case the supreme court could take notice and were bound to take notice whether that statute was made by the Legislature or not. If an act of Congress comes in question in the Supreme Court of the United States, that court will be called upon to say whether that statute was enacted by Congress or by some other body pretending to be the Congress of the United States. The issue is raised, and they cannot help but decide it. That was the precise condition of the supreme court of Louisiana, and they did decide it over and over again under circumstances where they could not avoid the issue. But they said this: they said that while they could decide what body was the Legislature, they could not decide as to the title of any particular member of that body, and so say I, because the Legislature itself must decide that question; and while this Senate, acting in that capacity, must decide whether the Legislature of Louisiana has elected a Senator, they will follow the supreme court of the State in saying they cannot decide on the title of any particular member of that body, because each house has that power itself. The supreme court of Louisiana therefore simply exercised the jurisdiction that belongs to the supreme court of every State under circumstances where they were compelled to decide it. My friend from Vermont on the night of that debate argued truly, and I agreed with him, and in one little speech that I made I stated my gratification at the agreement, that the decision of all these questions must be referred to the tribunals of Louisiana. He was right then; he is not right now. Instead of having improved in two years, he has grown worse so far as that question is concerned. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I have detained the Senate longer than I intended. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, according to the understanding this debate cannot be prolonged, and I do not rise for that purpose; but I rise to make a proposition that I trust will be acceptable to a majority of the Senators here. The debate for the past two days has developed such a variety and contrariety of opinion on the part of a number of Senators on this side of the Chamber, that I am not willing to submit the claims of my colleague to the test of a vote at the present time.

To the Senators who have recently come among us I beg to express my indebtedness for the courteous attention with which they have listened to this debate. By that attention they have manifested an interest in this matter, and I know that many of them hesitate and express a great reluctance at being called upon to decide it now. I know that many of them will refrain from voting, and through an adverse decision give the power to the political opponents of the claimant on the present occasion. I would therefore move the postponement of this question until the second Monday of December next, and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, we have been told again and again that the public interests and the peace of Louisiana require that this question should be settled and settled now. The greater portion of the time of this special session of the Senate has been taken up with the discussion of this question. The members of the Senate will be the same on the second Monday of next December as now. This question can never be more fully discussed than it has been; and I think for one, with those who have kept us here upon this question, that it is better to have it settled at once. I therefore for one shall vote against the motion to postpone it until December next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to postpone until the second Monday of December next, upon which the yeas and nays have been asked.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LOGAN. There seems to be some kind of arrangement about this matter; at least I presume so. I like to vote with my friends always, but I want to give them warning now that postponement of action on the Kellogg government is fraught with danger to this country. My judgment is that a decision one way or the other is better for the country than a postponement.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. DENNIS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT.] If he were here he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay" on this motion.

Mr. EATON, (when the name of Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut, was called.) My colleague [Mr. FERRY] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] I notice that Mr. CAMERON has voted, but I suppose unintentionally.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. No; I voted intentionally. I am paired with Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut, on the vote upon the admission or non-admission of Mr. Pinchback.

Mr. EATON. The gentleman will settle that with his own judgment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll-call will proceed.

The Secretary continued and concluded the roll-call.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. WADLEIGH,] who is absent. I hardly know how he would vote on this question, but I will not vote.

Mr. LOGAN. Before the vote is announced I wish to say that I withhold my vote for the reason that I do not like to vote against my friends, but I think they are making a great mistake.

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Dawes, Dorsey, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, West, and Windom—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Caperton, Christiancy, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hitchcock, Johnson of Tennessee, Johnston of Virginia, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Conkling, Dennis, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Logan, Robertson, Wadleigh, and Wright—9.

So the motion to postpone was agreed to.

PRESIDENT'S ACTION IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate approve the action heretofore taken by the President of the United States in protecting Louisiana from domestic violence, and are of opinion that he should continue to recognize in that State the existing State government.

Mr. BAYARD. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The consideration of the resolution is objected to, and it will go over under the rule.

Mr. NORWOOD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at eleven o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

EMIGRATION TO THE BLACK HILLS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

I have the honor to transmit herewith communications from the Secretaries of War and the Interior, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 15th instant, requesting "any information in my possession in regard to the proposed emigration to the Black Hills country in the Sioux Indian reservation; whether such emigration is with the consent of the Indian tribes holding said country under the treaty of February 24, 1869, and if not, what measures will be taken in relation to the same."

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 18, 1875.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REORGANIZATION OF CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask that the resolution which I submitted yesterday for instruction of a committee be taken up for consideration.

Mr. DAVIS. What is the resolution?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the special committee appointed to examine the several branches of the civil service, with a view to a reorganization of the several departments thereof, be authorized to sit during the recess of the Senate, to employ a stenographer, to administer oaths, and to send for persons and papers.

Mr. DAVIS. What committee does this resolution relate to?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will ask the Secretary to read the resolution of the Senate of the 20th of February to which this resolution relates.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five members of the Senate be appointed, whose duty it shall be to examine and thoroughly investigate the several branches of the civil service with a view to the reorganization of the several departments thereof, the reduction of expenditures, and to promote the efficiency of such service, and to report thereon at the next session of Congress by bill or otherwise.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is that resolution in order under the rules of the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Chief Clerk again read the resolution of Mr. BOUTWELL.

Mr. STEVENSON. I raise the question of order on that resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit the question to the Senate, Shall the resolution be entertained?

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, if I can have the attention of the Senator who raised this point of order, I should like to make a remark, rather in the nature of appeal to him than in the nature of argument. I suppose the question of order to be not well taken to a resolution of inquiry; but I waive that and say to the Senator from Kentucky that if he be interested, as I know him well enough to believe he is, in any information calculated to improve the public administration, the objection he now makes stands in the way of such an attempt. The committee as constituted now is entirely powerless. Whether it would have the right to meet at all or not, I do not know. Assuming that it would, it would have no power to call for a copy of a paper, to request the attendance of any person, to administer any oath, to make any record of its doings. The purpose of this resolution is simply to authorize the committee, or the chairman, to employ some man, when it meets, to make record of what the committee gathers and of the testimony it takes, and to administer oaths. In short, the purpose is to give effect to a resolution, not very well considered, which passed at the last session, and which in the judgment of the committee leaves the committee, as it stands now, entirely powerless, impotent to do anything at all. Although I rose in the absence of the chairman, not observing at the moment who was attending to this matter, I say, subject to his correction, that my understanding is that the committee would consider a refusal to pass this resolution equivalent to an instruction or intimation of the Senate that the committee was not expected to go on and do the things which alone can be done by the aid of such a permission. If I am wrong in that regard, I beg the chairman to correct me. It is a matter with which I have nothing to do except that I met with the committee and I rose, thinking that the chairman was not here; but as I see he is here, it is of course becoming in me to leave to him any further suggestion which there may be in regard to it.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not wish to throw any obstacle in the way of any investigation contemplated by a committee of the Senate. If this was so important a matter, it ought to have been attended to during the legislative session of the Senate. We have already decided at this present session that a resolution to raise a committee of inquiry is not in order. That ruling, if I remember, was by a vote of yeas and nays. I have no particular opposition to this inquiry; still less do I desire to throw any obstacle in the way of this committee; but I cannot consent, with my name recorded against a resolution proposing to send a committee to the Indian country and to inquire into its condition, to vote for this resolution, because I think if one is out of order the other is. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr.

CLAYTON] offered a resolution which he thought highly important to the interests of the Indians and to the interest of the country. This resolution proposes the same thing. Why should I vote against his and vote for this? I have nothing more to say.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I tried to get the ear of the Senator from Kentucky, for I think he is laboring under a misapprehension of facts. I do not understand that the Senate has decided at the present session, or at any other time, that it has not the power to pass such a resolution. I expressly said when the resolution offered by the Senator from Arkansas was before the Senate that I should vote against it because I was opposed to the resolution, protesting at the same time that the Senate certainly had the power; and it was decided by laying the resolution on the table, without any indication on the part of the Senate that they adjudged that the Senate had not the power to pass such a resolution.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The committee has not asked for this authority because the committee desires it, but because it seemed to the committee impossible to perform the duties imposed by the resolution of the 20th of February unless this authority were given, and it is quite evident from the resolution which has been read from the Clerk's desk that the committee will be powerless to make these investigations.

I am for myself quite indifferent as to the fate of the resolution now before the Senate. It is not, except in the line of my duty, at all desirable for me to perform this service, as far as I am concerned in its performance. The Senate will judge whether it is better to have it undertaken during the recess or to have the business postponed until the next regular session of the Senate.

If the point of order is to be pressed upon the Senate, as I hope it will not be pressed, I cannot doubt that the judgment of the Senate will overrule the point of order upon the ground stated by the Senator from New Jersey, that it was not well taken upon the resolution which ultimately was laid upon the table without the judgment of the Senate upon the point of order. But if that point of order had been well taken, it would not apply to the resolution now before the Senate, because this is not a proposition to initiate any new business, to enter upon any new undertaking whatever, but merely to give to an existing committee of the Senate power to sit during the recess of the Senate.

I hope the Senator from Kentucky will not press the point of order. This resolution came from a committee of which the colleague of the Senator was a member, and I believe by the general consent of the committee; and the reason I have to offer for not asking the authority of the Senate upon this resolution during the regular session is this: The resolution itself was not adopted until the 20th of February, and we were then in the hurry of business, every member of the Senate engaged at every reasonable hour, and I did not therefore call the special committee together for the consideration of this duty until the present session of the Senate when there was more leisure for the work.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the question can be now taken I have no objection to make; but if not, I would suggest that this matter can be taken up subsequently just as well as now. Senators are aware that at three o'clock to-day there is an agreement of the Senate to vote upon a certain question, and it is also probably presumable that that time will be required upon the subject upon which we are to vote. I therefore submit the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the Senator withdraw that motion a moment? I withdraw the question of order.

Mr. HAMLIN. Very well.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President——

Mr. HAMLIN. If Senators are going to talk, I do not withdraw my motion.

Mr. CLAYTON. Allow me to make a few remarks.

Mr. HAMLIN. No.

Mr. CLAYTON. I want to inquire as to the position of the point of order.

Mr. HAMLIN. If there is going to be a discussion, I insist on my motion. I do think, in justice to Senators——

Mr. CLAYTON. If the Senator desires to press his motion, very well.

Mr. HAMLIN. This can come up at another time.

Mr. CLAYTON. Very well.

Mr. HAMLIN. I insist on my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

IN SENATE.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PRESIDENT'S ACTION IN LOUISIANA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Resolutions are now in order.

Mr. ANTHONY. If there be no morning business, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] relative to the condition of Louisiana.

Mr. BAYARD. I propose to raise a question of order upon the reception of that resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. BAYARD. My point of order is that the resolution offered by the Senator from New Jersey, if not legislative in its character, is equivalent to legislation. It is intended to have legislative effect, and is not therefore consonant to the object of this special session of the Senate. This special session of the Senate was called by the President of the United States as an executive session for the purpose of considering such nominations as he might see fit to lay before it and for the performance of its constitutional duty in relation to such treaties as he might propose for its concurrence. Both of those duties have been very nearly, if not quite, fulfilled. I understood that upon a resolution sent to the Executive, I think yesterday or the day before, announcing that the Vice-President had retired from the Senate for the remainder of the session and that the honorable Senator who now occupies the chair had been elected President pro tempore of the Senate, a communication had been received from the President that he had no further business to lay before the Senate. Therefore so far as our action in confirming or rejecting such nominations as he might see fit to make for office is concerned, our duties are at an end with the exception of such as may remain on the Calendar for disposition. The business connected with treaties with foreign nations, I may also say, I believe has received the full attention of the Senate and there is nothing more of that kind to be disposed of.

There is also that character of business which the Senate as a separate body can exclusively and solely perform in connection with the privilege of membership with this body; and we did, under the direction of the majority, proceed at great length to consider the election, the qualifications, and the return of a person claiming a seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Louisiana, and after a full and most deliberate and prolonged consideration of that case, as we were approaching a decisive vote, when the length of time further to be occupied by the Senate was to be considered by minutes and not by hours, it pleased the majority of the Senate to entertain a motion for postponement to a day certain in December; and that question, undeniably committed to the sole consideration of the Senate and for which this session was most properly called, and in regard to which it most properly proceeded to act, has been taken from us by the will of the majority and sent over to the ensuing session of Congress.

Mr. President, the only question which the Senate of the United States can take sole and separate cognizance of as a body of Congress in relation to the State of Louisiana was the admission of a claimant from that State to a seat as a Senator upon this floor. If this resolution offered by the Senator from New Jersey has any significance at all, if it is to be anything more than the expression of the opinion of some thirty-five or forty gentlemen citizens of the United States, it is because it has connection with the privilege of membership in this body, and that question the Senate has relegated to the next session of Congress.

Now, under what theory, under what rule of order can this be considered the business of an executive session, or business connected with the privileges of this body of which we are the sole and exclusive judges?

The Senate has at this session by a yea and nay vote laid on the table propositions that simply looked to the basis of future legislation. It has after deliberate debate refused to entertain a resolution looking to the raising of a committee, a committee of this body and not a joint committee, to inquire during the recess of Congress into the condition of affairs of the Indian country with a view to report at the next session. That looked to legislation. It looked to an action which the Senate could not complete without the concurrence of the other House of Congress and the Executive. It was, I take it, for that reason that the Senate refused to consider that resolution, and said in debate and by the result of a formal vote that they could not at this session properly consider business in the effectuation of which the action of another House of Congress and the Executive might become and would become necessary.

In the present case, what is there in the opinion of the Senate, in the approval of the Senate of something that has taken place in respect of the action of the executive department of the Government in the State of Louisiana, that can have legal or binding effect of any kind?

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York rises to a question of order, which he will state.

Mr. CONKLING. I dislike to interrupt the honorable Senator from Delaware; but I submit as a point of order that he having raised the question whether this resolution may be received or not, no decision having been made, and no appeal having been taken, the debate in which the Senator is indulging is out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will answer the Senator from New York. The Senator from Delaware has not made the point of reception. The Senator from Delaware made a point on the merits of the question whether the Senate will now consider it, and the Chair asked the Senator from Delaware to state his point of order and the Chair understood that he was now stating it. The Chair is not at liberty to check a Senator in making his statement of a point of order; but if the Senator from New York thinks he is indulging in debate the Chair will rule on that question. The Chair thinks that the Senator from Delaware has extended his statement of the case perhaps beyond the ordinary statement of a point of order, but he will not make the point unless the Senator from New York insists on it.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President——

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will pardon me one moment, this is my point: If the Senator from Delaware is objecting to the reception of the resolution on its merits and debating it, my suggestion does not apply; but if the Senator from Delaware raises a point of order that the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island is not in order, then my point is that he must state his point. If the Chair submits it to the Senate, debate is in order. If the Chair rules upon it, an appeal can be taken and then debate may be in order; but first of all the Senator must state his point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair replies that the Chair was not aware of the precise point of order, and the Chair was listening for the Senator from Delaware to make the point of order. The Chair is ready to rule on it at any time when the Senator has stated the case.

Mr. BAYARD. My object was not simply to proceed in accordance with the technical rules of debate in this body, but to proceed in accordance with the orderly rules of debate in this body. The motion for the consideration of this question I proposed to meet upon its threshold, and that was to raise the question of order; and, as the Chair very properly stated just now, my statement was not as succinct, as laconic as I might have desired, simply because I had not that preparation in regard to the matter which would have shortened it. I was not proceeding to the merits of this question. I believe upon an examination of what I said all that I have said will be found to be but a lengthened method of stating a point of order the reasons of which accompany the statement.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator from Delaware will allow me, I was under the impression that this resolution had already been received.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was waiting until the Senator from Delaware, as he suggested before, had stated his point of order. If the Senator from Delaware makes the point of order that this is legislation, the Chair will overrule it at once for the resolution has been received by the Senate, and that lies with the Senate. The question cannot now be taken on its reception, for the Senate have already received the resolution and placed it on the Calendar. The question now before the Senate is, will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution? The merits of the resolution, whether it be legislative or otherwise, lie with the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. Do I understand the Chair to state that it is too late to raise the question of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is too late to raise a point of order on the reception of a resolution which has already been received by the Senate, printed, and placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BAYARD. My impression was that the resolution was read and objected to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed by the Secretary that it was received without objection and laid over.

Mr. BAYARD. As I was the person who made the objection, I will state my recollection of the facts. The Senator from New Jersey offered the resolution; I said "Let it lie over," and it did lie over; it was never brought before the Senate; and I think the RECORD will disclose that fact. The resolution was offered by the Senator from New Jersey a few days ago, and as he offered it I objected to its reception and it never has been received that I know of. I said "Let it lie over." I think a reference to the RECORD will disclose that fact.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Was not this the objection of the honorable Senator, that he objected to its consideration?

Mr. CONKLING. That was it—to the present consideration.

Mr. BAYARD. The objection was made as soon as the resolution was read. I said, "I object; let it lie over;" and therefore it went over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is under the rule that requires one day's notice of any resolution; if objection is offered, it must lie over under the rule; but no point of order was made upon the reception, as had been made theretofore where the Senate had ruled on the submission of the question to the Senate for its decision. The Chair does not understand—and he is verified by the Secretary—that any point of order upon the reception of this resolution was made. The Chair understands the Senator from Delaware this morning to have raised the point of consideration.

Mr. BAYARD. I will state the facts. Here is the RECORD. On the evening of the 16th of March this occurred:

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate approve the action heretofore taken by the President of the United States in protecting Louisiana from domestic violence, and are of opinion that he should continue to recognize in that State the existing State government.

Mr. BAYARD. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The consideration of the resolution is objected to, and it will go over under the rule.

Mr. NORWOOD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

This was all that passed on the subject. The resolution was offered at the heel of a long session, not three minutes before the adjournment took place. I presumed that, by objecting to it, the objection carried all manner of objections, whether to its being within order or not, and also to its present consideration at that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair replies simply that, if the Senator will remember, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FERRY] made the point of order on a previous resolution and made the point of reception clearly, and the present occupant was then occupying the chair and stated the question to be a question of reception. As the Senator has read the RECORD, the objection was that under the rule, which is that no resolution can be considered on the day it is offered if objection is made, it must lie over one day as a notice to the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. With submission to the Chair, I will state that the objection was not made except in these words, "Let that go over," and under that the resolution went over, not specifying what the cause of objection was.

But, Mr. President, I do not think it is worth while, and it is not my intention, to stand upon any fine-drawn distinctions as to this matter. The majority can unquestionably bring this matter up, and they can decide the point of order, and I do not care to throw on the Chair the necessity of making decisions, certainly, while I am addressing it, for I shall never intentionally bring myself in collision with the rules of this body and shall disturb the Chair as little as I can in that respect.

The point of order that I desire to state, and perhaps at the danger of repetition, is that the action contemplated by this resolution is to have the effect of legislation, and is therefore in violation of the object of the present session, that the object contemplated by this resolution is that which, to make it efficient under the Constitution of the United States, must have the joint action of the entire Congress in order to justify the Executive in any action which he may take or may have taken. It is therefore to reach the effect of a law without the form of a law, and hence to defeat the object for which this session was called. It is for that reason that I object to the consideration of the resolution and raised the point of order at the earliest moment that I thought it could be raised to the reception of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware has stated that he raised the point of order to the reception of the resolution at that time. If there be no objection the Chair will take the question as stated by the Senator from Delaware as his understanding of the case and will submit the question of reception to the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. That is right.

Mr. BAYARD. If the Chair proposes to submit it, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put it in the form in which it appears now by the RECORD. Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution proposed by the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. EATON. Permit me to suggest that the manner in which the Chair puts the question is not on the motion of the Senator from Delaware at all. The Senator from Delaware says that in his judgment the resolution is out of order. I fully concur with the Senator in the point of order, and submit with great deference that the reception of the resolution in the manner it was received the other day by no means determines that the resolution is in order. Suppose I submit a resolution to-day; it is laid upon the table; no question whatever is made with regard to it. Now I beg leave to say that under any rule of parliamentary law known from 1600 down to to-day, when that resolution is called from the table, it is pertinent then to ask and determine whether that resolution can be received and considered. I have no doubt about the parliamentary law on that subject. That is the point made by the Senator from Delaware, and the Chair did not put that point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair replies to the Senator from Connecticut that in the judgment of the Chair, as informed by the Secretary, the point of reception was not made, and the Chair so stated; but upon the statement of the Senator from Delaware, as the Chair is bound by the statement of any Senator, that the objection he made was not particularly the one under the rule, but covered the whole question of reception, the Chair said that if there were no objection he would put it in the form of the Senate proceeding at once to the consideration of it, and heard no objection. There being a difference of understanding of the state of facts, now the Senator from Connecticut makes the point that the question should be put precisely on the objection stated by the Senator from Delaware. The Chair will put it on the question of reception.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Chair pardon me? The Chair stated something as being stated on my personal word in this matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair meant on the RECORD.

Mr. BAYARD. I merely stated that whatever the RECORD disclosed of the debate is what I propose to submit to. I did not speak of any motive I had, or any intention either of interposing a question of order, or whether I had it in my mind at all. I merely stated that the general language used, no point being raised as to whether the resolution should be or should not be received or should be or should not be considered, left it open to any objection that might be made. I have said nothing in regard to my intention in offering the objection.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, it seems to me that it is wholly immaterial whether the Senator from Delaware objected to the reception of the resolution or not. If in point of fact the Senate has no right to consider this resolution, or, as we would say in a court, has no jurisdiction of such a resolution at this session, then the point of order may be made at any time. An objection to the jurisdiction of a court or of a legislative body cannot be waived; it may be made at any time; and therefore whether any objection was made at the time to the reception of the resolution or not makes no difference; and I am frank to say that my recollection of what took place accords with what is said in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that that was all that did take place. At the time I knew very well that the Senator from Delaware intended to object to the reception of any such resolution, from a previous conversation I had had with him, and I knew what was in his mind; but I thought at the same time he did not then clearly express that he objected to the reception of the resolution. In other words, according to my recollection that took place which appears in the RECORD; but the point I make is that an objection to the consideration of this resolution on the ground that the resolution itself is beyond our constitutional power to consider and act upon at this session and that, therefore, it is out of order, as a question of order, can be made at any time without any regard to whether the reception of the resolution was objected to or not. In fact, an objection to the reception of a resolution does not necessarily raise the question. The reception of a resolution may be objected to for other reasons than a want of power in the Senate to consider it. It may be objected to for other reasons than would arise upon a point of order, and a vote being taken, Senators may vote against the reception who yet believe that the resolution itself, if offered at the proper time or under other circumstances, would be strictly in order or that it is in order yet. But what I rose simply to say is that the question of order can be submitted now whether an objection was made to the reception or not, the point of order being that the Senate has no constitutional right to consider the resolution at this session. That is a point of order which can be made at any time.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think out of respect to the tenderness of conscience on the other side I can relieve the Senator from this difficulty. There is another resolution on the same subject that was introduced and received certainly without any point of order being raised. It was my intention to propose a substitute for the resolution of the Senator from New Jersey; but if it be more agreeable to the Senators on the other side, I will withdraw my motion and move to take up the resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] and will propose my substitute for that.

Mr. THURMAN. That will not alter the case in the slightest degree.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then we will go on with the present one.

Mr. THURMAN. The same objection would be made to the resolution of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is to say the Senator will contend where a resolution has been offered and received unobjected to, and placed on the Calendar, that it cannot be taken up on a point of order to its reception.

Mr. THURMAN. It is not a point of order to its reception. The point of order is that it cannot be considered because the Senate has no power to consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will now rule in the case and quote the rule. Referring to Rule 26, the latter clause of which applies to all resolutions, it is provided:

> And all other resolutions shall lie on the table one day for consideration, and also reports of committees.

Every resolution, if an objection is made to its consideration, must necessarily lie over one day.

Now the Chair will read the RECORD, and beg the attention of the Senator from Delaware particularly.

> Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I offer the following resolution—

The Chair will not read the resolution—

> Mr. BAYARD. Let that go over.
> The PRESIDING OFFICER. The consideration of the resolution is objected to, and it will go over under the rule.

The Chair stated that if the point of order was made, if the merits of the resolution were objected to, the Chair would overrule the point of order at once. The Chair stated that the objection made then was under the rule simply to cover the notice of one day, and so understood it, and was about to rule; but the Senator from Delaware declared that it was his intention in objecting to it to cover the whole question of reception. That is the point of difference that the Chair observed between the Senator from Delaware and the RECORD; and it was merely upon that understanding that the Chair stated his view of the facts. Now if the Chair rules upon the RECORD itself—and if there be no objection the Chair will rule upon the RECORD—the Chair overrules the point of order. The question now is: Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution proposed by the Senator from New Jersey? upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RANSOM, (when the name of Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] If he were here he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when the name of Mr. CONOVER was called.) The Senator from Florida [Mr. CONOVER] requested me to say that he was called home by sickness in his family and would not be here when his name was called.

Mr. RANSOM, (when Mr. MERRIMON's name was called.) I am requested by my colleague [Mr. MERRIMON] to say that he is paired on this question and other questions of this character with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] If present, my colleague would vote "nay" and the Senator from Maine would vote "yea" on this motion.

Mr. SARGENT, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. DENNIS.]

Mr. WINDOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.] He, if present, would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. ALLISON, (when Mr. WRIGHT's name was called.) On this question I understand that my colleague [Mr. WRIGHT] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. DENNIS.]

Mr. SARGENT. What was the pair just announced?

Mr. ALLISON. My colleague with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. DENNIS.]

Mr. SARGENT. I am very happy to hear it.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. DENNIS paired with Mr. WRIGHT on the treaty question.

Mr. CONKLING. Let the pair stand on this.

Mr. BOGY. No, sir, it was on the treaty question.

Mr. SARGENT. On that only?

Mr. BOGY. On the treaty question.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator's statement is sufficient.

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Cragin, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Robertson, Sherman, Spencer, and West—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Gordon, Hamilton, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, Maxey, Norwood, Randolph, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Christiancy, Clayton, Conover, Dawes, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Johnston of Virginia, McDonald, Merrimon, Paddock, Ransom, Sargent, Wadleigh, Windom, and Wright—20.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate approve the action heretofore taken by the President of the United States in protecting Louisiana from domestic violence, and are of opinion that he should continue to recognize in that State the existing State government.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved" and substituting the following:

That the action of the President in protecting the government in Louisiana, of which William P. Kellogg is the executive, and the people of that State against domestic violence, and in enforcing the laws of the United States in that State, is approved.

I do not propose, Mr. President, to discuss this resolution, and I have ascertained that there is no disposition on the part of our friends on this side of the Chamber to prolong a discussion which has already been exhausted; we have said all that we have to say; and with great respect for the ingenuity of our friends on the other side, we think they have said all that it is possible for them to say. We believe that after the President of the United States has repeatedly called our attention to this grave matter, it would not be decorous for us to separate without giving him the benefit of our judgment upon it, and so far as that may do so to relieve him from a responsibility which ought not to have been imposed upon him but which properly belongs to Congress. If our friends on the other side are ready to vote, there will be no difficulty in disposing of this resolution, whichever way it may be disposed of, and adjourning, I think to-day. I do not know of any executive business that will be likely to detain us here. If not, if they desire to discuss the question, it is their undoubted right to do so, and we shall listen to them with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not rise to discuss this matter at all, but I want time to study this new phase of the question. Although the Senator from Rhode Island says that it has been discussed on that side sufficiently, yet I imagine the discussion has taken place in a chamber to which the democratic Senators were not admitted, and we have not had the benefit of hearing that discussion. When we shall be invited into the secret recesses of that chamber and allowed to hear what is there said, we shall be prepared to answer, undoubtedly; but we do not ask any such admission, nor do we suppose it would be accorded if we did. I want time to look at this matter. It is obvious now that this session is to go over until next week. We have plenty of business for executive session; and I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BAYARD. And let the resolution be printed.

Mr. THURMAN. And let this resolution be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope we shall not go into executive session. I hope we shall remain here and decide this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. Is there objection to printing the substitute as asked by the Senator from Delaware? The Chair hears none. The question is on the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Gordon, Hamilton, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, Maxey, Norwood, Randolph, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Cragin, Eaton, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Robertson, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, West, and Windom—33.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Christiancy, Clayton, Conover, Dawes, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Johnston of Virginia, McDonald, Merrimon, Ransom, Wadleigh, and Wright—17.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. WHYTE. The proposition to recognize the Kellogg government stood side by side with the resolution to admit Mr. Pinchback to a seat on this floor at the beginning of this extra session. The latter resolution having been sent over to December next, it seems to me that the discussion of this resolution might as well be postponed until that time also, and I therefore move as it is a twin brother of the other resolution that this subject be postponed until the second Monday in December next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to postpone.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to say in reply to my friend from Maryland, who says that this is a twin of the Pinchback resolution, that I do not so recognize it. I do not think it is even a cousin.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] I would vote "yea" and he would vote "nay" on this motion, if he were present.

Mr. SARGENT, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. DENNIS.] I suppose there is no doubt how he or I would vote.

Mr. WINDOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] and I want to say that on the last motion of the Senator from Ohio, to go into executive session, I voted by mistake, having forgotten for the time that I was paired.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Gordon, Hamilton, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, Maxey, Norwood, Randolph, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conkling, Cragin, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Robertson, Sherman, Spencer, and West—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Conover, Dawes, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Johnston of Virginia, McDonald, Merrimon, Ransom, Sargent, Wadleigh, Windom, and Wright—18.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the substitute offered by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to know whether the order to print this resolution has been made and whether it has been sent to the printer.

Mr. CONKLING. We do not hear the Senator on this side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators standing in the rear of the seats will please take seats or retire from the lobby. There is too much conversation in the Chamber.

Mr. BAYARD. My object in asking whether the order had been made to print this resolution was that those who may have the opportunity of debating it hereafter should have it in print and be better informed than I can be; for I cannot regard with respect or approval, and I must consider it as destructive of the spirit of our constitutional form of government, that it has pleased the majority, in this as in other cases, to consider grave public questions in the secret councils of party alone and then suddenly to promulgate them by party order and call upon their associates in this Chamber instantly to act upon them before they can be known, before they can be fully comprehended or that proper preparation made for their deliberate consideration which every man in this Chamber owes to a question before he casts his representative vote upon it. It was for that reason that I asked the question of the Chair in order that others may have an advantage which has been denied to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would observe, in reply to the Senator's question, that a copy of the resolution has been sent to the printing office under the order of the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. I understood the order to have been made and I merely wished to be sure of it, for the reason I have stated.

Mr. President, my experience of public life commenced in this body six years ago, and is limited to what has occurred here during that short period; but I have seen in public prints the statement that "caucus legislation" originated with the democratic party while it was in power in the two Houses of Congress. My disapproval of it was so great, that once in speaking of what I believed to be its dangerous results in the presence of the gentleman who preceded me in the seat I occupy in this Chamber, who was my father, and who had been a member of the Senate for nearly three full terms, broken only by an interval of two years when he resigned his seat and was reappointed and re-elected.

I asked him whether, to his knowledge and during his service in the Senate and in the democratic party, of which he was always a member, such had been their custom and practice, and he told me that upon a motion being made to vote upon proposed legislation in the party caucus he introduced himself a resolution that such action should not be in any degree binding upon the members and that it was carried by a vote of more than two to one. I state this as part of the truth of history. That was at a time when the democratic party had a majority in both Houses of Congress. I only can say for myself that should the time come, which I hope and believe will come and come soon, when in this Chamber there will be a majority of Senators having political affiliations with me, the same decision shall be made in their caucus, should they call one in regard to the transaction of public business, and that the country will never witness the scenes of the last ten years of the preparation of public measures in party caucus and their enactment into law without public explanation or debate, which is a defeat of the spirit if not of the letter of our Government.

I stated as an objection to the consideration of this measure at this session that it was not within the purview of the objects for which the Senate was assembled by the call of the President. He called it for executive business. He did not convene the other House, as the Constitution authorizes, for by its terms he can convene both Houses or either. When he called the Senate, it was to consider those measures competent for the Senate sitting as a single and separate body to render effective. The Senate at its last special session and at the present session deliberately recorded their judgment that to such objects alone was their attention and action to be restricted, but to-day they have under caucus dictation changed their opinion, and what was wrong a week ago is right to-day. What is the object of this change? It is the indorsement of the action of the executive department of the Government in relation to the State of Louisiana in protecting the government of which William P. Kellogg is the executive and the people of that State against alleged domestic violence and enforcing the laws of the United States in that State.

Let us get rid of the least objectionable portions of this resolution. Is it thought necessary to indorse the action of the President in the enforcement of the laws of the United States in Louisiana or elsewhere? Is not that simply his duty in accordance with his official oath? Is not that a duty which he has been executing, or professing to execute, for the last six years, and if it has been performed, why this unusual and unprecedented thanks to him for that for which no President before was ever thanked? I think these words are thrown in to make palatable to certain stomachs on the other side this pill of illegality, to sugar-coat with this empty indorsement of official action?

The events in the State of Louisiana of the last four years have been such that if they shall be accepted and approved by the American people it will be a virtual cession of their form of government. All that has been done by the President and his allies in Louisiana has been nothing but mingled force and fraud without any justification of morals, of law, of justice, or of right. When this question is argued upon the mere technicalities of law, without regard to its substantial facts, its chief force is given up. The Louisiana case has been a bald, monstrous, naked fraud from beginning to end. No man who has made law his study and pursued it with an honest faith can take up this beloved and revered Constitution of our country and apply those sacred principles, those clear definitions, to such a case as Louisiana has presented, without appreciating what a mockery it is of anything heretofore known to American history or American laws. There is no law on the side of Kellogg; no pretense of law. There is not a committee of the two Houses of Congress, composed as they have been of a majority of republican Senators or Representatives, which has not denounced the very foundation-stone upon which the Kellogg government rests as utterly devoid of any pretense of justice or legality.

On the part of the President in relation to that State there has been a claim and exercise of power which the people of this country cannot concede with safety to themselves. They cannot admit it with safety to their form of government. If they do they are admitting a precedent which will prove fatal to their liberties. If what we have witnessed in Louisiana can be done and be approved, how can objection be urged when like measures are proposed, for the other thirty-six States? No, sir, I will not admit such a wrong.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] the other day with unerring logic reduced the position of the champions of the Executive for the power that he has exercised in that State to an absurdity. They claimed there was a government de facto, and he showed what that meant in this case: A government created by the President is to be his justification for all that follows from it. When you talk of his recognizing Kellogg you mean only that the President recognizes the President. He bows to the shadow of his own unlawful power, that is all. It is his own voice that echoes back his mandates and none other is heard. If a government "de facto" be there it has been set up by him alone, and in order to know whether this has been the exercise of a just power you must discover whether there is any lawful authority vested in the President of the United States to create and maintain by military force a State government. If it can be done in one State it can be done in all, and there is no safety except to resist such claims whenever and wherever attempted to be set up.

On the 8th of January I submitted to the Senate some remarks on the subject of the dispersion of the Louisiana Legislature by the military forces of the United States, acting of course if not under the direct order yet with the sanction, and as it has turned out since with the full approval, of the President of the United States. I then quoted from a message of the President of the United States in 1844 in regard to the affairs in Rhode Island, and as it so apt, I shall read it now:

I resist—

Said the then President—

the idea that it falls within the executive competency to decide in controversies of the nature of that which existed in Rhode Island, on which side is the majority of the people, or as to the extent of the rights of a mere numerical majority. For the Executive to assume such a power would be to assume a power of the most dangerous character. Under such assumptions the States of this Union would have no security for peace or tranquillity, but might be converted into the mere instruments of executive will. Actuated by selfish purposes, he might become the great agitator, fomenting assaults upon the State constitutions, and declaring the majority of to-day to be the minority of to-morrow; and the minority, in its turn, the majority, before whose decrees the established order of things in the State should be subverted. Revolution, civil commotion, and bloodshed would be the inevitable consequences. The provision in the Constitution intended for the security of the States would thus be turned into the instrument of their destruction. The President would become in fact the great constitution-maker for the States, and all power would be vested in his hands.—House Journal, First Session Twenty-eighth Congress, pages 765, 766.

And if the action of the President, to use the language of this resolution, "in protecting the government in Louisiana of which William P. Kellogg is executive" is to be approved by the American people, then indeed he will become the great authorized interferer and agitator in the affairs of the States and constitution-maker for all the States. I stand forever in opposition to such doctrine while this form of government shall last. I do not believe it can last very long if these pretensions of the Executive are not to be checked and disallowed. The resolution now before us can give no authority; it is anomalous and unprecedented; it is but the opinion of so many individuals who happen to be members of the Senate and I do not think anybody who has watched the course of legislation or discussion here would doubt much what their opinion would be in relation to anything that it pleased the present President of the United States to do in relation to any portion of the country in which their homes and individual happiness were not involved.

On the 13th of January, 1875, the President sent in to the Senate, in compliance with a resolution passed on the 8th of January, information in relation to the alleged interference in the organization of the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana. At that time the President had in his possession, as appears from his subsequent communications, other and important information respecting the condition of affairs in that State, transmitted to the Secretary of War by General Emory, which is found in Executive Document No. 17, and by a comparison of the dates it is shown that information from the most respectable and what should have been the most authoritative source was withheld by the President from the Senate until a subsequent resolution adopted on the 11th of January brought it into this body. I refer especially to the communication to the War Department made by Colonel Morrow, of the Thirteenth Infantry, on the 24th of December last. The President saw fit to incorporate in his message information from one Major Lewis Merrill which was not earlier in date; but, on the contrary, was later in date than the information he had from Colonel Morrow. Colonel Morrow is certified to us by General Emory to be, to use his own language, an officer "who has heretofore been intrusted by the Government with important and delicate commands, and was by reason of his experience and the high confidence reposed in him sent to make an inspection of the state of affairs in Northwestern Louisiana," and who is indorsed by William T. Sherman, the General of the Army, in forwarding his report in January for the personal perusal of the President; and, mark, this letter is dated at Saint Louis the 4th day of January. We know that the mails bring letters from Saint Louis here in forty hours. Therefore on the 13th of January, when the President sent in this message of his to the Senate, he had William T. Sherman's indorsement and the full report of Morrow in his hands, and I desire to know why it is, when he is complying with a call of the Senate for information regarding the condition of Louisiana, that he withholds the report of Morrow and sends in the report of Merrill, who was Morrow's subordinate, Merrill's report being subsequent in date to Morrow's and Morrow's being in his hands at that time, for not only was it forwarded to him on the 4th of January and therefore in his hands on the 6th of January and thereby kept by him one week before he referred it to Congress, but it was accompanied with these expressions:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
Saint Louis, Missouri, January 4, 1875.

This paper is most respectfully forwarded to the Secretary of War, with a request that he submit it for the personal perusal of the President. I know of no officer of Colonel Morrow's rank who is better qualified to speak and write of matters like this, and his opinions are entitled to great consideration.

I profess to have some knowledge of the people of that section, both white and black, from a long residence among them before the war and several visits since but I shall not intrude my opinion in the confusion in which the subject is now enveloped.

W. T. SHERMAN,
General.

Here we have a message from the President on the 13th of January, and this important communication on the very subject in question, from a trusted officer of the Army, withheld from the Senate until produced, as it seems to me, unwillingly by a subsequent resolution of inquiry by the Senate. In this message the President of the United States proceeds to give his justification for the arrest of five members of the Louisiana Legislature, the destruction of its organization, the forcible interference with the orderly proceedings of that body by the United States military forces, for whose action, either by confirmation or precedent order, he is certainly responsible. There is a maxim, well known to laymen and lawyers, that every ratification by a principal is equivalent to an original command; and when the facts are made known to the responsible party and he affirms and approves them, he is to be held legally responsible for the acts and their consequences. And here I submit a comment for the especial consideration of the Senate and the country. This is the 20th day of March, 1875. The facts of the Louisiana case are now thoroughly known to the country. Gentlemen on this side of the Chamber, and I among them, were complained of in January last for speaking too hastily of the action of the President. We cannot be so blamed now; and looking over this whole field of action, I ask any one to point out the first rebuke, direct or indirect, which has been administered to any official connected with the Louisiana affair for any of the many admitted wrongs and illegalities connected with the transactions in that State? Where has been the intruding official who has been removed? What lawless soldier has been reprimanded? Where has been any intimation that anything that has occurred there was distasteful or unpleasant to the President or had been in transgression of his orders and desires? So far from that, there has been warm and rapturous approval, of propositions that ought to shock, that have shocked, that will hereafter shock the very soul of the American people, by proposing to withdraw from them all the safeguards of personal liberty and to turn citizens and civilians over to the tender mercies, the short shrift and ready cord of the provost marshal acting under the orders of Lieutenant-General Sheridan.

But, sir, the President of the United States deliberately by a written message has given his reasons why the State-house of Louisiana was garrisoned with Federal troops and five members of her Legislature by military force thrust from their seats in her legislative hall where they were under what should have been the protection of the constitution and laws of their State, of which shelter they were deprived by usurping power which we are called upon this day to approve. It is not so important what this Senate may say; but I know the people of this country will say that they love their form of government too well to be blinded by the glare and glitter of a military reputation that would govern them by force instead of law and by bayonets instead of ballots.

But on the second page of the President's message of the 13th of January he proceeds to justify his action ab origine in Kellogg's case under the advice, I suppose, of that distinguished luminary of his profession the Attorney-General of the United States; to justify the action of the district judge of the United States in Louisiana in the month of December, 1872, in the cases of Kellogg vs. Warmoth and Antoine vs. Warmoth. He argues it, or in what he is pleased to consider argument he recites that decision with evident approval, savored by some slight expressions of doubt. He declares that—

Preparatory to the election of 1872 a shameful and undisguised conspiracy was formed to carry that election against the republicans without regard to law or right, and to that end the most glaring frauds and forgeries were committed in the returns after many colored citizens had been denied registration, and others deterred by fear from casting their ballots.

When the time came for a final canvass of the votes, in view of the foregoing facts, William P. Kellogg, the republican candiate for governor, brought suit upon the equity side of the United States circuit court for Louisiana, and against Warmoth and others, who had obtained possession of the returns of the election—

Let me pause here for a moment. "Who had obtained possession of the returns of the election?" Why, sir, Warmoth was by the laws of that State ex officio the head of the board of canvass—representing that several thousand voters of the State had been deprived of the elective franchise on account of their color, and praying that steps might be taken to have said votes counted, and for general relief.

The message goes on to cite the orders of the court restraining the board of canvass from tabulating and proclaiming the returns. Not one word is said in this message that Durell went further and ordered the seizure of the State-house by the United States marshal, Packard, and that he was backed up in that by the precedent orders of the Attorney-General of the United States for troops to execute whatever decrees and mandates he might make in the premises. That fact is not stated in the message. But the President complains that—

These proceedings have been widely denounced as an unwarrantable interference by the Federal judiciary with the election of State officers.

Yes, Mr. President, that is a very mild designation of what has been said. I propose to recite the language of every committee of either House that has reported upon this subject. Let us examine first the report of the committee of this body who made a full investigation into the affairs of Louisiana in 1873; next the report of the committee of the House upon the proposed impeachment of Judge Durell; next the report of the Committee on Elections in the case of Sheridan vs. Pinchback, when Pinchback was applying in 1873 for admission to the other House of Congress—take all these reports and show that no committee of either House of Congress charged with the investigation of these matters has failed to denounce the action of Durell in all its stages as an unwarrantable interference by the Federal judiciary with the election of State officers.

"But," says the President, "it is to be remembered" in opposition to this universal denunciation—

But it is to be remembered that by the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States the political equality of colored citizens is secured, and under the second section of that amendment, providing that Congress shall have power to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation, an act was passed on the 31st of May, 1870, and amended in 1871, the object of which was to prevent the denial or abridgment of suffrage to citizens, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and it has been held by all the Federal judges before whom the question has arisen, including Justice Strong of the Supreme Court, that the protection afforded by this amendment and these acts extends to State as well as other elections.

It is a matter of small importance perhaps to say that the President is certainly in error in saying that there has been a uniformity of decision to that effect; on the contrary, cases are to-day in the Supreme Court of the United States upon appeal from the decisions of judges of the Supreme Court of the United States sitting in the circuit courts and of circuit judges affirming the contrary of the doctrine which the President here declares to have been universally held by the courts; and I may say as to the case before Mr. Justice Strong to which he refers, I myself was of counsel in that case and I have here the record of his opinion and have looked through it in vain to find such a dictum as is alleged by the President.

Section 15 of said act, after numerous provisions therein to prevent an evasion of the fifteenth amendment, provides that the jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States shall extend to all cases in law or equity arising under the provisions of said act and of the act amendatory thereof. Congress seems to have contemplated equitable as well as legal proceedings to prevent the denial of suffrage to colored citizens; and it may be safely asserted that if Kellogg's bill in the above-named case did not present a case for the equitable interposition of the court, that no such case can arise under the act.

Here is an argument in favor of Durell's jurisdiction in the premises, and alleged justification of his midnight order.

While the jurisdiction of the court in the case of Kellogg vs. Warmoth and others is clear to my mind—

It is "clear to his mind" that the court had jurisdiction of that case and proceeded properly; and it is that which the Senate is called upon to indorse to-day. Here in January, 1875, he still declares, in the face of all the reports of the committees, in the face of what may be stated as almost the common consent of the entire bar of the United States and the sentiment of the people—he still declares that it is still clear to his mind that there was lawful jurisdiction of the district court of the United States in the case of Kellogg vs. Warmoth and that its action was right—it seems that some of the orders made by the judge in that and the kindred case of Antoine were illegal. But while they are so held and considered, it is not to be forgotten that the mandates of his court had been contemptuously defied, and they were made while wild scenes of anarchy were sweeping away all restraint of law and order.

Sir, there was no wild anarchy in that State equal to Durell's own action. He was the "wild anarch" in that State, and there was no contempt of law equal to the action of the Attorney-General and the President when they sustained in advance and subsequently to this day his illegal and infamous orders. If you wish to denounce anarchists, look to those who set on foot such a lawless overthrow of the constitution and laws of the State as was done in Louisiana in 1872.

Doubtless the judge of this court made grave mistakes; but the law allows the chancellor great latitude, not only in punishing those who contemn his orders and injunctions, but in preventing the consummation of the wrong which he has judicially forbidden.

Sir, if in the execution of Judge Durell's orders one human life had been lost, and there was law in this land capable of just enforcement, Judge Durell and those who aided and abetted him would have paid forfeit for that innocent blood with their own lives. There is no such latitude given to a chancellor that he shall upset a State by mistake, that he shall take men's lives in error, sir; and those who are his instruments proceed at the peril of the law, and if they take innocent life without law, the law will adjudge them to be murderers and execute upon them the penalties due to such crimes.

Whatever may be said or thought of those matters, it was only made known to me that process of the United States court was resisted; and as said act especially provides for the use of the Army and Navy, when necessary, to enforce judicial process arising thereunder, I considered it my duty to see that such process was executed according to the judgment of the court.

There had been no resistance; the order for military aid was made in advance of any call for it or occasion for it. No process of the United States courts has even to this day been resisted in Louisiana.

But, sir, the President did a great deal more. He and his Attorney-General did not wait for the demand of aid from the court. They gave it before it was asked. On the 3d day of December, 1872, we have the Attorney-General, rushing in hot and illegal haste to hurry up his troops before the order of Durell was made, addressing "S. B. Packard, United States marshal, New Orleans," thus:

You are to enforce the decrees and mandates of the United States courts, no matter by whom resisted, and General Emory will furnish you with all necessary troops for that purpose.

Sir, no demand had been made upon him for this force, but he exhibits this prompt disposition to overthrow the State and to accomplish what I have always believed to be a deliberate conspiracy. The President says:

Resulting from these proceedings, through various controversies and complications—

A very mild name to give them—a State administration was organized with William P. Kellogg as governor, which, in the discharge of my duty under section 4, article 4, of the Constitution, I have recognized as the government of the State.

Here the Senate and the country have the deliberate admission of the President that he justifies his action in Louisiana as a result of Durell's proceedings.

"Through various controversies and complications a State administration" has been thus created, "with William P. Kellogg as governor," and upon this it is that he stands or he falls for justification before the American people. Can he stand upon it? Is the Senate now ready to indorse his acts? I do not doubt the majority here will indorse his action, for such is the decree of their party caucus.

But if an admission more fatal to our system of government can be imagined, I am at a loss to conceive it.

Now, sir, let us go back to the spring of 1872 to understand the origin of these conspiracies to turn the forms of election in Louisiana in the fall of 1872 into such a fraud that the virtuous souls of the Administration revolted at it, and they determined that they would crush it at the expense of all constitutions or laws.

In 1872 the country was made aware of a most scandalous condition of things existing in Louisiana by which United States troops were used to control the republican conventions of that State. It was not then a question between the conservatives or democrats and the Administration, but it was a war confined to the Administration camp itself. In the course of this controversy, the present collector of customs at New Orleans took on board a revenue cutter called the Wilderness, commanded by Captain Frank Barr, such a number of the State senators of Louisiana as to reduce the number who were left on shore to less than a quorum, and so to frustrate any action of the body. United States troops were called in and stacked arms in the court-house of the United States and in the custom-house. The intimidation which was subsequently extended to the conservative citizens was then used against the republican opponents of Mr. Packard, the marshal, and Mr. Casey, the collector. The House of Representatives sent down a committee, whose report I hold in my hand, (House Report No. 92 of the Forty-second Congress, second sesson,) and from the majority report, made by republicans, I take the facts which I will lay before the Senate, because I wish the Senate and the country to know the history of this Warmoth-Pinchback-Kellogg-Durell-Grant-Williams imbroglio from beginning to end. This report was made on the 30th of May, 1872, by Mr. Scofield, from the Select Committee to Investigate the Condition of Affairs in Louisiana:

The present State constitution, originating under the reconstruction laws of Congress, was accepted by the people in April, 1868. At the same election H. C. Warmoth was chosen governor, and Oscar J. Dunn lieutenant-governor. The members of the Legislature were also elected at the same time. The governor, lieutenant-governor, and one-half the senators were to hold their offices until after the election in 1872; the members of the house and the other half of the senators until after the election in 1870. These gentlemen immediately entered upon the discharge of their duties.

Oscar J. Dunn was a colored man, and I have always found he was spoken of as an honest man, who did his duties according to his best lights, and that he was a true friend of the colored people of Louisiana whatever he was to the whites. But Warmoth and Dunn were both republicans, elected at the same time, for the same term, upon the same ticket. Thus Warmoth came to be governor of Louisiana.

The committee then proceed to refer to the election laws and to the machinery by which vast and undue powers were improperly bestowed upon the governor which gave him virtually the control of the officers both of registration and of election throughout the entire State. They say that—

The experience in the presidential election of 1868 seemed to demand some proper legislation for the better protection of the colored voters and the more perfect freedom of elections. The committee do not feel called upon—either to indorse or condemn this legislation. It is proper, however, to note that at the time of its passage it was not only concurred in but demanded by the whole republican party, and that all the republican leaders who now demand its repeal were the advisers or actors in its enactment.

Therefore if the power to cheat at elections was given, if undue powers of any kind were placed in the hands of the governor of that State by this legislation, it was "not only concurred in but demanded by the republican party," who alone therefore are responsible for the evils that may have flown from it.

Warmoth found himself in the chair of state in Louisiana with all these powers vested in him by the action of a republican Legislature. But it seems that the constitution of that State rendered the governor ineligible for re-election, and Mr. Warmoth had that same desire for a second term of office which I am disposed to believe we witness in a higher functionary for a third term of office. The same restless ambition that prompted Mr. Warmoth to destroy the republican party of Louisiana for the purpose of having himself made re-eligible to the gubernatorial chair of that State, it strikes me we see strong symptoms of at the present time in other quarters. He proposed an amendment to the constitution of that State whereby his re-eligibility should be secured.

As the proposed amendment affected no one but the governor, it was well understood it originated in his interest as a candidate for a second term. On the 9th day of August, 1870, a republican State convention, for the nomination of a ticket and the appointment of a State central committee, assembled at the State-house in New Orleans. The proceedings of this convention disclosed the first factional division of the party. Governor Warmoth and Lieutenant-Governor Dunn were delegates in the convention, and each was nominated to preside over it. Dunn was successful. A civil-rights bill had been passed at the close of the preceding session of the Legislature, and was still pending in the hands of the governor. A resolution censuring the governor for not signing this bill was introduced, but after discussion was not pressed. The State central committee was to consist of fifteen members, ten to be appointed by the convention and five by the chair. When the committee was finally organized, it was discovered that the five appointed by the chair were opposed to the proposed amendment to the constitution, which secured in opposition to it a majority of the whole committee. The governor, suspecting that the regular committee was against the amendment, organized what was known as an auxiliary committee, printed tickets in favor of the amendment, which the regular committee had omitted to do, and in conjunction with them began a canvass of the State. The republicans carried the State by a large majority, and the amendment was also carried, but by a less majority. The division of the party, thus originating in personal ambition, has continued to increase until nearly all its prominent members have been forced to be classed with one side or the other.

The country will see what was the origin of Warmoth's quarrel with the republican party and how for his personal ambition and the desire to insist on a second term of office he was willing to rend them in fragments.

The new Legislature assembled on the first Monday in January, 1871. In the house the Warmoth wing of the party was found to be in the ascendant.

There were quarrels, here set forth at considerable length, between the Dunn faction backed by Mr. Packard, the marshal, and Casey the collector, and Warmoth. Warmoth had control of the State; but Casey, Packard, and company had control of the United States forces. One could appoint deputy United States marshals, but the other could appoint State marshals and municipal police.

Another republican State convention was called to meet in New Orleans on the 9th day of August, 1871. There was no State ticket to be nominated, and this convention would have no duties to perform except to appoint a State central committee; yet it created great excitement in the party, and each wing of it made extraordinary efforts to secure a majority of the delegates. The convention was to consist of one hundred and eighteen delegates, but so fierce was the contest between the two factions that the credentials of not more than forty of this number were undisputed.

Mr. Packard was the chairman of the State executive committee of the republican party of Louisiana and the United States marshal, and knowing that Warmoth had local authority that would enable him to overrule him in this convention, he (Packard) "determined to hold it in the United States court-room, which is in the custom-house. He was the marshal, and as such had the control of the room. He appointed about forty deputy marshals to assist in keeping order. The city was rife with reports of anticipated violence. It was reported to Mr. Packard that the police, under the control of Governor Warmoth, would be there in force and that violence might be expected."

Now, Mr. President, see how easy it is when there is a will to find a way. Mr. Packard caused this to be reported to him. He caused these apprehensions of violence to have their proper weight on his mind. He cunningly devised the scheme that this convention, altogether composed of members of the republican party—no word then of this terrific White League, no word then of these hateful and usurping conservatives as they are called, nothing but republicans, pure, simple, and unadulterated, as we know them to be—were to be admitted to this convention. But he intended to control them, and he did. He demanded and received from the commanding general a detachment of United States troops. The committee say:

On the morning of the convention one hundred soldiers, under the command of Captain Smith, appeared and stacked their muskets and took position in the long hall up stairs leading to the court-room. Tickets of admission for all the Warmoth delegates, claimants and contestants, were obtained at the window of the post-office. The convention was called to meet at twelve m. Between ten and eleven Governor Warmoth, who was himself a delegate, and his whole party, were admitted to the hall of the building, where the soldiers were stationed, but were told by the door-keeper that they could not enter the court-room until twelve o'clock. There was another smaller court-room by the side of the one in which the convention was to be held, with two doors leading from one room to the other. The accidental opening of the door of this smaller room disclosed the fact that the delegates of the opposing faction had already assembled there and were holding a private caucus. From this fact the delegates outside—suspected that it was the intention to slip their opponents through the inside doors before the ontside doors should be opened, and in this way they would be deprived of a fair participation in the preliminary organization.

The result was that the Warmoth delegates, seeing that they were about to be sold out by this trick, left the building and proceeded to hold their convention in another place, leaving the Dunn delegates to hold their convention in the court-room. In other words, Mr. Warmoth retired in the face of the United States soldiers just as the conservative Legislature retired in the face of the same military authority two years later. In the one case Mr. Packard directed the troops against men of his own party; in the other case they were directed through the same agency against members of a State Legislature duly convened and who had been duly elected. In either case it was a lawless invasion of the rights of citizens, but in the second case, on January 4, 1875, not only were the rights of those fifty-five men who were disturbed by the military of the United States invaded, but through them the civil liberty of that entire State was stricken down and through them the civil liberty of every Legislature in the United States is threatened; and that is what we are asked to-day by the republican caucus to approve.

To go a little further into this history, on the 25th day of November, 1871, Lieutenant-Governor Dunn died. That left a vacancy in the presidency of the State senate; and here we begin to perceive the origin of Mr. Pinchback as a Senator of the United States. Under the constitution of Louisiana the governor had the authority to convene the General Assembly. He had not the authority to convene either house separately. The language of the constitution is that "he may convene the General Assembly." But that he did not want. He had aroused against him a strong and factious feeling, and he proposed to secure the control of the senate before he trusted himself to the impeaching power of the house. Therefore Mr. Warmoth called the State senate of Louisiana together to meet on the 6th day of December, 1871. That senate consisted of thirty-six members; two were dead. Thirty-four appeared and participated in the election. Mr. Pinchback, of the Warmoth faction, was elected by a vote of 18 against 16. You see, Mr. President, that the election of Pinchback to the office of lieutenant-governor, or presiding officer of the senate of Louisiana, was accomplished in December, 1871, under the Warmoth influence, for Pinchback was one of Warmoth's creatures, and I desire the Senate and the country to notice how Mr. Pinchback obtained the office which enabled him, through Durell's order and the President's bayonets, to become "acting governor."

It was alleged, with much plausibility, that the object of the governor in the exercise of this doubtful power—

That is the power of calling one house instead of both—

was to have the president of the senate selected before any articles of impeachment could be agreed to by the house, and before his opponents had time to combine upon an opposing candidate.

In the mean while the democratic anti-Warmoth members of the senate and house had agreed, in writing, to act together in opposition to the governor, to strip him of the patronage conferred upon him in the registration and other laws, before referred to, and, if need be, to attempt his impeachment.

Here then we find that the action organized against Warmoth, who was admittedly corrupt, was by the democrats, who desired to see him also removed from office; but on the 1st day of January, the day fixed for the meeting of the Legislature—

Only seventeen senators—less than a quorum—appeared in the senate chamber. Fourteen men, democrats and anti-Warmoth men, were in the city but refused to attend. Had they attended, so as to make a quorum, the election of Mr. Pinchback would have been immediately ratified. They preferred to await the arrival of the three absent members, to see if they would not join them in repudiating the election of Mr. Pinchback and electing one of their own number. The attending senators directed the sergeant-at-arms to bring in the absentees.

And then to protect the absentees from arrest and break up the quorum of the Warmoth legislature—

The collector of the port directed the captain of the United States revenue-cutter Wilderness to receive them on board and to move about in the river so as to prevent their arrest by the sergeant-at-arms. This was done, and they remained on board for five or six days and until after repeated orders to disembark had been received from the Secretary of the Treasury. When forced to leave the cutter, they sought refuge in the State of Mississippi, where they remained until January 20, 1872, when they returned to the senate chamber, and continued, until final adjournment, in regular session.

Mr. President, need I stop here for an instant to comment on this gross abuse by the collector of the port, backed by the marshal of the United States, disobeying the repeated orders of the Secretary of the Treasury, and follow that by the pregnant fact that both of those officials, one of them the brother-in-law of the President, have been continued in office and have been since that day confirmed for a second term by the action of the Senate?

This is a specimen of how the laws of the United States have been executed in the State of Louisiana which we are to approve:

The house convened on the 1st day of January—

And just here I wish to show how that election of Pinchback was accomplished. At the time the senate was convened—

Senator Blackman, for himself and others, presented a protest against the right of the governor to call an extra session of the senate only, and then a ballot was taken for lieutenant-governor. The vote, at first, stood 17 for Pinchback, Warmoth's candidate, and 17 for Coupland, a deputy collector of the custom-house, the candidate of the anti-Warmoth coalition; but Senator Lewis, who had been acting with the custom-house faction, in this emergency changed his vote to Pinchback electing him. The reason for this sudden change may be inferred from the following facts. The governor says:

"Question. Was any of his support got by corrupt means?"—

It must be remembered that Warmoth was then the patron of Pinchback—

"Answer. No; not to my knowledge.

"Q. Was there a senator, who had been acting with the Carter wing, who received sudden light and changed his vote?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Who was that senator?

"A. Mr. Lewis."

He proceeds that Mr. Lewis thought that the custom-house people had not treated him very well; that they had only given him an office of inspector, which he did not think was sufficient. But on the 26th of February the following petition, which sheds abundant light on the case, was filed in the sixth district court for the parish of Orleans. I will send it to the desk and ask the Clerk to read it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

J. B. LEWIS
vs. } No. 3258.
W. VAN NORDEN.

To the honorable the judge of the sixth district court for the parish of Orleans:

The petition of J. B. Lewis, a resident of the parish of Sabine, State of Louisiana, with respect, represents that he is the true and lawful owner of a certain tin cash-box and the contents thereof in money and public securities in the sum of $35,000; that said contents of the said tin cash-box are fully worth said sum; that W. Van Norden, a resident of the said city, has obtained possession of said box and said contents, and illegally and tortiously refuses to surrender the same to your petitioner; that said box and contents are now within the territorial jurisdiction of this court, and petitioner fears that said Van Norden may send said box and said contents out of the jurisdiction of this court during the pendency of this suit; that an order and writ of sequestration for said box and said contents has already been obtained by petitioner on compiying with the requisites of the law.

Petitioner therefore prays that said W. Van Norden be cited to answer this petition, and, after due proceedings had, that he be condemned to surrender and deliver to petitioner the said tin cash-box and its contents in money and public securities, amounting to $35,000, or, in default thereof, that he be condemned to pay petitioner $35,000, with legal interest from judicial demand and cost of suit, and that the order heretofore granted for a sequestration of said box and contents be confirmed, and for general relief, &c.

Attorneys for Petitioner.

AGREEMENT.

NEW ORLEANS, January 19, 1872.

This agreement shows that a box has been deposited in the Louisiana Savings-Bank by two persons known to the president thereof; that the said box contains $15,000 cash and other values equal to $15,000, and that the same is to be delivered on and only on the joint order of the parties depositing it, except as hereinafter provided:

The one, being a State senator, agrees to regularly attend the sessions of the State senate, at Mechanics' Institute, to vote to sustain Pinchback as president of the senate, and in all political questions with the party sustaining the State administration as now existing; and on the 4th of March next, or when the Legislature adjourns, the said box shall be withdrawn from the bank, and the $15,000 therein contained be taken out by and be the property of the said senator, he having fulfilled his part of this agreement; otherwise the said box and all its contents to be withdrawn by the other party.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I have caused these facts, taken from a report of a republican committee, to be read that the people of this country may understand the kind of soil in which Senators from the State of Louisiana take root. I need not say that this Mr. Lewis who saw this sudden light and changed his vote instantly, and so elected Pinchback lieutenant-governer and presiding officer of the senate, met the reward due to his rascalities, for it seems that notwithstanding this agreement to which these two parties had set their names, Senator Lewis and Dr. Southworth, the intimate friends of Warmoth, the patron saint of Pinchback, the box containing it when brought into court and opened contained nothing but the agreement itself, and hence the suit, and consequent exposure.

This was the way Pinchback became lieutenant-governor of Louisiana. I cite this historically because we will show that by this means he became the acting governor, was so recognized by the President when all this proof had been before the country and was open to the Executive, reported by gentlemen of his own party affiliation and in whom he had every confidence. If ignorance of the law excuses no man, can ignorance of such public facts excuse him who wields the high executive power of a great nation, or his law officers and Cabinet ministers who may advise, or his political friends in either House of Congress who in the face of such facts shall say he was right? And his action is to be approved by them with these facts now brought home to his and their knowledge!

But if Senators are curious to know something more about the history of this man, let them turn to pages 474 and 475, the testimony of S. W. Scott, taken in New Orleans on the 8th of February, 1872. Let them turn to the deposition of Mr. Walker at pages 512 and 514, and there they will see a full exemplification of the pleasant morals that prevailed in the Louisiana Legislature under the control of their friend and proposed companion, Mr. Pinchback. They will see then how Pinchback wins and they will see his system of legislative piracy upon passage of bills stated in the printed testimony taken by a republican committee of the House. Pinchback's case is not at this instant before us, although he is part and parcel of the Louisiana case. It was proposed to recognize the rightful action of the President by admitting Pinchback to a seat in this body, but when they came to the point, the majority shrank from doing that; and I think they were wise.

By means—

Says the committee—

and under circumstances such as these, Mr. Pinchback, a colored resident of New Orleans, became lieutenant-governor.

We know what followed. Pinchback became lieutenant-governor and president of the senate, I think, in February, 1872. The term of office for which he had been elected by his people expired four years from the date of the election in November, 1868; that is to say, it expired in November, 1872; so that in point of fact, when he assumed to act as governor of the State, having been elected by the people a State senator, he was absolutely functus officio, his term had expired, and therefore calling him "acting governor" was only another mark of contempt for law and order.

But, sir, the disgraceful history is before the country that Pinchback being installed as lieutenant-governor they impeached and suspended Warmoth in five hours; it was a farce without pretense or forms of law. When I heard the acute and able Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] proving to the country and to his party associates so logically according to law and fact that he was not unnaturally denounced by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] as making a democratic speech—when I heard him expend his ingenuity and talent on such a subject when there lay these broad chasms of illegality, this wholesale sweeping away of all pretense of law, a governor fortified in his place by four years of unquestioned possession and then to be brushed away by this farce of a pretended impeachment, so that in five hours—and it might as well have been in five minutes—he was suspended from his office and Pinchback is foisted into his place; and then the President of the United States with hot haste, urged on by his Attorney-General, recognizes Pinchback as the "acting governor," besought to do so by Casey and Packard, those who had been fighting Pinchback and keeping senators on revenue-cutters that they might not go to the Legislature, who had coalesced with Pinchback for party purposes of robbing the people of that State of every semblance of constitutional law or justice, and then come this telegram beseeching the recognition of Pinchback:

NEW ORLEANS, December 9, 1872.

Hon. GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General, Washington, District of Columbia:

Lieutenant-Governor Pinchback qualified and took possession of the governor's office to-night. Senate organized as high court of impeachment—

A very high court—

Chief-Justice Ludeling presiding—

The man who the Supreme Court of the United States says stole a railroad—and adjourned to meet Monday next. It is believed that all the democrats members of General Assembly will qualify and take seats to-morrow.

S. B. PACKARD,
United States Marshal.

On the same day comes a telegram from Pinchback, the lieutenant-governor and president of the senate, and Charles Lowell, speaker of the house of representatives, and on the same day, the 9th of December, I do not know whether even an hour had elapsed between the time that Pinchback signed his name as lieutenant-governor and president of the senate, he telegraphed to President Grant:

NEW ORLEANS, December 9, 1872.

President GRANT:

Having taken the oath of office and being in the possession of the gubernatorial office, it devolves upon me to urge the necessity of a favorable consideration of the request of the General Assembly as conveyed in the concurrent resolution of this day telegraphed to you requesting the protection of the United States Government. Be pleased to send the necessary orders to General Emory. This seems to me a necessary measure of precaution, although all is quiet here.

P. B. S. PINCHBACK,
Lieutenant-Governor, Acting Governor of Louisiana.

The law does not care for the fractions of a day, and it seems that there were in this day not even fractions. The whole affair was simultaneous. Pinchback was lieutenant-governor one moment and "acting governor" the next; and here, with all this disclosure of wretched derision of law and order, with this absence of any pretense of decency or forms, we are called upon to say that there is justification in approving the action of the executive branch of this Government in relation to this business.

Said Judge Trumbull:

This pretended Legislature, made up of persons returned as members by the Lynch board, perfected its organization, impeached the governor, suspended him from office, and installed Pinchback in his place. All this was done on the same day and within a few hours, and that, too, in disregard of a statute of the State, which, as stated to the committee, provides that the officer sought to be impeached shall be summoned before a committee of the house of representatives; shall have permission to cross-examine witnesses that are brought against him; shall have citation of the witnesses he may desire to summon; that the house of representatives shall act only in case the committee report in favor of the impeachment; that if the committee report adversely to it, that is itself an acquittal, and the officer cannot ever be arraigned on the charges then reported on. No such proceedings were had in this case.

Certainly not. The least delay would have been fatal to the plans of these conspirators. A guilty hurry, an illegal haste marks the whole of this thing from beginning to end. And the part we are to consider now is that information of this was at once made known to the executive branch of this Government. Here are the official telegrams before the Senate and they have been before the Senate and the country for more than two years; and in the face of this wholesale breaking down of law Pinchback, the so-called acting governor, is recognized by the President of the United States, and then, as we know, the price of Pinchback's action in conspiring to overthrow the constitution and laws of his own State and thrust out McEnery and thrust in Kellogg—the price of that is the certificate which the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] has paraded day after day before this Senate and told us that all these facts before us constituted a prima facie case which we had no rightful power to examine into before we admitted a claimant with such credentials as these!

Well, sir, if the people of this country do not want to understand this case they can refuse to; if they choose to turn their backs on these shameful facts, they can; but I do not think they will, and when they once comprehend them I cannot doubt what disposition they will make of Pinchback and the Pinchback party.

Now, Mr. President, after Pinchback is installed, after more troops are called, after McEnery and his legislature are driven at the point of the bayonet from a building in which they had assembled to perform their duties under the laws of that State, after they are crushed out entirely by the combined forces of the United States military and Packard's marshals, we come to the part of the President of the United States which we are called upon to-day to approve. I am glad it is not necessary for me to find language of my own or charges of my own in respect to that. It is all furnished by the committee of the Senate. I shall first read short extracts from the opinion of the majority of the committee, all of them republicans of high standing in this body.

I have read to the Senate the President's message of the 13th of January, saying that to his mind "it was clear" that there was jurisdiction in the case of Kellogg against Warmoth, and arguing that the action of the judge was sustained in morals if not in actual law. The committee of the Senate, at page 27, declares:

Viewed in any light in which your committee can consider them, the orders and injunctions made and granted by Judge Durell in this cause are most reprehensible, erroneous in point of law, and are wholly void for want of jurisdiction; and your committee must express their sorrow and humiliation that a judge of the United States should have proceeded in such flagrant disregard of his duty, and have so far overstepped the limits of "Federal jurisdiction."

* * * * * * *

There is nothing in all the comedy of blunders and frauds under consideration more indefensible than the pretended canvass of this board.

The Lynch board.

They then proceed to show the fact that the Lynch board had no single return before them; that they had no justification for any fact they found, and that their whole majorities as stated in favor of Kellogg were the purest fictions, created by wild estimates of what might or what they thought would have been the majority for their candidates under other circumstances.

The supreme court—

That decision has been avouched as giving color of law to Kellogg's title—

The supreme court, in the case referred to, is understood not to have had any testimony before it showing the character of the proceedings by the Lynch board, which testimony is before your committee very fully. Fraud vitiates everything, and it is certain that no court, upon the testimony before your committee, could hold the canvass by that board to be valid.

Now remember it is upon the action of that board that the President of the United States to-day justifies himself in sustaining Kellogg there.

Second. In the opinion of your committee the supreme court had no jurisdiction of the case in which they made the decision. The judgments of every court, the most exalted in character, are absolutely void, if rendered without jurisdiction. But this point will be considered more fully hereafter.

Third. But for the interference of Judge Durell in the matter of this State election, a matter wholly beyond his jurisdiction, the McEnery government would to-day have been the de facto government of the State. Judge Durell interposed the Army of the United States between the people of Louisiana and the only government which has the semblance of regularity, and the result of this has been to establish the Kellogg government, so far as that State now has any government. For the United States to interfere in a State election, and by the employment of troops set up a governor and Legislature without a shadow of right, and then to refuse redress of the wrong, upon the ground that to grant relief would be interfering with the rights of the State, is a proposition difficult to utter with a grave countenance.

At page 44 of the same report—

It is the opinion of your committee that but for the unjustifiable interference of Judge Durell, whose orders were executed by United States troops, the canvass made by the De Feriet board and promulgated by the governor declaring McEnery to have been elected governor, &c., and also declaring who had been elected to the Legislature, would have been acquiesced in by the people, and that government would have entered quietly upon the exercise of the sovereign power of the State.

And the committee continue to speak of the government of Kellogg as "a pretended State government," and declare that it is one that the United States cannot "honestly maintain." I need scarcely read the views of Mr. Trumbull, of Illinois, who assented, as I believe the entire committee did, to the facts as stated here. Even the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] declared at page 76 of this report:

The conduct of Judge Durell, sitting in the circuit court of the United States, cannot be justified or defended. He grossly exceeded his jurisdiction, and assumed the exercise of powers to which he could lay no claim.

Mr. Hill, of Georgia, agreed with the views of the committee, except that he proposed a different remedy. I will read at page 62 from the summary of Mr. Trumbull:

In view of the facts as shown to exist in Louisiana, the decisions of its courts in favor of the validity of the Pinchback legislature are entitled to no respect whatever. As has been already shown, that Legislature was not elected nor brought into being by the people of the State, but owes its existence to the void proceedings of the United States court supported by military force. It was the creature of force and fraud. Its first act was to impeach and suspend the governor (Warmoth) and install Pinchback in his place. It then abolished one court and set up another in its place, and Pinchback appointed Hawkins, one of the Lynch returning board, judge of the newly-established court. To give any consideration to the decisions of a court thus set up would be to aid the usurpation. Hawkins counts in spurious members of the Legislature; that Legislature makes a governor, who makes Hawkins judge, and Hawkins then decides the Legislature to be legal.

Such is the language of a committee of this body after many weeks of great labor. Not only was this report made, and this fact not dissented from by any member of that committee, but it was sustained in the presence of the Senate and before the country by two arguments, lasting, I think, the better part of three days on the part of the Senator from Wisconsin no longer a member of this body, who demonstrated the truth of his report until no one was left who could avouch any proof in support of the contrary view.

But, Mr. President, others have acted upon this case. In the case of Sheridan vs. Pinchback, a case of contested election, Mr. Smith, of

New York, from the committee, submitted a report from which I will read. Pinchback it seems certified himself on the 30th of December, 1872, as having been elected to the House of Representatives as the Representative at large in the State of Louisiana over Mr. George A. Sheridan, and his convenient friend Mr. William P. Kellogg gives a supplemental certificate on the 11th of March, 1874, in favor of Pinchback. But the House of Representatives, acting through their Committee on Elections, report, from which I read:

Is Mr. Pinchback shown entitled upon the merits to this seat?

Your committee think not. Mr. Pinchback's original certificate, it was conceded, and Governor Kellogg's supplemental certificate, it is to be assumed, were issued upon the pretended canvass by the returning board known as the "Lynch board." Assuming that the Lynch board was the legal returning board, and waiving the consideration of the effect of Mr. Pinchback's default in making no response to Mr. Sheridan's notice of contest, your committee are of opinion that the fact that the Lynch board never had possession of the election returns, and therefore never canvassed them, has become a part of the political history of the country. They hold this fact to be so notorious that the House ought to take legislative notice of it in this contest, and may take like notice of it for the purpose of any appropriate legislation. They report, therefore, that upon the case as presented to your committee, Mr. Pinchback is not shown to be entitled to a seat in this House.

Mr. President, Kellogg ran upon the same ticket with Pinchback. The same canvass was made by the Lynch board of the votes for Kellogg as were made for Pinchback, the Legislature and all. The ballots and returns, which to-day are in existence, which have been in this Capitol, which have been submitted to a committee of this body, which can to-day be brought again for the purpose of examination and tabulation should it be required—all these show that Pinchback ran for Congress at large on the same ticket with Kellogg. The House of Representatives reject his claim altogether upon the ground that there never was any real canvass of the votes for him; and consequently, of course, there was no legal return of the votes and canvass of the votes for governor.

And further let me say, at the close of the session in a manner that may be satisfactory to them but will scarcely be to the people of this country, after keeping that seat vacant and keeping Sheridan out of it for nearly two years, they admitted him on the last day of the session—I will not say to the duties of his office but simply to its emoluments. They thus declared Sheridan upon the canvass at large was the duly elected Congressman for the State of Louisiana and not Pinchback. Therefore it follows that Kellogg who ran upon the gubernatorial ticket against McEnery, on the same ticket with Pinchback, was not elected. Therefore we have the voices of the two Houses to the effect that Mr. Kellogg never was elected governor of Louisiana.

But, sir, this matter came again to be considered. Mr. Jeremiah Wilson, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted, on the 17th of June, 1874, a report upon a resolution authorizing the committee to inquire and report "whether Judge E. H. Durell, judge of the district court of the United States for the southern district of Louisiana, shall be impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors, and that said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers." The charges made against Mr. Durell were various. He was charged with corruption in connection with an assignee in bankruptcy, one Norton. He was charged with gross intoxication, and he was charged with usurpation of power and malfeasance in office in connection with the election of 1872. The committee refused to recommend the impeachment of Judge Durell for alleged corruption in office. They refused to recommend his impeachment or to present articles for his impeachment upon the ground of his gross intoxication, but they do recommend his impeachment for his conduct in the case of Kellogg against Warmoth. At pages 10, 11, and 12 of this report they state their conclusions, and I will ask the Clerk to read this as my voice is somewhat fatigued.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Thus a Federal judge, on an action brought in a United States court to preserve evidence of the offer and exclusion of colored votes at a State election, in addition to an injunction restraining the destruction or removal of such evidence, of his own motion, in the night, issued an absolute order to prevent the assembling of a State Legislature, when he neither had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such election, nor of the persons declared to be elected, nor of the board by which the declaration of the election had been made, nor were these parties brought before the court by bill, petition, answer, or plea in the cause, and this, too, when he knew that the marshal was authorized to use the troops of the United States and that there might be armed collision arising from the execution of his order.

It has been said that in this proceeding Judge Durell was actuated by a desire to preserve the public peace and by a real conviction that the Kellogg ticket had received a majority of the bona fide votes. But were that so we do not see that it could alter the case before us.

The Constitution has not committed to the Federal courts the determination of State elections. Nothing can be more absolutely and directly in conflict with the whole scheme of government which prevails in these States than for the Federal authorities to assume to determine the validity and result of State elections. The subject is wholly without the jurisdiction of the Federal courts. No circumstances can confer, nor allegations clothe, a tribunal with such power, and yet Judge Durell assumed of his own motion to assert such a jurisdiction in an action which did not even assume to bring the subject before the court, and by an order against those who were neither parties to the record, nor had been, or had any opportunity to be heard.

So far as his action was concerned, it seems to us that it was absolutely immaterial whether the Kellogg or the McEnery ticket were elected, whether the Wiltz-De Feriet board was lawful or unlawful, or whether they truly or falsely counted the vote for State officers. Those were all questions concerning the State of Louisiana, and that State alone, to be determined by her tribunals, and by her tribunals alone, and in respect of which neither the fifth circuit, nor any Federal court, nor any United States judge had any jurisdiction, or color of jurisdiction, or of rightful power or authority.

The assumption by a judge of authority where he has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter or of the person is a wrong and an offense, and is the more so where he has neither jurisdiction of the subject nor of the person. This would be so in any country. But such an offense becomes more flagrant in a government whose fundamental principle is a division of the powers of government between independent departments. Much has been said, and justly said, of the necessity of preserving the independence of the judiciary. "Whatever," says Burke, "is supreme in a state ought to give security to justice against its power. It ought to make its judicature as if it were something exterior to the state."

But it is equally, nay, if possible, more necessary that the exercise of judicial power should be confined to its proper functions. For courts to determine what was the government in a State, and to determine it where there was neither a proper case nor question, nor parties before it to determine, would be to make the judges, not the people, those who choose the rulers, and to deliver the government to their absolute choice and power.

And just as in no system of government is judicial usurpation so dangerous as in a republican government, so in no form of republican government can such usurpation be so dangerous as in the dual government of these States when exercised by the Federal justices.

It would be monstrous for a State judge to issue his fiat in a case in which he had no jurisdiction, with a view of unseating one set of officers or legislators, and establishing another in the government of a State. But such an order would be as idle as monstrous, and would at once be resisted and defied.

But for a Federal judge to assume such authority with regard to a State would be not only wrong but dangerous, and the more wicked because so dangerous.

The supreme nature of the power of the Federal Government within constitutional limits, and the authority of the Federal courts to decide as to those limits, make the exercise of this authority by the Federal courts always grave and delicate. It is an authority which the supreme Federal tribunal itself has declared the exceeding gravity and delicacy of exercising. It is a power which, as against States themselves, has in every case whatever been distinctly and absolutely refused. For a Federal judge to seek, therefore, to exercise such power by indirection, to promulgate an order in a case where he had neither jurisdiction of the subject-matter nor of the parties, in pursuance of which the Federal Army and Executive were set in motion, to take possession of the government of a State, seems to us to be the most flagrant offense and abuse of power and authority that a judge could commit; one which, whether well or ill intended, was destructive of every principle and right, in the highest degree dangerous to republican government, and a high crime and misdemeanor under the Constitution of the United States.

The Senate committee pronounced this order "without parallel," and expressed its "hope that it would remain so in judicial proceedings." They declared "that it was impossible to conceive of a more irregular, illegal, and in every way inexcusable act upon the part of a judge." Conceding the power of the court to make such an order, the judge, out of court, had no more authority to make it than had the marshal. It has not even the form of judicial process. It was not sealed, nor was it signed by the clerk, and had no more legal effect than an order issued by any private citizen.

But had the court been in session, had the order been accompanied with all due formalities, none the less would it have remained that it was an order without jurisdiction, and without color or authority of law; that it was an attempt by a Federal judge to usurp the control and power of a sovereign State, and to usurp it at a time the most critical and dangerous.

Such action, from whatever motive, is at variance with every principle of good government, is calculated to confound and subvert the distinctions between the State and Federal governments, and to overthrow the Constitution itself, without which neither Judge Durell nor any other judge has any rightful authority whatever. If conduct so dangerous, so flagrant, so unauthorized, so wholly without color of right, and followed by such serious consequences, do not constitute a high crime and misdemeanor for which the judge guilty thereof should be arraigned and tried, it seems to us that no conduct can. The respect for the judicial office, and the sacred character of judicial authority throughout this nation, make it more esssential that such usurpations should be rebuked and such outrages and unwarranted assumptions of power brought to condign punishment.

Your committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Edward H. Durell, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors in office.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, a committee of the House of Representatives of the same political party with Judge Durell investigated that question, and the result was to find not only that the action of this judge upon the result of an election whose proceedings the President of the United States in his message tells us the State administration of William P. Kellogg was authorized—they report that it not only was void but criminally void, that they recommend that he be impeached, and they proceed to name managers on the part of the House of Representatives and of the people of the United States to impeach this man for high crimes and misdemeanors in office. It was not simply by a mistake; it was not one of those errors into which the most honest minds may fall; but in rendering that decree and making that midnight order he had so sinned in his great office, he had so purposely and deliberately assumed unlawful powers, he had so criminally conspired against the laws which protected or which should have protected the people of that State, that he was resolved to be guilty of high crime and misdemeanor. And what was his high crime and misdemeanor? It was his action in the cases of Kellogg against Warmoth and Antoine against Warmoth which caused him to be so held guilty; and knowing his guilt he fled from trial, and in open court before the American people he confessed by his flight his guilt. It is upon that high crime and misdemeanor, the consequences of which Durell was afraid to face, that the President of the United States to-day bases his right to recognize and keep the guilty recipient of office at the hands of Durell and of Packard in office and in power in Louisiana, and the Senate are asked, and I suppose not in vain, to give their assent to such a proposition.

Mr. President, in addition to the reports I have referred to we have also a most able report from two well-known and respected members of our own body, one my respected colleague [Mr. SAULSBURY] and the other the able Senator from Maryland who is no longer a member of the body, made on the 14th of February last in the case of Pinchback. These two Senators on page 21 of their minority report say:

The simple detail of these facts—

They had related the manner by which Durell had caused the State-house to be seized and consummated the plot for the destruction of the State government of Louisiana—

The simple detail of these facts ought to be sufficient in themselves to characterize the whole transaction, without any illustration upon our part. There was not a step taken in the whole proceeding that is to be justified; there is no single act to be supported by any resort to reason, law, or justice. The reckless assumption of Judge Durell to interpose in matters wholly belonging to the State authorities, and in terms prohibited from doing what he did by the very law of Congress under which he pretended to derive authority to act, is beyond all precedent, and one cannot adequately characterize it in language to be used here. The atrocity of his action in directing the marshal of the United States to seize the State-house, where the Legislature of the State was to convene, and further directing him to allow certain of its members only to enter it, has but few parallels anywhere, and none before in American history. The whole proceeding, from its inception down to its final consummation, was a gross usurpation, accompanied with every species of fraud and tyranny. The body that was organized under this mandate and its military enforcement is not entitled to any legal existence that any American should acknowledge. The whole is a product of fraud, conspiracy, and of armed force, and is entitled to no consideration.

They then pass to the consideration of the legislative portion of the Kellogg government:

Judge Durell had no power to issue his mandate, and the troops had no right to enforce it. In the whole tragedy of events, as each succeeded the other, there was not one single act that could for a moment give a color of right to any other. Every one was an undoubted wrong, crime, or usurpation, and yet all combined, and nothing else, organized this body and kept it in being. Can such a body, we ask, so organized, put upon the Senate and upon the people of Louisiana their creature, and be one of the main conspirators? Kellogg, Pinchback, Casey, Packard, Durell, and Williams, names indelibly written upon every page of this most unnatural history of political crime and folly! There is not a single act in the whole proceeding to mitigate the unqualified condemnation it must receive at the hands of every honest man and of every sincere lover of American liberty and of constitutional government.

They say in conclusion:

In our opinion, there is nothing in the matters that would be set up to secure a recognition of the Kellogg government. The whole is a crime against our civilization and a blot upon our free institutions.

Such, Mr. President, has been the deliberate conscientious report of the committees that have examined this subject in its various branches in either House of Congress. They have joined in one voice of protest, of denunciation of the attempt to create a government upon such manifest frauds. To their denunciation will, I am sure, be added the execration of the present and succeeding generations. I cannot believe that the American people can accustom themselves to such wrongs as these. Certain it is that I shall do all in my power to keep alive in their hearts that hatred, that detestation of this fraud, and nothing shall prevent me from seeking to have that censure which is due to each actor in this case carried home to the door where it belongs. Nor can I believe it will be found to be an element of strength or popularity before the American people for any man or for any party of men to attempt to justify such events as I have endeavored here to portray. And yet, sir, in the face of all this—for I have not read what was new, I have read that which is history and has been history for the past two years—the President of the United States complains and says:

It has been bitterly and persistently alleged that Kellogg was not elected.

Yes, sir; I should think it had been both bitterly and persistently alleged that Kellogg was not elected. For my own part, condemning no man for that opinion to which his own conscience may lead him, I cannot see how an unbiased and honest human mind can be led to anything except "bitter and persistent denunciation" not only in the initiation of the wrong but in the progress of the wrong, at every step even unto its present consummation, upon which we are asked now to set our seal of approval.

I will read a short extract from a work upon constitutional government by a distinguished jurist of Michigan, Judge Cooley, in which, speaking of this interference on the part of the Executive with the legitimate government of States, he says:

The recent case of Louisiana demonstrates that there may be greater wrongs than even the wrongful refusal by Congress to recognize the legitimate government of a State, and yet no speedy and effectual remedy be attainable. Such action on the part of Congress would at least be that of a proper authority, and would imply deliberation, and be supported by a presumption of due regard for the public good and for the supremacy of the law. But in the case of Louisiana in 1873, an inferior Federal judge, without a shadow of authority, and consequently in defiance of law, and for that reason supported by no presumption of correct motives, and with scarcely a pretense of observing even the usual forms, by the process of his court, aided by a military force, installed in power a State government which he sided with as against rival claimants, and in consequence of a pressure of business in Congress precluding prompt attention to the case by that body, has been enabled to sustain this government in power until the present time. Mr. Justice Story has with reason predicted that "if a despotic or monarchical government were established in one State it would bring on the ruin of the whole Republic." What government can be more despotic than one elected by an injunction, and continued in power by a military force under the order of a judge who, having no jurisdiction, is restrained by no law but his own arbitrary will?

For the facts of this unparalleled wrong we refer to reports made by the Judiciary Committee of the United States Senate in February, 1873. The case requires no further comment than it there receives. The dullest mind cannot fail to see that the facility with which the wrong is committed and the possible immediate advantages which individuals may derive therefrom present constant temptations to its repetition, and if suffered to pass once unrebuked a precedent will be tacitly asserted which cannot fail to threaten constant danger to our liberties, especially at those very periods of high political excitement when prudence, caution, and the strictest regard for the Constitution and the laws are most important. What party or what political leader can at such times be expected to pay scrupulous deference to the laws if a judge may ignore them with impunity? It was thought the climax of wrong had been reached when a local judge in one of the States could seize upon the property of individuals and corporations through his injunctions and mandates and plunder them through receivers; but he at least was not acting wholly without jurisdiction, and if he seized property, he did not venture to go so far as to make the liberties of the people the subject of a receivership.

The praise accorded by the Senator from Wisconsin to the work from which the extract is made was not undue; but his speech was made more than one year ago; and if he considered the example dangerous at that time, how much more dangerous does it become from its deliberate continuance? Haste, a want of opportunity to become acquainted with facts, may palliate in some degree the erroneous action of a judge or of any other official. But when opportunity for information has been given, when abundant information has been given or that there is no longer excuse of any kind left for error, what shall we say when a fresh proposition is made, as now by the resolution before the Senate, in the light of all the facts with the superadded proofs that have come to us since the time that speech was delivered, what are we to say about a renewed and still more deliberate effort? No, Mr. President, such as I have described by calling upon the records of the Senate and the House to disclose the truth, is the basis of the title of Kellogg and his Legislature to office under the constitution and the laws of Louisiana. Language such as has never before been applied to any but the worst criminals stands upon the records of this Congress applied to him; and the whole State of Louisiana to-day is one vast, many-tongued witness against the whole of this conspiracy against her liberties. The great body of the American people join in this condemnation, and it is a vain task for the majority of this Senate to suppose that they can by a caucus resolution stay the tide of that public justice and of that honest indignation which must visit all men, high or low, who have been concerned in this overthrow of the State of Louisiana and the rights of her people.

Mr. President, the action of the executive branch of this Government, his Cabinet counselors, the Army of the United States, was in so far successful that Kellogg has been retained in power—I will not say in office for office he never held—he has been retained in power as the governor of Louisiana and a Legislature akin to him in objects and character have governed or misgoverned that State. Congress did nothing to relieve it. They attempted nothing to relieve it. The President of the United States did ask that Congress should act. At the same time Congress was unwilling to act in the only way that the Constitution and laws as I think authorized. The remedy always was plain. It needed but the withdrawal of the United States troops. Kellogg had no strength there, and none knew it better than he. On the 14th of last September his partisan police provoked a conflict with a number of citizens who had bought and paid for private arms which they had a right to own and a right to bear under the warrant of the Constitution of the United States. But Kellogg's police proposed to impair and infringe that right, and so, not satisfied with having robbed those people under the forms of taxation, steeped them in poverty almost to the very lips through the forms of government, in which he was sustained by the United States power, he still sought to take from them the right of self-defense and the right to bear arms, and that produced a collision, for as I am informed of the emeute of the 14th of September last it was not a design to "push him from his stool" of unlawful power and overthrow his government, but it was a sudden, unexpected collision, in which the force and wrath of the people he had so oppressed was suddenly brought in contact with his own shameful self-consciousness of infamy and cowardice, and in an instant the collision took place to obtain possession of arms that had been bought and paid for by the citizens of that State and which they had as much right to receive as any other merchandise sent to them of a lawful character. That collision disclosed the mere shell there was, that he had not even the confidence and support of his own pretorian guards. His armed policemen, his marshals, his retainers, paid, clothed, and fattened out of the depleted treasury of that State, did not stand by him for a moment. He was a man of straw and he was burned up like any other bundle of straw, he was scorched out of existence by the very breath of the indignant people whom he had so long oppressed. He fled like a coward from his own conscience. The blood that was there spilled was almost an accident; and the whole world saw that Kellogg had neither moral nor physical support to sustain himself in the government of a State which we are told rests "upon the consent of the governed!" And such was the mockery of a "government" that the President of the United States made such hot haste to rehabilitate. I do not stand to discuss the question of de jure or de facto. It was known to him that Kellogg was hateful to the sentiment of the people of his State. He knew that it was against their consent and against their laws and against the forms of election that he had been picked up by the President himself and installed in power—that by military force alone and by no color of law was he there. And yet with dogged, characteristic, persistent "rigor," to use his own phrase, he reseated this poor creature, propped him up again with bayonets to rule over the people of that State.

Then comes the election of 1874. It is not only the events of 1872 that we are called upon to approve, but also of 1874, and what the events of 1874 are or rather what are to be their results we do not yet know. This revolution has proceeded; these anomalies in our Government have been continued. To-day, as one of the fruits of this lawless interference in Louisiana, the country witnesses the spectacle of a volunteer committee, composed of members of the late Congress not one of whom is a citizen of Louisiana or in any way was authorized by her constitution and laws, sitting in the city of New York and there passing upon the election, the qualifications, and the returns of members of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana. This proceeding is still pending, this farce or tragedy, call it what you will; and whether you look at it with smiles or look at it through hot tears, is still being played, and we are called upon here to approve it as it was, to approve it as it is, and to approve it as it may become in the discretion or caprice of the Administration which has laid its lawless hands upon this poor, unhappy, downtrodden State. The President in his annual message to Congress recommended investigation; an investigation was ordered by the House of Representatives and made by a committee composed of men of character and intelligence second to none, of political affiliation that ought to have been satisfactory to the Administration but it was not. They visited Louisiana, returned and reported, and no one has ventured to question their facts or conclusions. They tell you unanimously there was a conservative majority in the lower house of twenty-nine members and that the act of De Trobriand and his troops in ejecting them was not simply unwarranted in law but absolutely and per se unjust. It is understood the entire committee agree in considering entitled to seats in the Legislature the identical five men whom the mailed hand of General De Trobriand's dragoons forced from their seats in the Louisiana house of representatives.

Mr. COOPER. With the consent of the Senator from Delaware, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I hope not.

Mr. BAYARD. I am fatigued.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WINDOM, (after having first voted in the negative.) I ask to withdraw my vote. I voted by mistake. I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.]

Mr. LOGAN. On a motion to adjourn?

Mr. WINDOM. For the present I decline to vote.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Robertson, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, and West—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Christiancy, Clayton, Conover, Dawes, Dennis, Ferry of Connecticut, Hamlin, Johnston of Virginia, Merrimon, Patterson, Wadleigh, Windom, and Wright—15.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, in 1872 the thin veil and wretched pretense of respect for law were thrown around the action of the United States military in enforcing the decree of Judge Durell, but none whatever in the action of 1874. The breaking up of that Legislature by Federal armed force was an open, barefaced act of lawless power. It has been repeated since at Vicksburgh. There the sheriff of the county, sitting peaceably and alone in his office, was driven out by a company of Sheridan's dragoons called in upon the request of Governor Ames, of Mississippi. There is no disguise about these things, and their undisguised outrage gives me reason to hope. In almost every quarter of the country expressions of disapproval strong and indignant have arisen, and many have found their way upon the records of this Senate. I desire the Clerk now to read the resolutions which have been passed by the Legislature of my State on this subject.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolutions condemning the recent interference with the organization of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana by the Federal Executive.

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Delaware in General Assembly met, That Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, in causing the invasion of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana by Federal soldiers, the arrest and dispersion of the members of the house of representatives thereof, and the subsequent illegal and forcible organization of a body of men to act as the house of representatives of said State, was guilty of an act of criminal usurpation which has no parallel in the history of the Republic; that such action was not only unauthorized by, but in plain violation of the Constitution of the United States, and tends directly to the subversion of constitutional government and the destruction of the Federal Union.

Resolved, That we the representatives of the people of the State of Delaware, which was the first to adopt the Federal Constitution, do in their name and in their behalf record our most solemn protest against this dangerous act of usurpation by the Federal Executive, and invoke the authoritative mandate of the people of the whole country, that the constitutional limitations upon the exercise of executive power shall be observed, that usurpation shall immediately cease, that constitutional government shall be preserved, that civil liberty shall be maintained in every State of the Union, and that the military shall, in fact as it is in law, be made subordinate to the civil power.

Resolved, That we heartily sympathize with the people of Louisiana in their oppressed condition, and commend the patience and forbearance with which they have borne the unprovoked assaults upon their constitutional rights and liberties by the military power of the country.

Resolved, That our Senators are hereby instructed, and our Representatives in Congress requested, to use all legal means in their power to secure to the State of Louisiana her just rights under the Constitution of the United States as a sovereign State of the Federal Union.

Adopted, at Dover, January 13, 1875.

THOMAS HOLCOMB,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
CHARLES C. STOCKLEY,
Speaker of the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. Resolutions of a similar tenor have been passed by other Legislatures and by very many conventions all over the country, in which men of all parties have joined in condemnation of the proceedings in Louisiana as necessarily fatal to our form of government, and which if approved must necessarily place the liberties of the minority in great jeopardy. I had supposed there were some propositions in regard to which American citizens could not differ, and that there were certain admitted rights which could not be drawn into controversy, and which when assailed all men would unite in protecting against invasion from any quarter. But it seems there are in the Halls of Congress a number of gentlemen who are willing to see their political opponents stripped of even such fundamental rights and to approve of the exercise of unlawful and extreme power over minorities. I hope they never will be, and with my consent they never shall be, endangered by the application of these dangerous doctrines which they now support in the resolution now before the Senate.

But, Mr. President, on the 8th day of last January I submitted to the Senate my views of the occurrences of the 4th of January as then disclosed to me by the facts. I read to the Senate certain telegrams sent in to the Senate by the President from Lieutenant-General Sheridan to the War Department in this city. I will read them and proceed to comment on the debate and utterances of Senators in criticism of what I then said.

I know that Senators have endeavored to fritter away the meaning and explain away the language of the Lieutenant-General, and by reading parts only of his telegrams. I remember the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] read one of Sheridan's telegrams in which he proposed to confine the operations of his military commissions to the ringleaders only of the armed White League, but that Senator omitted, unintentionally doubtless, a preceding telegram of the same date.

W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

Please say to the President that he need give himself no uneasiness about the condition of affairs here. I will preserve the peace, which it is not hard to do with the naval and military forces in and about the city; and if Congress will declare the White Leagues and other similar organizations, white or black, banditti, I will relieve it from the necessity of any special legislation for the preservation of peace and equality of rights in the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas, and the Executive from much of the trouble heretofore had in this section of the country.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General United States Army.

Then comes a second telegram dated on the same day, the 5th of January, 1875:

W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

I think that the terrorism now existing in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas could be entirely removed and confidence and fair-dealing established by the arrest and trial of the ringleaders of the armed White Leagues. If Congress would pass a bill declaring them banditti, they could be tried by a military commission. The ringleaders of this banditti, who murdered men here on the 14th of last September, and also more recently at Vicksburgh, Mississippi, should, in justice to law and order and the peace and prosperity of this southern part of the country, be punished. It is possible that if the President would issue a proclamation declaring them banditti no further action need be taken except that which would devolve upon me.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General United States Army.

These telegrams have been much discussed, and I do not think any one doubts that it was the design of Sheridan to relieve the President from any further trouble by taking their lives under the form of a military commission, no habeas corpus to test the cause of their detention, no due process of law which should secure deliberation and a trial by jury, with witnesses in attendance, before the punishment was inflicted, but the short, speedy, convenient process of a drum-head court-martial to be allotted to American citizens in four States, and not confined to "the ringleaders," as he terms them, of different leagues, but to be extended to "White Leagues and to other similar organizations," and we know from the report of the committee of investigation something of the numbers and character of the White League of the city of New Orleans alone. I refer to the report of the select committee of investigation. To comprehend what Sheridan intended, I will assume that he was as well informed of the character of the people whom he proposed to try by military commission, and suggested the President should declare banditti, as were this select committee who had gone to New Orleans under the deputation of Congress and as requested by the message of the President himself. On page 8 of the report we find:

In this connection we refer to the White League, mentioned in the message of the President. In the last campaign of Louisiana the opposition was composed of various elements, democrats, reformers, dissatisfied republicans, liberal republicans, old whigs; and in order to induce the co-operation of all, some of whom refused to unite with an organization called democratic, they took the name of "the people's party;" called in some localities "the conservative party;" in others, "the white man's party;" in others, "the White League;" and had ordinary political clubs under these names throughout the rural districts, which were ordinary political clubs and nothing more; neither secret, nor armed, nor otherwise different from usual political organizations. These must not, however, be confounded from similarity of name with the White League of the city of New Orleans.

That league is an organization composed of different clubs, numbering in all between twenty-five and twenty-eight hundred; the members of which have provided arms for themselves, and with or without arms engage in military drill. They have no uniforms, and the arms are the property of the individuals, not of the organization. They comprise a large number of reputable citizens and property-holders in the city of New Orleans. Their purpose they declare to be simply protective; a necessity occasioned by the existence of leagues among the blacks; by the hostility with which the Kellogg government arrayed the black against the white race; and by the want of security to peaceable citizens and their families, which existed for those reasons, and because also of the peculiar formation of the police brigade.

Such was the organization of citizens of that State proposed by Sheridan to be tried and put to death by his military commissions. And I here draw attention to the fact that it was not confined to the White League of New Orleans numbering twenty-eight hundred men, composed of reputable citizens and property-holders in that city, but it was to other similar organizations throughout four States that this power was asked for at the hands of the President. Here let me say that if I read the language of the President's message rightly he is full of regrets that it is not in his power to gratify the gentle and amiable request of General Sheridan. He says in his message to the Senate—although "it is exceedingly unpalatable to use troops in anticipation of danger"— the same military force has been continued in Louisiana as was sent there under the first call, and under the same general instructions. I repeat that the task assumed by the troops is not a pleasant one to them; that the Army is not composed of lawyers capable of judging at a moment's notice of just how far they can go in the maintenance of law and order, and that it was impossible to give specific instructions providing for all possible contingencies that might arise.

Under these circumstances—

That is to say, in the President's opinion, in the Army of the United States it is an excuse for a soldier in time of peace in breaking up a Legislature with whatever force may be required that he cannot be considered capable of judging at a moment's notice just how far he can go in the maintenance of law and order! If I read the results of this act of the 4th of January last rightly, if I shall read in the future what I expect to read of the judgment of the American people on this subject, any future President and any officer of the Army or the Navy of the United States will not be left in this innocent ignorance of "judging at a moment's notice just how far he can go," for he will know that if he obeys the invalid order of a court and brings into harm the person or the property of a citizen he shall answer for it at the bar of public justice to the outraged laws of his country, and that if he shall execute an invalid order which contains the death warrant of a citizen he shall be hung for murder if there be law left in this land.

Sir, the Army, instructed by the President after this, shall have, as I believe, new lessons as to the rights of their fellow-citizens, by whom they are paid and clothed and maintained, and it shall be as much the conscientious duty of a soldier or an officer to protect the life and property of a citizen, and that all his errors shall be in favor of peace and protection, and that he shall not be told that he can safely break up Legislatures, imprison men in time of peace, try them by military commissions, without incurring the same legal penalties as await any other outlaw.

I am fully aware, Mr. President, that he who steps into the arena of public debate and fearlessly strikes at that which he believes to be dangerous and wrong, must expect blows are to be received as well as given; that the approbation of friends will be answered by the denunciation of opponents, and so I ask no favors and fear no frowns. I did not suppose that my deliberate and pointed disapproval and denunciation of the correspondence from New Orleans between Lieutenant-General Sheridan and Mr. Belknap, the Secretary of War, would pass without question or leave me free from unfavorable comment.

Had Sheridan been my personal friend I do not think I would have used more restrained language. I do not care for the personality of the author. I make war against the doctrines he dares to avouch, and a high official to "thoroughly approve." I care not whose name is signed to such dispatches as those sent from the office of the military commander in New Orleans to the War Department on January 4 and 5, and which I declare contain propositions disgraceful to any official, civil or military, in any civilized government—propositions to destroy every bulwark of personal liberty and constitutional protection—to raze the fabric of our Government and place property and person outside the pale of the law. If it may be done in New Orleans it may be done in New York, or Washington, or Boston.

The sentiments expressed on this subject a few weeks ago in the latter cities by men of all parties—at meetings never equaled for numbers, earnest patriotism, and total absence of partisan feeling—are the same as the citizens of New Orleans have expressed, and which have drawn down upon them the wholesale railing accusations and calumny of General Sheridan.

If citizens may be proclaimed "banditti," and their lives and liberties denied the protection of law, what safeguard to their property is left? If personal obedience may be compelled without law, why may not pecuniary tribute be equally exacted? Why may not troops be billeted in the mansion of the banker or merchant and his safe and strong-box be compelled to yield their contents at the call of the same commander who can deprive him of those legal rights essential for the security of his person from arrest and incarceration which the charter of our Government was designed to secure?

Well may the merchants, the bankers, the men of wealth and substance in the Northern States, stand aghast at such propositions as General Sheridan makes to his official superior in the War Department, and which the latter "and all of us thoroughly approve." It will not do to attempt to divert the mind of the country from the real and frightful danger of tolerating for an instant such propositions. It will not do to dazzle the eyes of the people by appealing to shining service in war-time of a soldier who is destroying all the safeguards which laws create, or to answer just complaints by singing paeans to military glory. The public debt to a valiant soldier does not include his right to propose in times of peace measures fatal to free government. The American people will not be blinded by such tricky evasions of the real issue.

I have endeavored to express in a speech made here on the 8th instant my opinion of Sheridan's correspondence with Belknap. I gave utterance to a natural and unstudied expression of my feelings. Its object was to arouse the Senate and my country to a due sense of the danger contained in such propositions, and I hope was not altogether unsuccessful.

That a soldier, who is always and only a citizen of the Republic, should forget every duty of a citizen to civil law, and a leading member of the executive branch to "thoroughly approve" "all his telegrams" filled me with alarm and no little of what I believe and feel to be a just and righteous indignation. All this I endeavored to express quite regardless of the enmity I would probably excite in the breasts of those I denounced. If I could have condemned this great wrong, this dangerous and insolent precedent, without annoyance to any individual—have done it as it were quite impersonally—I should have preferred to do so, because I do not desire personal championship or admiration of military glory to obscure the real object and intent of my action. But as this it seems could not be done, then I only say I willingly take all the consequences, and shall stand here at all times trying to do my duty, looking within my own breast for justification and support.

But shocked as I was and am by the purport and intent of the Sheridan-Belknap correspondence and the failure of the President promptly to rebuke it, and by his message which quite excuses the action of his military subordinates, by declaring "nobody was disturbed by the military who had a legal right at that time to occupy a seat in the Legislature," and "it will be time enough to condemn those who, by such means as they have, prevent, &c. (Page 6 of message.)

Facts I may say which have been strangely contradicted by the unanimous report of the committee of investigation which was sent there by the House of Representatives. He also says on the first, second, and third pages of the message that it is "perhaps a debatable question" as to whether these parties were rightfully or wrongfully in the legislative chamber of Louisiana on the day of their dispersion; and again on page 7 that General Sheridan had never "proposed to do an illegal act or proceed beyond what the law in the future might authorize." A man who asks for a presidential proclamation to set aside every safeguard of the Constitution provided for civil liberty, has in the judgment of the President of the United States proposed nothing that is wrong! And again at page 8 he is still in doubt "if error has been committed by the Army in these matters; it has always been on the side of the preservation of good order." So it seems the presidential mind is still left in doubt as to whether everything in Louisiana was not conducted according to law, and in doubt whether anything has been proposed by any of his political friends or military subordinates there which can be a subject of doubt as to its precise propriety or legality! But here let me say the President in inferentially justifying or in extenuating the acts of his subordinates in Louisiana, says that his "soldiers are not lawyers," and I presume that he will take shelter for his own want of knowledge of the laws of his country in his personal and professional ignorance of civil government.

But here let me say how amazed and pained I have been to hear on the floor of the American Senate the adoption of a line of comment in extenuation if not absolute approval of Sheridan's correspondence and course in New Orleans. His telegrams proposing the trial of citizens by military commission, asking for presidential proclamations declaring them "banditti," and closing with the ominous and bloody hint that "nothing more would then be required than would devolve upon him," have been read and construed into rose-water phrases, innocent and even laudable by the technical skill of the Senator from New York, who proposed in the ecstacy of his admiration for Sheridan's action and correspondence in New Orleans to perform a number of startling things, and among them to execute a pas seul upon the tomb at Mount Vernon. The Senator so occupied would indeed be a study for the historical painter of the period.

Some phrases in the speech I made in denunciation of the Sheridan-Belknap correspondence have furnished themes for violent denunciation in various keys on this floor, to some of which I made reply, and none of which do I think worthy of much notice. The impression created upon me as I heard them, whether roared, or bellowed, or squeaked, was chiefly in sad reflection that the times we live in had so heated the minds of even Senators that they can applaud a demand to try civilians by military commission in time of peace, and assail the man who vigorously denounces the proposition. I shall not fear the judgment of the American people on this issue, and am content to abide by the record. Sheridan did not confine himself to the ring-leaders of the White League, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has said, any more than Belknap confined himself and "all of us" to the approval of Sheridan's acts.

The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] was exceedingly critical in extricating Mr. Belknap and "all of us" from the approval by saying "all of us have full confidence and thoroughly approve your course," and then again a second dispatch to say:

Be assured that the President and Cabinet confide in your wisdom and rest in the belief that all acts of yours have been and will be judicious.

But that is not all that Mr. Belknap said or meant. He said:

Your telegrams all received. The President and all of us have full confidence and thoroughly approve your course.

Therefore the approval of Mr. Belknap and "all of us" was given to these atrocious telegrams of Sheridan and to the propositions which those telegrams contained.

On January 13 the President sent in these telegrams with his message but never a word of reproof has fallen from him, on the contrary he has indorsed and approved all by keeping Sheridan in New Orleans to carry still further into effect, if he may, the policy which he intimated. In that he has been thwarted by the self-command, the dignity, the forbearance, the true heroism of that community. I knew they were brave men; I knew they had not shunned death at any time when they believed duty led them to confront it, and I admired as all admire courage in se; but I here say that my respect for those people has been increased by their being able to control their just resentments and command themselves. They are worthy to be freemen, and I believe that the public sentiment of this country will see to it that men who have shown their self-command under such circumstances of suffering and aggravation, who have abided by law, who having the strength to sweep away like cobwebs the power which was set up over them, have still stood in heroic patience waiting the final verdict which a just people I am sure will render in their case.

Now, Mr. President, I do not propose to go into the question of the action of the late returning board. As I said, even while we speak methods unknown to our laws are moulding the fate and the control of the government of Louisiana. What this compromise as it is called, what Messrs. Wheeler and Frye and Hoar may do in New York I know not; what will be the result I know not; but one thing I do know: it is all a make-shift, it is all hostile to the very spirit and letter of our system and laws, and it simply is to be justified, if justified at all, by the practical fact that Louisiana is in the hands of the spoiler and is endeavoring to make the best practical escape from his clutches. In that may God speed them; but even to aid them I cannot and I would not here vote for measures outside that charter of government which my oath has been pledged to maintain. Sir, it would be belittleing this case, it would be belittleing substantial justice to go into the question of the power of the returning board to ask whether they had a right to disfranchise any one or more of the parishes in the State of Louisiana. No man can read the constitution of that State and not see that the returning board had no pretense of power to declare any parish without a representative, because the constitution requires that each parish shall have at least one representative; and if they may disfranchise one parish, they may disfranchise any and all others, and so reduce their action to an absurdity. If fifty-six members are requisite to form a quorum of the house of representatives of the State of Louisiana and the returning board can declare vacancies in one-half the parishes, then you would have no quorum returned and consequently no organization. But we understand that the action of the returning board has not been sustained, that the men removed by De Trobriand have taken their seats, and that the action even of this minority of the committee of the House who went there last has resulted in giving a majority of the lower house to the conservatives of Louisiana.

Mr. President, the great prevalence of crime and disorder have been alleged in the State of Louisiana—I do not stoop to notice the insinuation or the suggestion that I and those with whom I act in this body can feel anything but hostility to crime or fraud in all their shapes whenever and wherever committed. I will not answer the suggestion that I favor unkindness or injustice to any man. Such suggestions are not fit to be made in this Chamber. If I did reply to them, it would be in terms so disrespectful to the questioners that they would regret my reply and the rules of the Senate would forbid me uttering it. But we have had from the President and his military commander in Louisiana allegations of the deluge of blood which has flowed in that State, and in every case under the instigation of political feeling, in which the men murdered were all republicans and the murderers of the opposite party. Such a picture is incredible, and I believe entirely untrue. It has been answered by men in conventions, from churches, from assemblages in the interest of commerce and of trade, any one of whom is entitled to equal respect with the Lieutenant-General who makes the charge.

But there are other facts which show that it is impossible for these wholesale charges to be true. I have taken occasion to examine the census of 1870 and obtain certain statistics of the percentage of deaths in the four States of Alabama, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Massachusetts, and I find the percentage of deaths in Alabama is a little more than one-half of the deaths in the State of Massachusetts; that is to say that there was a percentage of 1.08 in Alabama, and there was 1.77 per cent. in Massachusetts; in Louisiana there is 2 per cent. of deaths and in Massachusetts 1.77; in Arkansas there is 1.26; so that in the three States of Alabama, Louisiana, and Arkansas the average percentage of mortality is less than it is in the State of Massachusetts. The census taken in 1870 was under the direction of the present administration. The gentleman who conducted it, General Walker, I believe to be a gentleman of high character and large intelligence. We all know that the deputies through whom he acted were marshals of the United States, and all in the interest of the present administration. This same Marshal Packard, whose rule in Louisiana is sustained by the President to-day, is the marshal under whose auspices the census in Louisiana was taken. It was his deputies who reported these figures in Louisiana and they utterly refute and contradict the statements of General Sheridan. Either the census of 1870 is grossly, absurdly illusory and incorrect, or Sheridan's statements are utterly unreliable.

Why, sir, more than that, in Louisiana one-half of the population are negroes; the republican party claim that more than one-half are negroes; I believe the races are about equally divided. They are a people until within a very few years unaccustomed to taking care of themselves. The care of children in their infancy, the care of the aged people among them, which existed both from a cold sense of interest and a strong sense of personal regard in the days of negro slavery, have passed away; and the death rate among the infants and among the old people has vastly increased, and I may say also among the grown people who unaccustomed to take care of themselves in times of sickness have fallen victims to disease and have suffered greatly from destitution. It is not only so; but Louisiana never was as healthy a State, with the greater amount of alluvial and marshy lands in her limits than other States whose lands lay upon a higher level. We also know that owing to the poverty of the people and the mismanagement of their affairs the banks of the Mississippi have been broken down, the levees destroyed, and vast tracts of country flooded, producing great loss of life and property and a vast increase of malarious disease. So that in any way you look at it one would naturally expect the death rate of Louisiana would be increased by these causes since the war; but with all these reasons which I have given for rationally supposing that this death rate would be increased, we find that in point of fact it does not exceed the average in other States and we find in point of fact that the average death rate of these three States so grossly assailed by the Lieutenant-General of the Army is less than in the State of Massachusetts. It seems to me these statistics should of themselves be sufficient to refute this charge of wholesale murder and deluge of blood.

But more than that, I had some newspapers sent me from New Orleans the other day containing the account of the expulsion from the Hahn house of representatives of a negro named Ward. He was addressing the chair out of order; he was called upon to be seated and refused, and finally was removed by the sergeant-at-arms and his deputies. His conduct was most insolent, brutal, and defiant. After he was ejected members of the Legislature of his own party and his own color declared that he had been a most dangerous and infamous character and had himself caused the death of two hundred of his own race in Grant Parish, in what was known as the Colfax massacre, referred to at such length by the President in his late message. The Colfax massacre was indeed a horrible thing. No one can read the account without a shudder; and that massacre at Colfax has been charged upon the floor of this Senate and by the Lieutenant-General of the Army to have been instigated and committed by the white conservative politicians of that State to intimidate and crush out the negro voters.

I thought I had at my table copies of the New Orleans Republican sent to me with the account of the debate in the Legislature, the substance of which I have stated. That is but one refutation from a source the authority of which will not be denied on the other side of the Chamber of the wholesale slander upon the white people of that State which this Lieutenant-General has seen fit to utter.

So then I say the statements made by the Lieutenant-General of the Army to the President are so refuted as to important features as to destroy their credibility. There is a gross improbability attending such stories. Nor has there been one particle of proof worthy to be considered by the Senate of the perpetration of one of those acts. They are all general, railing, unsustained allegations made by a man who evidently hates the people whom he was sent to govern. One illustration I remember as to what he means by a "bandit" and the kind of person he desires to try by military commission is found on page 27 of the President's message. There the Lieutenant-General says:

During the few days in which I was in the city prior to the 4th of January the general topic of conversation was the scenes of bloodshed that were liable to occur on that day, and I repeatedly heard threats of assassinating the governor, and regrets expressed that he was not killed on the 14th of September last; also threats of the assassination of republican members of the house, in order to secure the election of a democratic speaker. I also knew of the kidnaping by the banditti of Mr. Cousinier, one of the members-elect of the Legislature.

At page 26 of the message Cousinier's case is again made the subject of long and special report by Sheridan; it was evidently the strongest he had obtained.

Now I just wish to show when we can pin General Sheridan down to a fact what his definition of a "bandit" is. We have got at last one case of what he considers the action of "banditti," which was the arrest and detention of Mr. Cousinier, one of the members-elect of the Hahn legislature. That fact is noted in the report of the committee on investigation, who were then on the spot, and who therefore may be considered more competent to speak upon the fact than Sheridan. Now let us see what were the real facts. On page 10 of the report of the committee they say:

At twelve o'clock noon William Vigers, the clerk of the last house, called the assembly to order and proceeded to call the roll of members as made up from the returns of the returning board. This roll contained the names of 106 members, classed by Governor Kellogg as 53 republicans and 53 democrats; but it is claimed that one of the democrats was not a "staying democrat." The republicans claimed that one of their members, A. G. Cousin, had been kidnaped and forcibly taken to a distant parish to prevent his presence at the organization of the house. Your committee was about to investigate this charge, when in public session it was claimed by the democratic counsel and admitted by the republican counsel that the arrest was under legal process and by the hands of the sheriff. It was further claimed, and not denied, that the privilege of his office did not shield him from arrest. The charge was embezzlement.

Now the Senate will see what constitutes "banditti" in the mind of the Lieutenant-General. Now you can see the character of the offenses for which he would try men by military commission, for the only case that he has ventured to name is one that we have been able to nail upon him, and to show the outrage committed upon this man (and which I do not pretend to defend) was committed by a republican sheriff in executing a writ issued from a republican court by the hand of a republican clerk and he was taken into legal custody under a charge of embezzlement; a charge I am sorry to say only too likely to be true in the class of men sought now to be kept in power over the people of Louisiana.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I ask the Senator from Delaware to yield that I may move that the Senate take a recess for half an hour.

Mr. BAYARD. I would rather, as far as I am concerned, go on. If my friend from New Jersey made the motion in my interest, I beg him to withdraw it.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BAYARD. I wish the Senate to observe this is a case in which Mr. Sheridan says (at page 27) he knew the facts. All the rest of these blood-and-thunder stories he parades he does not profess to know; he says they are told to him. He hears rumors of assassination, but when he comes to the case of Cousinier he says he knows of it being a case of kidnaping by banditti and when we come to discover the truth it is an arrest under State process for embezzlement. This case furnished the honorable Senator from New York a large and interesting theme. He paraded the iniquity of that arrest before the Senate and in a very elaborate and able speech, I think he gave about two pages to the description, the moral iniquity and outrage of this arrest and detention of Cousinier for the purpose of preventing his attendance in the Legislature. Sir, there is not one word that he has said of condemnation that I do not indorse. If it was true that this man was arrested under a false pretext in order to keep him out of the Legislature, I say it was an outrage for which the perpetrators should be punished; but it is plain the arrest was made at least under color of law. It was made by a republican sheriff holding a writ emanating from a court over which a republican judge presided. But since the Senator finds so much to excite his eloquence and denunciation in that case, I cannot forbear reading from page 7 of Mr. Scofield's report in the House of Representatives upon the manner in which such transactions were conducted in New Orleans in the interest of the republican party. On the 4th day of January, 1871, at the time of the convocation of the State senate and house of representatives on the call of Warmoth after the death of Lieutenant-Governor Dunn—

Affidavits were made by four members of the house charging the governor, four senators, and eighteen members of the house, all belonging to the Warmoth faction, together with some outside parties, with violations of the late act of Congress known as the Ku-Klux law, and procured warrants for their arrest. The two houses were to convene at twelve o'clock. A few minutes before that time some half-dozen deputy marshals visited the capitol and began serving these warrants. The defendants generally volunteered to go before the commissioner without arrest, and only one was actually arrested. The parties were detained before the commissioner, in giving bail, until about one o'clock. The other Warmoth members of the house attempted to absent themselves from the hall and thus leave the house without a quorum, but enough were forcibly detained to make fifty-one. With this number present, the house proceeded to unseat seven members of the Warmoth faction, and in their stead to seat six of the Carter party, leaving one vacancy. After transacting some other business they adjourned, to meet the next day at noon. By this proceeding the relative majority of the opposing parties was again reversed, and Carter was once more in the ascendant. It was now the turn of the other faction to show their fertility in expedients.

Here then in this same immaculate party which we are asked to keep in power in Louisiana we have not the arrest of one man under a charge of embezzlement, but we have the arrest of the governor himself, eighteen members of the house, and four members of the senate, and they are kept without bail for just such time as will enable the rump of the Legislature which is left behind to vote out seven of the members and thus give themselves a majority. This report was made on the 30th of May, 1872. It has been known to the Senate and the country ever since. What word of denunciation has come from the other side of the Chamber on this subject? As I say, when it comes to the arresting of this single man Cousinier, no words are sufficiently strong to express the horror and indignation of the Senator from New York; but when it comes to the arrest of a governor and four senators and eighteen representatives, it seems to be something so very venial as scarcely worthy to be noticed. I condemn both, but I cite the case of Cousinier for the purpose of showing that it was a case in which the Lieutenant-General assumed to speak of his own knowledge, and when the facts are developed it turns out that he had not a shadow of authority for the statement. If he meant to call the sheriff a "bandit" who arrested a man under a charge trumped up for the occasion, it shows what his definition of that word means and the kind of people he wanted to try by military commission.

I may say, to continue this wretched story of Louisiana politics, that on the same afternoon after Warmoth had lost his majority in the lower house—

The governor issued a proclamation convening the two houses in extraordinary session at half past four o'clock that afternoon. Fifty-five members, including those who had been unseated by the Carter party, attended. The other side had no notice of the meeting. In this extra session the work of the afternoon was declared void; Carter was deposed as speaker and expelled from the house, and a new speaker chosen. The next day the capitol was guarded by police and Carter forcibly excluded from the building. He and his supporters assembled at a hall in the city over the Gem saloon, and each party then had a house of its own.

But it turned out that Warmoth, having the control of the municipal police and the whole powers of the State, was too much for this other faction, and that he succeeded in maintaining himself. It was when Governor Warmoth quarreled outright with the Administration in Washington that he went down under military force.

Mr. President, I desire to read to the Senate the description by Colonel Morrow of the condition of Louisiana. It is found on page 70 of the communication from the Secretary of War, and as I said before was in the possession of that official and of the President of the United States at the time the special message was sent to us in which it was entirely omitted. Colonel Morrow made a tour of investigation through the northwestern part of Louisiana into the scenes of alleged disorder and submitted the following statement:

In relation to the necessity of sending more troops into that section of the State, I respectfully report that there is no need for more troops in any portion of the State of Louisiana visited by me. The scenes of violence and the reported infringements of law which were the immediate cause of troops being ordered into certain parishes seem to have aroused in the minds of law-abiding citizens a keener sense of their obligations to preserve law and order in their respective communities, and I am happy to be able to report that a healthier state of public sentiment is manifest in every section of the country; and I am of the opinion that the troops can be withdrawn from Alexandria, Colfax, and Natchitoches, and that there is no necessity for increasing the forces at any other point. I mean to be understood as saying that troops will not be required at these points to compel obedience to any law of the United States. Troops will be required, however, in nearly every section of the State to sustain the State authorities if Congress by appropriate legislation does not give some relief. The only necessity for the presence of troops at any point, so far as relates to offenses against laws of Congress, will arise from the duty of giving aid to the deputy United States marshals in cases where they may be resisted in the discharge of their legitimate duties of serving warrants for the arrest of offenders for violations of the law of Congress known as the "enforcement act;" and I am decidedly of the opinion that with proper management even in this class of cases few instances will arise in future in which a military posse will be required.

I am perfectly aware of the fact that the Federal troops have not been ordered into parishes except on the requisition of the civil authorities, and that if the use of troops has been abused, the censure for this cannot be laid at the door of the department commander; but inasmuch as it is openly charged by citizens, and is firmly believed, that United States troops have been used for political purposes, I recommend that stringent orders be issued to officers to whom applications for posses may be made that they are not to furnish the same except in cases where the marshal, unaided, has tried to serve his process and failed, and has made application to the citizens for proper assistance and has been refused. This I believe to be good policy as well as sound law, and, if strictly adhered to, I am confident fewer demands on the military for this duty will be made in the future than in the past, and that the Army will thereby be relieved from the performance of duties as obnoxious to the people of the country at large as they are disagreeable to the officers and men who have to discharge them.

He then proceeds to give an exceedingly intelligent statement of what he believes to be the true duty of a military officer in sustaining the civil law, which I commend to his brother officers everywhere. He then passed upon the conduct of Major Lewis Merrill, of the Seventh Cavalry, who went out of his way to make affidavits upon which the arrests of prominent citizens were made for alleged violations of the law of Congress known as the enforcement law.

Public feeling and opinion among the white population of all the parishes on Red River condemned Major Merrill's act, and the opinion was openly expressed that this officer, so far as his act could do it, has made the Army an active participant in a heated political controversy.

He states afterward that "the affidavits were made by Merrill himself," and says that Merrill—

Emphatically claimed that his act was that of Lewis Merrill, a citizen, and not of Major Lewis Merrill, an officer of the Army of the United States. Whether a military officer in an important command can separate his private from his official character, and, without subjecting himself to censure, take original action in his own person whereby he becomes identified with political partisans, and whereby also the whole Army is brought into disparagement in the minds of many well-disposed people of the country at large, and whereby also the reputation of the service for fair and impartial conduct in the delicate and responsible duties it is required to perform in conjunction with the civil authorities in this and other Southern States is impaired, I leave, without any expression of opinion on my own part, to the decision of higher authority.

The time was when it would not have been necessary for an officer to make such comment; but in the case of Merrill, shameful notoriety had followed him. This man had in 1871 been in the State of South Carolina on duty; he had there been placed in command of a district over which the President had proclaimed martial law, which left Merrill's will the sole law for the inhabitants.

Mr. NORWOOD, (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) The Senator from Delaware yields that I may move that the Senate adjourn. I submit that motion.

Mr. SPENCER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KELLY, (when his name was called.) Upon the main question and questions of adjournment I am paired with my colleague [Mr. MITCHELL] for this evening and during the night. I make the announcement at his request, and shall not vote.

Mr. MCDONALD, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with my colleague, [Mr. MORTON.]

Mr. STEVENSON, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] If he were here, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea" on this motion.

The call of the roll was concluded and the result announced—yeas 22, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Gordon, Hamilton, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones of Florida, Kernan, McCreery, Maxey, Norwood, Randolph, Saulsbury, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Sargent, Spencer, and West—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Conover, Dawes, Dennis, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Johnston of Virginia, Kelly, McDonald, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Ransom, Robertson, Sherman, Stevenson, Wadleigh, Windom, and Wright—22.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware still has the floor.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I now renew my motion that we take a recess for half an hour.

Mr. ANTHONY. I believe that a recess for a short time might lead to arrangements that would enable us to come to some conclusion on this resolution without the fatigue of a night session. I second the motion.

Several SENATORS. Say an hour.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I believe this is a wager of battle, a question of physical endurance; and for one I protest against any adjournment. Let us exhaust ourselves, and then reach the vote. If this question was to be submitted to fair and proper discussion, I should not be in favor of any factious opposition; but when it is brought in here and announced on the very morning that it is to be sat out, for one my own self-respect would not allow me to favor any arrangement whereby the very battle thus tendered shall be surrendered. I am in favor of a proper discussion of this question and then let the majority take the vote; but if they see proper to tender us the wager of battle, then I go against any recess whatever and let us see if we cannot settle this question upon the issue which they tender.

Mr. ANTHONY. If my friend from Delaware has sufficiently exhausted himself, I would like to ask him who made a statement that this was to be subjected to a test of physical endurance.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It has been talked around here all day.

Mr. ANTHONY. This is the first time I have heard of it, and I have talked with Senators on both sides.

Mr. SAULSBURY. When my colleague was on the floor and complained of being unwell and of being fatigued, and a motion was made in his behalf that we should adjourn, it was rejected, twice rejected; and from every indication we could have, as well as from private information, it was understood that this matter was to be sat out unless an arrangement was made. Now, for one, I am not in favor of factious opposition in the Senate of the United States; but when gentlemen come here and indicate a disposition to test the physical endurance of the Senate, I am perfectly willing to meet them upon their own ground.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not wish to make any discussion, certainly not with my friend from Delaware, on this matter; but I wish to say in behalf of our friends on this side of the Chamber that no such proposition has been made. We want no contest of physical endurance. On the contrary we want to fix a time when this question which has been debated for two months, a question upon which nothing new can be said by anybody, shall be brought to a close, giving every Senator upon the other side as much time as he wants to speak upon it; and it is in the hope that this recess may lead to such an amicable arrangement that I second the motion of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. RANDOLPH. My sole object in offering this motion was that Senators on this side of the House should have an opportunity for consultation. I do not pretend to know what the opinion of the majority of our friends is; but I think that no delay save that of the half hour can occur, and no detriment to any gentleman can follow, as the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] seems to apprehend. I do trust that, for the purpose of giving that rest which we all need and for the purpose of permitting a conference, the motion that I made that a recess be had will be acceded to. I should like to have it an hour, however, on further consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Make it till half past five; that will make square hours.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to make the recess until half past five, which will give eight minutes more than half an hour. The question is on the motion that the Senate take a recess until half past five o'clock.

Mr. MCDONALD. It seems to me that half an hour is no time at all for the purpose indicated.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I suggest six o'clock.

Several SENATORS. Half past five will do.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The difference of half an hour will be very little.

Several SENATORS. Let it be six o'clock.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I will change the motion to make the recess until six o'clock.

Mr. PATTERSON. I suggest that it be till half past seven. Let the recess be long enough to enable us to go home and get our dinners.

Mr. ANTHONY. If we take a long recess the Senate will scatter and may not come together again. I think until half past five will do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate take a recess until half past five.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I modify my motion by saying six o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question on the motion that the Senate take a recess until six o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and forty-six minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until six o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at six o'clock p. m.

PRESIDENT'S ACTION IN LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN on the 16th instant, the question being on the amendment moved this morning by Mr. ANTHONY.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, at the time the Senate took its recess I was commenting upon the report of Colonel Morrow, and had read that portion relating to the conduct of Major Merrill in undertaking at the same time to act in two characters, to act when he pleased as a private citizen or at will to assume official character, so that his rights as a citizen and his powers as an Army officer should be exerted at one and the same time. I thought it proper to pause and make this comment on Major Merrill, of whose conduct in the State of South Carolina I had some knowledge, which I had communicated to the Senate and caused by a Senate resolution to be communicated to the President and Secretary of War in the vain hope that conduct so unbecoming an officer of the Army and a gentleman would be promptly rebuked by those in authority. I offered in 1873 a resolution of inquiry asking whether this Army officer while on duty with extraordinary powers vested in him by the Commander-in-Chief, making his will the sole law for the people of a number of counties in the State of South Carolina, had been admitted to practice at the bar of that State and add to the official salary he was receiving from the Treasury of the United States the emolument of private professional pursuits; nay, more, had lobbied through the negro Legislature of that State bills appropriating large sums of money by way of reward to him for bringing to justice offenders against the Ku-Klux act, he having been sent to that State to perform the peculiar and precise duty of aiding the civil authorities in the execution of that law, and then turning his acts of obedience to the commission he bore into a source of private profit to be derived from the treasury of the State. I can conceive no act that should meet with the more prompt reprehension of any officer of the Army or of any American who had the honor and the welfare and the tone and character of that branch of the Government service at heart.

But, sir, although I did with difficulty obtain the passage of that resolution, and to do so had to accept an amendment offered by the Senator from New York or otherwise have the almost certainty of the defeat of my resolution, from that day to this no notice has been taken of the resolution by the Executive. On the contrary, in 1874 I made the attempt in the month of February to renew the resolution and ask why it had not been responded to. Objection was made by gentlemen of the dominant party in this Chamber. The last objection made to the consideration of the resolution was to allow the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PATTERSON] to make some comments on it, which he never has made from that day to this.

Not only was Merrill suffered to draw into his private pocket $21,400 from the treasury of South Carolina in the shape of rewards for the arrest and conviction of alleged Ku-Klux prisoners, which duty he was assigned by the United States to execute, but after that fact was known, published here in debate, published in the newspapers of the country, he is advanced in favor with the Administration and is sent to Louisiana, there to continue the practices of which he had been guilty in South Carolina and to stain the name of an American soldier by malpractice for which I think every honorable member of his profession must blush.

I have caused to be read to the Senate the comments of Colonel Morrow upon Merrill's conduct in Louisiana—a mischief-maker, a creator of disturbance, a hater and an enemy of the people among whom he went; and his reports are chosen as the proper representation of the condition of those people by the President, and with difficulty we obtained the other side in the statement of Colonel Morrow. Now I ask the Clerk to be kind enough to read for me from the report of Colonel Morrow the pages I have marked.

The Secretary read as follows:

I now come to the general condition of affairs in the parishes on Red River, and without the slightest exaggeration I may say it is bad. Respect and regard for the General Government are expressed by all classes of people, and so is the determination not to be, under any circumstances, brought into collision with the Federal troops; but there is a universal expression of contempt for the State government, and, so far as language could express it, there is open defiance of its authority. The governor is everywhere, and by almost every white man, denounced a "usurper," and the determination is openly expressed by nearly every white man not to submit to his usurpation longer than submission is compelled by the presence and force of Federal soldiers.

Dissatisfaction and discontent are plainly visible in all the acts and conversation of the people, and the result is manifest in almost every department of business. Uncultivated fields, unrepaired fences, roofless and dilapidated dwellings, and abandoned houses meet the eye at every step, and the whole aspect of the country has a look of poverty and neglect. The schools in many parishes are closed for want of money to pay the teachers, and I was told again and again that the school funds had been stolen by the State officials. In one parish a criminal court had not been held in nearly two years, and in other parishes no court, criminal or civil, had been held for a long time. In a community where there are no courts crime finds a genial soil, and the natural result is that the law has fallen into disregard and disrepute. Judges were openly charged with corruption, and money, and not justice, is charged with turning the judicial scales.

The people reported, and seem to believe, that the machinery of the Federal courts had been used to oppress them for political ends, and that the Federal troops had been used for political purposes. How far this has been the case I have no means of knowing, but I do believe that deputy United States marshals have used United States soldiers in cases where there was no necessity for them, and, from my investigations, in the parishes of Ouachita and Lincoln I am quite certain that these civil officers discharged their duties in an unnecessarily harsh, if not cruel, manner. It was represented to me that the marshals are in the habit of prowling through the country in the night-time, accompanied by a posse of soldiers, to make arrests of citizens who could be arrested by the marshal unaided, and, under any circumstances, should be arrested in the open daylight.

These night arrests seemed to have a peculiar terror for the people, and my attention was repeatedly called to them. Another subject of complaint was the fact that citizens are arrested without the shadow of a cause, and after long and vexatious delay and great expense are set at liberty without affording them even a preliminary hearing. And another subject of bitter complaint, especially in Coushatta, is the fact that there is not a United States commissioner in the parish, and persons arrested are required to be sent to the city of New Orleans, several hundred miles distant, for even an examination. The expense of getting witnesses to so distant a point will make even justice a luxury that only the rich can procure. A man of moderate means could not hope to prove his innocence if the presence of many witnesses was required for the purpose. The people at Coushatta complained also, and I think justly, that a person had been sent there last fall as commissioner who was a brother to one and brother-in-law to another of the unfortunate men who were so brutally and dastardly murdered in August last. However brutal may have been the circumstances attending the massacre of these men, it will be at once conceded by every man at all familiar with rules in American and English courts, that a near relative of the persons murdered is not a proper person to sit as judge in even a preliminary hearing.

These were complaints made to me against United States officials, and I therefore report them for the information of the department commander. The complaints against the State officers were so numerous that a mere enumeration of them would fill a volume. Corruption and jobbing in office; partiality and favoritism in the administration of justice; exorbitant taxes, rising in some instances to 7 and 8 per cent. on the appraised value of the property; a ruined credit; a depleted State and parish treasury; enormous debts, State and parish; and multiplication of officers in the persons of favored individuals, are a few of the charges made by the people against their State authorities.

Mr. COOPER, (at six o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) With the consent of the Senator from Delaware, who yields for that purpose, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEVENSON. I rise simply to announce that I am paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Gordon, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones of Florida, Kernan, McCreery, Maxey, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, Saulsbury, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, McMillan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Robertson, Sargent, Spencer, and West—28.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. BAYARD. This, Mr. President, is the sad picture drawn of one of the States of this Union by a military officer than whom the General of the Army knows of no officer better qualified to speak. Sir, does such a picture of wretchedness, of distress, provoke emotions of pity, of tender sympathy, or of animosity and anger? If these were not citizens of the United States, if they were not our own fellow-citizens, if the case stated was a simple abstract picture of suffering humanity, I cannot doubt that in this Chamber there would be but one opinion upon this subject, and that would be of indignation toward those who have brought such things to pass—of sorrow for those who were the victims of such misfortunes, of an instant desire to alleviate the trouble if it was within our power. But upon what strange times have we fallen when we read this picture of a community of our own fellow-citizens and hear of and see no measures proposed by those in authority save renewed oppressions, persecutions more stringent, and punitive legislation! At the next page of his report this officer goes on to say:

I not only do not believe, but I am absolutely certain, that there will not be at any time in Louisiana any organized or authorized resistance to the General Government. If the expressions of the people are to be believed, and I do believe them, there is a very sincere desire to live quietly under the protection of the Constitution of the United States and enjoy the blessings of the National Government. But there is no disguising the fact the protection afforded by the Federal Administration to the government of the present State executive is the cause of bitter personal and political feeling in the breasts of nineteen-twentieths of the white inhabitants of the State.

This is the executive who has arrayed against him the bitter personal and political feeling of nineteen-twentieths of the white population of the State, which means nineteen-twentieths of those who hold property in the State of any appreciable amount, and it is the protection and maintenance of that hated governor, that false and spurious ruler—it is such a man the Senate are called upon to ask the President to uphold and continue in power.

Why, Mr. President, what is the necessary result of such action? Is it not fatal to our Union? What is the result of a continuation of a system that has brought forth such fruits as these? Unhappiness to the community who are the immediate objects of such injustice, and relief in their minds from any sense of obligation or fealty to the Union of our States and our Government. If such a policy is to be continued, the destruction of the prosperity of all our people must necessarily follow. We are to-day amid all the financial errors, amid all the errors of unequal taxation, of mistaken excise and tariff policies, of extravagance and want of due economy in the various departments of the Government, of overspeculation and reaction by the gross errors of paper money and of an irredeemable currency. All these are oppressing the people of the United States. Their consequences are resting heavily upon them, and distress exists widespread and deep in many thousand homes in the North, industry is prostrated, enterprise is paralyzed, trade languishes, manufactures are unremunerative. All these are causes of distress and pecuniary trouble, but all together are not as potential causes of distress to the people of the North as the beggary which your reconstruction policy has brought upon the people of the South. Their poverty prevents them from becoming consumers, their want of money prevents them from becoming customers. They suffer, it is true, but they do not suffer alone; and if I were asked to-day to state the chief cause of the present depression of the whole country and the distress which we know exists throughout the Northern and the Middle States, I should say it was the distressed and desolate condition of the sixteen States south of the Potomac.

The loss of money brings distress. Wise laws may take the place of unwise laws, a defective and ruinous financial policy may be replaced by another sound and judicious, trade shall again be reinvigorated, commerce shall revive, and prosperity again may open her springs; but what is all that material prosperity if the hearts of the people are not together and the love of union and of a common country does not exist? O, Mr. President, it is the injustice that has driven these people from you, and is continuing to drive them from you, that forms to me a subject as an American most to be dreaded for the sake of my country.

It was once my duty to stand in a political convention composed almost entirely of zealous advocates for the nomination for the Presidency of Horace Greeley, and there to express my views as an independent thinker, yielding my contribution of an honest judgment in qualification of, if not decided opposition to, the prevailing sentiment of those who surrounded me. Time has in some degree enabled us to judge of the correctness of what I then said and advised, and I have no other object in this reference than to express my present sense of what this country owes to-day to the great-hearted man whose name was mentioned in debate on this Louisiana question some weeks ago in such disrespectful association.

The nomination of Horace Greeley had its impulse largely among the southern white people, whose opinions and prejudices had for more than one generation been strongly arrayed against him.

There had been no representative man of the North more signally the opponent of what may be called the southern system of thought and political action than Horace Greeley. He had lived to see this system utterly overthrown and revolutionized by force of arms, and in the wreck his ear caught the cry of human misery and sorrow that ever accompanies such sweeping changes in society, and his kind, warm heart recognized the appeal.

From the surrender of the southern armies until the grave closed over his form I believe the paramount object of Horace Greeley's life was to bring his fellow-countrymen into a better understanding with each other and inaugurate an era of peace and good-will, which should cement our Union of States and make American citizenship a tie of fraternity in all sections of the country.

To accomplish this he risked much that he valued. He braved great pecuniary loss, the indignation of his former political and personal allies, the angry denunciations of official power and a partisan press. To reunite his countrymen in the bonds of mutual kindness and good-will, he severed the ties of party organization and became the leader of a political forlorn hope, so far as the fate of the immediate canvass was concerned. And then he died. But the seed sowed in a good life did not die. It is to-day flourishing in the hearts of a generous people. Nearly 3,000,000 voters in 1872, of whom over 90 per cent. were democrats, responded to the sentiment for which Mr. Greeley struggled. Men looked into each others eyes with trust and not distrust. The hands of former political opponents met in friendly clasp, and sectional hatreds and geographical lines were obliterated from the hearts and memories of those who heard or read the wise and patriotic speeches made by him in the summer and fall of 1872.

The ancient Romans decorated with crowns those citizens who in the forum or in battle won distinction. The civic crown was of all the most glorious, and was awarded to him who had saved the life of a Roman citizen.

To whom could the American people more justly award the civic crown than to Horace Greely, who if he gained not the laurel of the conquerer surely deserved the oaken leaf of the pacificator. The Grecians constructed all monuments of civil strife of wood that the memories should not be lasting, while enduring brass marked victory over a foreign foe. It is the lesson that lies in this that shall save a country, and as Horace Greeley did seek to instil it into the hearts and minds of his countrymen, so do I believe he was their benefactor, and for this our own and future generations of Americans shall rise up and call him blessed.

Mr. President, in 1869 I came to the Senate of the United States, never having been a member of any public assembly prior to that time. My pursuits were congenial; the reward obtained was sufficient to give me a pecuniary independence. Those from whom I drew my blood, whose name I bear, had been too long in public life not to have become poor; and if my personal interests had been consulted I should have continued to seek those rewards that industry and fair intelligence will bring to any man in a profession for which he is at all adapted. I had but one object, and that I believe I have steadily pursued. The country that I love had been rent by discord and the hearts of its people had been alienated far, far from each other. I had no other object in coming here than to bring my fellow-countrymen into accord with each other, and I am not conscious since I came that a word has been uttered by me or a vote cast tinged with unfriendliness to any portion of my country, North or South or East or West. And now, sir, if I lift my voice in favor of a measure or in opposition, I have long ago been taught it will not be efficient in this assembly, but may be heard elsewhere, and even from me if what comes is truth, there is a God of truth who shall make it efficient in His own good time.

Sir, I fear there is a feeling growing in the minds of those who have had political control in this country of late years that the success of their party is more valuable than the form of government under which we live. I fear that I see signs that this terrible contest is waging in their minds and that they are weighing the one against the other. I only hope I may be mistaken when I express the fear that the desire for the ascendency of party is almost too strong for the love of our form of government. What else can I think when I regard the force bill of the late Congress, which was not the product of a single mind nor of a single committee but of a joint caucus of the two Houses, the Senate and the House meeting night after night deliberating day after day? The product of their joint consultation was shown in a bill that proposes to put nearly one-half of this Union in chains of martial law should the discretion of the President direct it. It is true it met opposition. It is true it was modified as to the theater of its exercise; that the fifteen or sixteen States were reduced to four, selected for the operation of the law, not abating its evil and dangerous principle, circumscribing its theater but containing a principle never heretofore recognized in United States laws; that it should prevail only in certain States of the Union and should not be law in the others; that the citizen of Massachusetts, or Pennsylvania, or New York, or Delaware should have safeguards for his liberty that were to be withdrawn from the citizen of Louisiana, or Texas, or Arkansas, or Alabama—a badge of unjust and degrading inequality that no measure proposed to the Congress of the United States ever before to my knowledge contained. That infamous measure passed the House by a large majority, after full discussion, 135 votes of the dominant party being cast in favor of it and the solid count of the democratic party, swollen by some conservative republicans, bringing about 114 votes in opposition to it, and then it was brought here at the end of the session when it was in the power of the minority to prevent its passage; and they did. That it is not a law to-day is not the lack of favorable sentiment in this body, because every one must recognize the fact that the sentiment of the Senate of the United States has been far more extreme, radical, and unhesitating than that of the House of Representatives.

Then came presidential messages in regard to Arkansas containing propositions fatal to the existence of State governments, proposals to invade, override, and destroy the settled government of States at the mere will and caprice of the Executive. Then witness the whole tone of the Administration toward those political adventurers who have plundered the South and ask still to be sustained by the armies of the Government in defiance of the sentiment of the communities in which unhappily they find their abodes. It is they who are in favor with the Executive, it is they with whom he takes counsel, it is they who give direction to his thought and plans. We see them in both Houses of Congress exercising a strong sway in the councils of the majority and their fortunes sought to be upheld and preferred to the peace and prosperity of the communities where they unhappily have taken up their residence.

I see this action in Louisiana, I see your resolution here. What does it mean? If it meant nothing it would not be so pressed. Does it mean to continue a military protectorate in one or more of the States of this Union? Does it mean anything else or anything less? That is what the government of Louisiana has been since 1872. That community has lived under a military protectorate guided and controlled by the President of the United States, who by the crook of his little finger could remove any man within that State from office or from power or who by his smile can encourage him to any excess and guarantee him perfect immunity, no matter how flagitious was his wrong. So here to-night I do gravely and earnestly warn my fellow-countrymen against that change in their form of government which these measures indicate and I fear seriously threaten.

Believing this, I feel it my duty plainly to say so. I have looked at the proposed course of legislation, I have looked at the proposition of the Executive in relation to Arkansas, I have seen what has been done and what has been happily defeated, and I do say that if the people of this country are wise they will be quick to check the further progress of their Government in the direction it has taken in Louisiana and which is proposed to be extended beyond the limits of that State. I hope they may hear me; I hope they may heed me; and that the government of laws, which was designed by the founders of this country to continue over a free people, may not in the heat of party or by personal ambitions be merged and lost in a government of force. My desire is that the attention of the country should be awakened to the true facts; all I ask is the judgment of my fellow-countrymen candidly and deliberately on the facts as we now know them to exist. Some things I had thought were sacred, rights that I thought could never be drawn in question, have been denied here in debate by the unhesitating admirers of executive power. Sir, it is quite time for the American people to aronse themselves to the consideration of their public duty, and forget party passion in the higher feeling of love of country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BOUTWELL in the chair.) Is the Senate ready for the question on the amendment?

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, the question under consideration is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] to the resolution offered by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN.] The amendment is to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the action of the President in protecting the government in Louisiana, of which William P. Kellogg is the executive, and the people of that State against domestic violence, and in enforcing the laws of the United States in that State, is approved.

The first point demanding attention is, has the Senate jurisdiction to consider and determine the question raised in this resolution? The Constitution of the United States is the foundation and limitation of the powers of the Senate, as it is of the powers of every other branch of the Federal Government. The functions of the Senate are performed in three several capacities: first as a co-ordinate branch of the Federal Legislature of the country; secondly, as an advisory body to the President in the matter of treaties and nominations; and third, as a court of impeachment. If this resolution can be considered by the Senate as appropriate to and falling within either of these capacities, it is within the jurisdiction of the Senate; otherwise it is not; and that is the first question to settle.

Does this resolution look to legislation? If it does, the Senate sitting in executive session for special purposes has no jurisdiction whatever. That question was settled the other day when the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLAYTON] offered a resolution looking into an investigation of the affairs of the Indian Territory, and by a very decided vote of the Senate, 40 against 22, it was held that at this session of the Senate no action looking to legislation could be entertained. If, then, this resolution looks to legislation, it cannot be entertained at this session of the Senate.

Next, does it look in any manner to a treaty? Unquestionably not. Does it look in any manner to action upon a nomination of the President? Certainly not. Does it relate to an impeachment? Clearly not.

Then if it does not fall within the purview of the Senate in the exercise of any of its great powers, I ask what authority this Senate has to exercise jurisdiction over this question? It is clear that this view of the question is taken in every message of the President which refers to Louisiana affairs, and so far as I now remember in every such message Congress is called upon to act, not the Senate. When a committee was appointed by the Senate to investigate that matter, their recommendation upon the completion of their important labor was not for the Senate to act, but for Congress to act; and that committee was made up of able and distinguished Senators. I have not heard, I have never heard during the whole investigation of this Louisiana question, I have not read in any of the papers, in any of the speeches in the Senate, in the House, or in the country anywhere, that it was claimed that the Senate of the United States had any power whatever over the question acting in its individual or separate capacity unconnected with the House of Representatives.

It is important to determine that point, for without jurisdiction in the premises a mere expression of opinion by the Senate that the President of the United States has discharged his duty is a most singular thing to be done here. The President of the United States by his great oath of office swears to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States and to see that the laws are faithfully executed. If, then, in the course which he has pursued toward Louisiana, he has seen that the laws have been faithfully executed, if in his course there he has preserved, protected, and defended the Constitution, he has done nothing more than it was his duty to have done; and it would be most singular and most strange that it should be necessary for the Senate, a grave and dignified body as it is, to say to the President, because he has done his duty, "Well done, good and faithful servant." If, on the contrary, the action of the President in reference to Louisiana is not in the discharge of his duty as President; if in his action there he has not preserved, protected, and defended the Constitution; if in his action he has not seen that the laws are faithfully executed, then I ask by what authority this Senate comes in at this late day and says to him, "Your action, although not in accordance with the Constitution of the country which controls us, is yet by grace of the Senate made legal and is approved; that which was illegal at the time it was done is by our action made legal?" I know of no such authority.

When we come to look at this resolution we find what?

That the action of the President in protecting the government in Louisiana, of which William P. Kellogg is the executive, and the people of that State against domestic violence, and in enforcing the laws of the United States in that State, is approved.

It necessarily follows that we must look into the action of the President in regard to Louisiana to see what that action is and see whether by that action he has brought about peace and has protected those people. There was an election held in 1872. By an order which has been denounced in this Senate and all over this country, by an order which so far as I know has no defender of any party, the midnight order of Durell, this Louisiana government headed by W. P. Kellogg was set in motion; and the records show when that order was issued it was known that the order would be sustained and Packard, the marshal, was authorized to uphold and maintain and enforce that order by the troops of the Federal Government. Then, if there has been trouble since the issuance of that order in the State of Louisiana, who is responsible for that disorder? If it turns out to be true that W. P. Kellogg was not elected by the people of Louisiana and that he was foisted on those people against their wishes and against their vote, and was so foisted by the authority of the President of the United States, I ask if the Senate can now come forward and say that in that action he is approved?

It is not necessary in the discussion of this question to maintain that Mr. McEnery was elected governor. While I believe that he was legally elected by a majority of the voters of the State of Louisiana, and while that belief is entertained by thousands of people throughout the country, it is not necessary in this discussion to maintain that proposition. It is only necessary to maintain the proposition that W. P. Kellogg was not elected. When I come to look at the report signed by Mr. Carpenter, Mr. LOGAN, Mr. ALCORN, and Mr. ANTHONY, I find that they conclude that report with this resolution, in which their associates, Mr. Trumbull and Mr. Hill, concur, dissented from only by Mr. MORTON:

Resolved, That there is no State government at present existing in the State of Louisiana.

If when that report was made there was no State government then existing in the State of Louisiana, there has been no State government in that State since that time known to the law because there has been no election for governor since that time. I find that in that report the committee charge the whole election was carried on in fraud and that the amount of fraud and iniquity in that election was so great that it was impossible to determine who really was elected, but the intimations are that McEnery was; but nowhere is it intimated that either by fraudulent or fair means W. P. Kellogg was elected governor of the State of Louisiana. They, however, report as the result of their investigations that neither Kellogg nor McEnery was elected. Take that view of the case; if neither Kellogg nor McEnery was elected, how came Kellogg to be governor? I ask you if the people of Louisiana did not elect Kellogg governor can the President of the United States elect him either directly or indirectly? If the people of Louisiana did not elect him governor, I ask if Durell could elect him governor? If he has no warrant or authority for the position which he holds save and except that which he got by virtue of the midnight order of Judge Durell, then he is not the legal governor of the State of Louisiana, he is not the de facto governor of the State of Louisiana. Then why approve the President for upholding this government of his own creation? According to the meaning of the term "de facto," as I understand it—and which was made so clear in the very able speech of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] the other day, (a republican,) that it is scarcely necessary to repeat it—a de facto government, as I understand that sort of government, is one which has color of right and which is acquiesced in by the people over which the authority proposes to rule, or it is a government which, having colorable right, is upheld and maintained by so strong a force from among the governed that it cannot be broken by the people discontented with it. The government must in some form be upheld by part at least of the governed. Military power, when that is used, brought to the assistance of the governor, must be the military power of the State. But in the case of Kellogg he controls the State of Louisiana by a military power loaned to him by an authority foreign to his State. Was Mr. Kellogg at the time of the issuance of the Durell order either de facto or de jure governor of the State of Louisiana? Neither. He had no position as governor of the State by the act of the people of Louisiana, by the acquiescence of the people of Louisiana, by any inherent force which he brought to his assistance in the State of Louisiana. He had no official existence whatever until the issuance of the order of Durell and the enforcement of that order by Federal bayonets at the dictation of Packard, with the understanding as the record shows that this action would be upheld and sustained by the Federal Government. If that be a correct statement of the case, and it is sustained by the record, I cannot see why this Senate should approve of the action of the President. If the Senate approves of the action of the President in that matter it approves the issuance of the midnight order by Durell; it approves the action of Packard; it approves the action of De Trobriand; it approves every one of those acts which have been denounced from one end of the Union to the other and which no man has been willing to stand up here and defend. For one I am not willing to do it. No man in all this broad land wants peace, wants prosperity, more than I do. The peace and prosperity of this whole land should be the earnest prayer of every good man, and I know that the peace and prosperity of each section are necessary to the peace and prosperity of the whole country.

But, sir, I want to go back in the record for a few moments. On the first day of this session of the Senate two resolutions were introduced by the distinguished Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] and they were numbered one and two. The first of these resolutions looked to the seating of P. B. S. Pinchback as a Senator in this body; the second of these resolutions looked to the recognition of the Kellogg government. I should be glad if the Secretary would read the second resolution introduced by the Senator from Indiana on the 5th of March.

The Secretary read the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, That the State government now existing in Louisiana, and represented by William P. Kellogg as governor, is the lawful government of said State; that it is republican in form; and that every assistance necessary to sustain its proper and lawful authority in said State should be given by the United States, when properly called upon for that purpose, to the end that the laws may be faithfully and promptly executed, life and property protected and defended, and all violators of law, State or national, brought to speedy punishment for their crimes.

Mr. MAXEY. The first of these resolutions, after discussion here, after a number of able speeches showing learning, research, and ability were delivered on one side and the other, was disposed of about midnight a few days ago. When it was thought at least on this side that a vote was to be taken on the resolution and that the Pinchback factor, which had been the disturbing element in the politics of the country for so long a time, would be definitely and forever settled by the Senate, a motion accompanied by a proposition was presented by the Senator from Louisiana, and I beg the Clerk to read the remarks of the Senator from Louisiana accompanying his motion.

The Secretary read from the RECORD of March 17, as follows:

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, according to the understanding this debate cannot be prolonged, and I do not rise for that purpose; but I rise to make a proposition that I trust will be acceptable to a majority of the Senators here. The debate for the past two days has developed such a variety and contrariety of opinion on the part of a number of Senators on this side of the Chamber, that I am not willing to submit the claims of my colleague to the test of a vote at the present time.

Mr. McDONALD. Will the Senator from Texas yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. MAXEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. McDONALD. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would like to ask the Senator from Indiana a question: Will the Senator state for himself or his friends the time when a vote can be taken, if we adjourn now?

Mr. McDONALD. I can state this, Mr. President, that the minority do not intend any factious opposition to this resolution, but we desire to have opportunity for a full discussion, and when that is ended the majority can pass the resolution; but to state the day or the hour I cannot.

Mr. CONKLING. Then let us go on.

Mr. EATON. I would like to say this to my friend from Ohio and to my friend from New York and to all other Senators on the other side of the Chamber, that while we have not arrived at a conclusion that we can name a day or an hour, whether to-night, or Monday night, or Tuesday night, yet I beg to say in all fairness and candor that in my judgment, in my honest judgment, if the Senate should adjourn at a reasonable hour to-night, we should as soon arrive at a vote as we should if we prolonged this discussion all night. There will be no factious talking, no talking against time, and gentlemen will consume much less time in my judgment if they are not pressed by our friends on the other side. We shall arrive at an early vote while we cannot name an hour or a day.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am personally entirely indifferent as to the duration of the session, because I shall be here long after the adjournment at any rate; and what I say is in behalf of others, not myself. I know it is a matter of vital importance to many Senators on both sides of the Chamber to know when they can leave here, because they have business arrangements that are waiting for them to attend to. While therefore it is to me an object of indifference, it is to them of great interest to fix when they can leave here. I have no doubt if Senators on the democratic side of the House will state the day when they can close this debate, after conference and consultation among themselves, I have no doubt it will be acceded to at once and we shall then have no struggle as to the duration of the session. It seems to me that by Tuesday certainly we might vote, and that would give them two days. Any Senator may express his opinion upon the Louisiana case in that time, and it would be a matter of great convenience to many Senators, I know, if that time could be fixed or the day fixed even if the hour cannot be fixed. Certainly, two days is enough to finish the discussion of a resolution so simple as this on a question so long debated.

Mr. BAYARD. I may say this: So far as I have heard this matter discussed among those with whom I act in this Chamber, there has been no idea that anything but the most usual and orderly disposition of this matter would take place. If when the resolution had been brought in in its new shape it had been allowed to be printed and the Senate had passed to the consideration of executive business, the speeches that would have been made upon it on Monday or on Tuesday would have been exceedingly short and would by no means have been either in number or length extended to such a point as to be considered at all dilatory in the usual proceedings of the Senate's business, and there is not I think the least intention on the part of any member of the minority of this body unduly to delay a vote. I say this at the same time that I apologize to my associates in this Chamber for the length of time I have occupied. I am sorry that it took me so long. The object certainly was not delay, but it was owing to my want of preparation in discussing a long series of events covering a period of some four years in a State's history; but that is the fact. I do not believe that even if with the disposition of the other side to get us to name any day next week, anything would be gained by it. We only ask that the ordinary methods of business in this body should be applied to the present case.

The Senator from Ohio says the business of Senators is of vital importance. Why, Mr. President, is this measure one of vital importance or of more than vital importance? It must be so according to the logic of the Senator from Ohio. I would simply say that in my belief less time would be occupied than the majority themselves would be willing to allow for the determination of this debate if no period at all is fixed; but I think there is a feeling among the minority in this body against having a limit assigned to them and it said "you have to talk up to that limit." The measure is a grave one, and I think it should be left to their discretion, a discretion which here I take leave to say has never been abused by them.

Mr. ANTHONY. We accept as frankly as it is stated the declaration of the Senators on the other side that they have no desire to interpose unnecessary delay. There has been no such disposition upon that side manifested, and we have no apprehension of it; but this session has been prolonged considerably beyond the time that it was supposed it would last. Senators on this side of the Chamber and I think on the other side have made engagements, and it is necessary for them to know if they can fulfill those engagements; and if they cannot, if the time of adjournment cannot be fixed, then we wish to dispose of as much of the discussion this evening as possible. The speeches that are made to-night will not be made on Monday; and if we could be assured of an adjournment at a particular time, so that we could govern ourselves accordingly, we should be willing to close to-day's session now. If we cannot have that reasonable assurance, it seems to us that it would be better that we should dispose of as much of the debate now as we possibly can; and the fact that there is no factious opposition is a reason why we should get along as rapidly as we can with the proper legitimate opposition we are having now. I should much rather adjourn, we would all rather adjourn, but I do not believe it is practicable unless a day can be fixed as we always do in such cases. We always fix a day to close a discussion at this period of the session.

Mr. McDONALD. The Senator from Rhode Island will allow me to ask him if it is usual to force the minority to continue a debate until midnight on Saturday, on the first day a resolution is taken up, unless there is a factious opposition?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, after a subject has been debated here for two years, has taken up half the time of the Senate, it is not very unreasonable to prolong the sitting session until midnight. At the close of a session we frequently sit until sunrise. It is very uncomfortable and very unpleasant; I certainly do not want to stay here; I have much more agreeable engagements.

Mr. BAYARD. It is a discomfort, I protest.

Mr. McDONALD. I admit that the majority have a right to destroy the power of a factious opposition by using it up as rapidly as possible; but it does seem to me that where the opposition is not factious, is that which is ordinary, in the discussion of a resolution that is unquestionably of importance in my view, however other Senators may consider it, it ought to take the ordinary course.

I will state further that if an adjournment takes place now there is scarcely a probability that the debate on this side will extend beyond Tuesday night, and that I think on Wednesday a vote can be taken. I make no agreement about it, for I am not authorized to make it, but I say there is no probability in my judgment of the debate extending beyond Tuesday night or Tuesday's adjournment.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, on my own responsibility I offer this resolution——

Mr. WEST. Is there not a motion to adjourn?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BOUTWELL.) The resolution can only be received by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear it read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed resolution of Mr. WHYTE, as follows:

Resolved, That the President pro tempore declare the Senate adjourned without day on Thursday next at noon.

Mr. CONKLING. The regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the reception of the resolution. The question before the Senate is on the motion to adjourn, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCREERY, (when his name was called.) On this motion I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If he were present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. SHERMAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky Mr. [STEVENSON] temporarily till nine o'clock, and therefore I will not vote.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ANTHONY. My colleague [Mr. BURNSIDE] is paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] My colleague, if present, would vote "nay," and the Senator from Ohio "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Gordon, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones of Florida, Kernan, McDonald, Maxey, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, Saulsbury, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—20.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish by general consent to say one word in regard to the matter we have been discussing and which I should very much like to see brought to a determination. We propose to give the time for this discussion mainly to the other side, probably entirely. Now they know how long it will take them to conclude their speeches; and if they will fix a time when they will conclude the discussion, they may use that time just as they please; they may remain here in continuous session or adjourn at three o'clock each day, but if they decline to fix the time, and we are responsible for the use of it, then we must insist upon employing it in the discussion.

Mr. DAVIS. I think I may say that the minority here do not wish to fix any time. I do not think there is any factious opposition. I do not think the debate will run a great while; but certainly there are some gentlemen on this side of the House who never will consent to fix a time for taking the vote.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then we must go ahead.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, when I gave way I had quoted from the remarks made by the Senator from Louisiana on the night of the 16th of this month, above cited, when he made the motion to postpone the consideration of the first resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana till the second Monday in December and the reasons which were stated accompanying that motion by him, were distinctly that there was such a variety and contrariety of sentiment on the republican side of the Chamber that he was unwilling to risk the interests of his "colleague" by taking a vote at that time. Now, Mr. President, there is no question, there has never been a question that this Senate could at this session hear and determine the claim of P. B. S. Pinchback to a seat in the Senate, because this body is the exclusive judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. Hence when there was a question about which there could possibly be no objection to the jurisdiction of the Senate, could be no doubt as to the jurisdiction of the Senate, when the question had been fully, fairly, and squarely discussed, when as we thought the question was ready for submission to a final vote of the Senate, there was sprung, about the hour of midnight, a motion to postpone until the second Monday in December; and that carried against the solid opposition of every vote on this side and two from the other, standing 33 in favor of the postponement to 30 against it.

Mr. President, why was that? The reason stated was because the counsels on that side were divided, because they themselves were unable to come to a conclusion sustaining the claim of the applicant. For that reason the question was postponed to the second Monday of December, and it was done though the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] who had made an able argument on that side of the question, appealed to his brethren not to take that step because the peace of the country demanded a speedy settlement. Still it was done. The order of precedence in which these two resolutions were presented by the Senator from Indiana was first the recognition of the claim of P. B. S. Pinchback to a seat in the Senate, second the recognition of the Kellogg government. It is perfectly manifest, that if P. B. S. Pinchback was entitled to a seat in this body, it was because the Legislature certifying to his credentials was a Legislature competent to elect and because the election took place at the time and place and in the mode prescribed by law and by an authority thus competent to elect, and if entitled on his credentials, that the certificate was signed by the governor of the State of Louisiana with the broad seal of that State, and countersigned by the secretary of state of that State. The issue was presented fairly and squarely by this side of the Chamber that he was not entitled to admission upon his credentials, first because the body electing him, as claimed, was not the Legislature of Louisiana; and second that, although the name of W. P. Kellogg appeared to his credentials under the broad seal of the State of Louisiana, he was not the governor of Louisiana, and was not therefore the authority which the law prescribed for certifying the election of a Senator. If either of these propositions were true in fact, then it was impossible lawfully to seat Pinchback as a member of this body; and the arguments on that question were so clear, so lucid, as to leave no doubt on my mind. A most able and lucid argument upon that question was made by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY,] a republican, and there was an unanswerable legal argument made by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] a republican, on this point. The fact unquestionably existed as stated by the Senator from Louisiana that there was a "variety and contrariety of opinion" on that side of the Chamber which prevented the seating of Pinchback, and although the State of Louisiana has been struggling for self-government for more than two years, although the whole country has been excited for that long period, although the President of the United States had called upon Congress to settle the question, yet when we had come to a time when the Senator from Indiana urged upon this body the settlement of the question and he was supported in that appeal by the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] on that side who told us that the peace, quiet, and harmony of this country demanded that the question should be settled, when it came to the point, for the reason which was given by the Senator from Louisiana that upon a fair and square test, stripped down to plain English, "we find that you will beat us on the vote; we cannot submit; and therefore we ask to postpone the question," the postponement was carried, and party went above country.

Now, I ask if any Senator here can draw the distinction between the legality and the validity of the Kellogg government and the legality and validity of the claim of P. B. S. Pinchback to a seat in the Senate? They are Siamese twins; they cannot be severed. If Pinchback is entitled to a seat here, it is because the body that elected him was a valid and legal Legislature; it is because his credentials are certified by a valid and legal governor; and when you seat Pinchback, the question comes up at once, do you not concede the proposition that this Kellogg government is a valid and a legal government? And when you pass this do you not concede Pinchback's claim? And yet the President in his messages has stated to the Congress of the United States and to the country that he cannot tell who was elected at the election of 1872, and has urged upon Congress to determine that question for him. The able committee sent by this body to the city of New Orleans for the purpose of making that investigation, when they came back reported to the Senate that the election of 1872 was so steeped in fraud that it was impossible to determine who was elected governor, and therefore they recommended that Congress should take the matter in hand, and under authority of the Constitution to guarantee to each State a republican form of government should settle the question and bring peace and quiet to that country. Then when the committee of the House of Representatives was sent down last winter to inquire into more recent affairs we find that their reports upon a subsequent portion of Louisiana affairs corresponded in the general outlook with the report of the committee of the Senate. It is true that the last report covers the time from the 4th of January last and a short time antecedent, and it is true that the report of the Senate committee referred mainly to the election of 1872; but it is all one continued series; and when we are called upon to approve and indorse the action of the President in that matter we are called upon to approve and indorse every act from the time Durell issued his midnight order down to the time that representatives were excluded from the Legislature of Louisiana at the point of the bayonet by General De Trobriand.

That first resolution of the Senator from Indiana (the Pinchback resolution) was, by a vote of the majority of this body, postponed to the second Monday of December next, against the solid vote of the democrats. From that time on we heard nothing more of the second resolution of the Senator from Indiana recognizing the Kellogg government. It somehow has passed out, how I do not know; but if it has ever been disposed of by the Senate in any way, I am not aware of the fact. It seems to sleep. That was the resolution indorsing the Kellogg government.

Next comes a resolution presented by the Senator from New Jersey, and I would be very glad to have the Secretary read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate approve the action heretofore taken by the President of the United States in protecting Louisiana from domestic violence, and are of opinion that he should continue to recognize in that State the existing State government.

Mr. MAXEY. That resolution was worded by the Senator from New Jersey carefully. For some reason not known to me, day after day that resolution was left here and no action taken up to this morning, when it was expected the matter would be taken up, and then we find that that resolution was suddenly displaced by an amendment which amendment is to strike out every word after the word "resolved" and insert the same proposition in substance and essence by an entirely new collocation of words; but why, I ask, is it? Does not the Senator from Indiana know how to frame a resolution so as to present an idea? Does not the Senator from New Jersey understand how to do it? Does not the Senator from Rhode Island? Why is it that we have so many resolutions coming up one after the other covering exactly the same proposition? Is it to catch the "variety and contrariety of opinions" among republicans? The Pinchback matter was passed over to December. As I have stated, that is inseparably connected with the resolution which is now before the Senate and they should bide the same fate. In all justice, in all fairness, if the one goes over to the second Monday in December, it does seem to me that the other ought to go over to the same time.

But again, sir, since these grave questions in regard to Louisiana affairs were first brought before the country, we have had other scenes which shocked the civilized world, or at all events the English-speaking portion of the civilized world. A thing has been done which has not been done for two hundred years, so far as my knowledge of history goes, until it was done in the city of New Orleans on the 4th day of January of this year. The house of representatives of the Legislature of Louisiana was in session and it was determined to remove and did remove from that body a portion of the members sitting there, by an armed force not ordered by the speaker of the house. By no authority known to the law, a military officer marched those men out at the point of the bayonet; and we are called upon to approve that. Will you do it? I will not.

Again, after all these disturbances, after the Durell infamy which has been spoken of in the many speeches that have been made and published to the country from here and elsewhere, after that disturbance of the 4th of January last, after a portion of the elected members had left the house, leaving not a quorum to do business, by the earnest efforts of good men an attempt was made to bring peace and quiet and harmony to that distracted State, a committee of referees was selected, a majority of whom belonged to the republican party. That committee was agreed to by both contending parties, and the matter of relative claims to seats in the Legislature was submitted to them and they have recently held their session in the city of New York and the result of that session is not officially promulgated so far as I know. I heard a paper read here the other evening making some statement in regard to it; but so far as any official knowledge has come to the Senate, we do not know what is the result of that.

Mr. President, that is a difficulty among the people in Louisiana. If the people there, black and white, republicans and democrats, if the representatives of all the various elements which go to make up Louisiana society have agreed among themselves in the interest of peace, in the interest of harmony, that they will leave the settlement of the question to a party of gentlemen as referees whom they regard as honest and upright men, and by whose decision they solemnly bind themselves to abide, and pending their settlement the weight of this Senate should be thrown in favor of the one or the other of the contesting parties there, I ask you if that would be fair? I ask you if while that matter is undergoing settlement those commissioners should not be left perfectly untrammeled, if the two contesting parties in the State of Louisiana should not be left wholly untrammeled? I ask if it would be right, if it would be just, if it would be fair dealing between man and man, if it would be in the interest of peace to a distracted country, for a body with the powers of the Senate of the United States, with the dignity of the Senate of the United States, to throw by an approval of the acts which have been so condemned by the people of Louisiana and by a large portion of this whole country the weight of this body in the scales on the one side and against the other in the settlement of that controversy? Would that be fair? Would that be just? If peace is what we want, they have selected their mode of bringing about that peace. After the earnest entreaties of their best men urging all the people to come together and reconcile their differences they have so got their different elements together, divided as they were in the outset, that they have agreed to a compromise and settlement of the difficulty. If they have done that and that negotiation for a settlement is going on, would it be right for the Senate, the President, or anybody on this earth to interfere with the deliberations of these referees and the efforts of these people for amicable adjustment? It would be as unfair in my judgment as it would be for a party to go and enter into an argument with a jury after the case had been submitted to them for their verdict. It does not seem to me fair. Therefore I ask Senators who want to do justice, who want to do right, who want to bring about peace and harmony in the country, to let that settlement alone; let us stand hands off. Even had the Senate jurisdiction of this question, there is no necessity for bringing it up at this time, but let the whole question be settled together at the next session of this body and let it be settled finally and forever, and I most earnestly trust that before that time the people of Louisiana, the right people to do it, will have settled it themselves.

Mr. President, I cannot for the life of me see, I do not understand, that anything which this body may do in the premises can aid in bringing about peace. It is not my purpose to look into the motives of Senators. I can only look at the consequences of their action, and it does seem to me that an expression of opinion by the Senate does not fall within any of the powers of the Senate, and ought to have in law and I believe would have in law no more weight than the expression of any other body of reasonable and intelligent gentlemen; but even admitting that to be true, while it may be that the Senate has no jurisdiction, while it may be that this resolution does not amount to legislation, yet the indorsement of the course pursued toward Louisiana will I fear influence unwarrantably the pending settlement, and have undue weight all through the length and breadth of this country. I ask what has the Senate to do with it? What has the Senate to do with anything that does not pertain to legislation and treaties and nominations, or to impeachment? What other powers has the Senate? They are all defined on the face of the Constitution, and that is to control and govern here, and the exercise of no power not conferred by the Constitution can possibly be justified.

I have detained the Senate now, Mr. President, longer than I had designed when I rose, but I have only said what I have without any previous preparation, without note or manuscript, because I desire the principle settled correctly and because the State which I have the honor in part to represent has great interest in this question. The State of Louisiana is our neighbor; it lies alongside the State of Texas. Our people have for many long years been intimately associated in business pursuits and in social intercourse with the people of Louisiana. I know theirs is a disturbed and distracted condition; I know that they want peace and quiet and harmony; I know that if the efforts of those selected by them as arbitrators are left to have their proper and healthy course without interference, in all probability peace will be brought to that country and that by the action of the people of Louisiana themselves, the proper people to settle this question which has disturbed the whole country for so long a period of time. They have the matter now under consideration, and so having it I believe it to be right and constitutional that they should be permitted to solve the question for themselves. In any event we should wait until the present effort at settlement has developed the fact that they cannot reach a settlement, and then if the status of Louisiana is ever taken hold of at all let it be taken hold of by Congress and not by the Senate alone, and then only because the people there prove themselves incapable of self-government. I have not the slightest fear of the ultimate peace, prosperity, and happiness of the people of Louisiana if they are left untrammeled to fashion their own destiny.

Mr. DAVIS. If it is in order I move to strike out the word "approve" in the first line of the resolution, and ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, which will be read.

Mr. ANTHONY. How will it read if that word is stricken out?

Mr. DAVIS. We can further amend if that word is stricken out.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand the Senator to move to strike out the word "approve." I ask how it will read if amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will read the resolution as amended.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the word "approve" in the first line of the resolution of the Senator from New Jersey; so as to read:

Resolved, That the Senate —— the action heretofore taken by the President of the United States in protecting Louisiana from domestic violence, and are of opinion that he should continue to recognize in that State the existing State government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. DAVIS. The yeas and nays were called for.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would like to have the amendment reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will again report the proposed amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

The SECRETARY. It is moved to strike out the word "approved" in the first line of the resolution submitted by the Senator from New Jersey; so that when amended the resolution will read:

Reeolved, That the Senate —— the action heretofore taken by the President of the United States in protecting Louisiana from domestic violence, and are of opinion that he should continue to recognize in that State the existing State government.

Mr. ALLISON. Does that make sense?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. RANSOM. On this question, as I have stated, I am paired in all its phases with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. SHERMAN. On this question I am temporarily paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. STEVENSON.] If he were present I should vote "nay" and I presume he would vote "yea."

Mr. MCCREERY. I am paired on this vote with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Gordon, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones of Florida, McDonald, Norwood, Randolph, Saulsbury, Wallace, White, and Withers—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conkling, Cragin, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, McMillan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Robertson, and West—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Booth, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Conover, Dawes, Dennis, Dorsey, Eaton, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Hamlin, Johnston of Virginia, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Ransom, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Windom, and Wright—33.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WHYTE, (at eight o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to say that the object was, if the amendment just voted upon had carried, to insert the word "disapprove?" Several Senators wanted to know what the object was. The object was to insert the word "disapprove" if the word "approve" had been stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the substitute proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

Mr. BAYARD. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, it had not been my intention to take any part in this debate, and if I had desired to do so, owing to some affection of my lungs from cold, I would have preferred not to do it to-night. Nevertheless, as no other gentleman seems disposed to make any observations now, I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate while I speak briefly upon the resolution under consideration; and I am quite sure that I shall be able to say what I do say without any partisan feeling.

In my judgment, a resolution of this character is not one which it is wise for this body to adopt; it is not any part of legislation; it looks to no ulterior action by this or the other branch of Congress. It is a resolution proposed by those representing the Administration approving of acts of the President. In my judgment, it will very rarely be wise for this body to indulge in resolutions of approval or disapproval of the President. My judgment is that it partakes too much of political conventions, of partisan action, to make it a wise precedent for action by this body.

If I have a correct idea of the views of those who founded this Government, they thought it essential to its perpetuity, they thought it very important in reference to protecting the liberties of the people, very important in securing to the States those rights of local government which were so carefully reserved, that this Government should be one with checks and balances, that the Executive in his sphere should be independent of the Legislature, and that the branches of the body in which the legislative power was vested should be independent of the President, that they might be a wholesome check upon the Executive. But, sir, if it shall become the practice, in times of high party excitement and strong partisan feeling, however honestly entertained, that members of the Senate, of the one party or the other, shall depart from its legitimate business to discuss and adopt resolutions on partisan questions as to which there is much feeling among the people of the country, and commending action of the Executive as to which the people are greatly divided, expressing by a party vote their approval or disapproval, according to their party bias, of the action of the President on questions which have created a wide diversity of opinion even among those who make up the majority which elected the President, I fear that this body, instead of being a check upon the Executive, instead of standing here as calm protectors of the just rights of all, will too often be swayed by party feeling to do that which will be unwise for the country and detrimental to the best interests of this Government.

Mr. President, in making these remarks I speak as earnestly in reference to what may be in the future the course of the party with which I do or may act, as I speak in reference to the party now in power and from which on political matters I dissent. Remember that this is the body that represents States; it is the body which is believed to be most conservative; it is the body which should be least affected by party feelings. Sir, where in the history of this Government do we find wise precedents for this body becoming the mere exponent of party approval of the President by formal resolutions? These general views have occurred to me as I have sat here to-day and listened to this debate; and I hope that if I stood with the majority—I may be mistaken; we are all very fallible and are all often swayed by our party feelings—but I express the hope that if I stood here with the party with which I act in power, under the circumstances which exist as to the subject of this resolution, whatever might be my opinion individually in reference to the action of the Executive, I should oppose the adoption by the Senate of a resolution approving of the action of the President on subjects like those referred to in this resolution.

Another suggestion in reference to the propriety of this action. I do not mean to say that gentlemen who differ from me are not acting from motives as high as any that I could claim for myself. But what are the circumstances? Is it not true that in reference to unfortunate Louisiana, in reference to the people of that State of both races, white and colored, who are suffering much, that there is much of feeling, much of passion, much of division among the people of the country? Acts have been done there, understood by some one way and by others differently, acts which are denounced by good men of the party in power, acts which are excused by good men of the party in power as I doubt not. But what is the practical condition to-day of Louisiana? Under the auspices of members of influence in the party in power in the Federal Government, action has been had, if not with the advice yet as reported through the press with the approbation of the President, to compromise and settle the differences which exist as to the State government of Louisiana and thus relieve the people of that State from this terrible war of factions which is destroying all prosperity and disturbing the peace of that people of both races. There came back recently from Louisiana a committee sent by the other House, a committee sent by the majority, who reported that this proposition had been made to them by the contending factions in Louisiana: "Gentlemen, we leave it to you to decide what shall be done to give peace to the people of this State. We will ask you to say how we shall adjust these matters as to our State government." That committee has acted, as we learn. I think every good citizen hopes that something will come of it that will give peace and prosperity to the people of that State. Under these circumstances is it wise for the party in power to take action here which shall add to the irritation or which shall strengthen either faction there, and which may perchance prevent their acquiescing in an adjustment of their own matters so as to give their people peace? It seems to me it would be wrong for us to interfere with a resolution of the character proposed here. Will the passage of this resolution strengthen the hands of those peace-makers? Will this resolution be not likely to encourage heated partisans and selfish, factious men in Louisiana to say, "We will hold out, and we will have it our own way; we will have the Army of the United States to aid us, and we will accept no adjustment that shall deprive us of the power to trample down all opposition?" although that opposition represents a majority of the people expressing their will by the ballot.

Mr. President, the resolution under consideration is very general in its terms. It says "that the action of the President in protecting the government in Louisiana, of which W. P. Kellogg is the executive, and the people of that State against domestic violence, and in enforcing laws of the United States in that State, is approved." What "action" is approved? Those who favor the upholding with the strong arm of the Federal Government of one faction there will claim that this Senate of the United States, this body of men charged, so far as it has authority, with the high duty of seeing to it that there is no action by the President which shall endanger the liberties of the citizen or which shall deprive the people of any State of the management of their own affairs in subordinance to the United States Constitution, approves what? It seems to me they will say, and with justice, that the Senate by adopting this resolution approves what was done by the Army of the United States in the legislative hall of Louisiana on the 4th of January last. Do gentlemen desire to express their approval of that? I am not going to recount it; Senators are familiar with it by the reports of their own committees to some extent, and familiar with it by the report of the House committee, which was laid before the House just before its adjournment, a report which I have only read hastily to-day. What do they tell you in that report signed by Mr. Foster, by Mr. Phelps, and by Mr. Potter, and so far as I know concurred in by Mr. Hoar, for he appends a note to it? They adopted this report, and what does it show? I ask Senators to read it, and remember that they are making a precedent, if they approve the action then and there had, which will be very dangerous to the welfare and perpetuity of our Union of States. The use made of the Army in Louisiana on that day points a way by which the government of every State may be overthrown.

That report shows, Mr. President, that there was an election in Louisiana in 1874 for members of the Legislature and that on the whole it was a peaceful election. It shows that the members of the Legislature assembled on the 4th of January, 1875, with a view to organize at the place prescribed by law. It shows that some members were expelled by the military power of the United States who, if the report is to be relied upon, were fairly and clearly elected. But I am not going to discuss whether they were or not. That is not the question that I think we should look to. They went there claiming seats. They were admitted to seats and took the oath of office. The Legislature was organized by the appointment of a speaker and a clerk. That body admitted the five men of whom I speak, whose seats I will concede were contested, and for all the purposes of my argument I may admit that they could have been successfully contested. They were proceeding in a peaceable manner to appoint a committee and I believe had appointed a committee to examine the contested seats. There was no riot there, nothing worthy of the name of "domestic violence" in the sense in which that term is used in our Constitution; an officer of the Federal Army with his soldiers comes in; he informs that legislative body, as he might with equal right inform you in this Hall, that he desires to put out of their places a certain number of the members whom he names. He brings a person into that legislative body to identify them. The report shows there were no persons inside of that hall but members who had uncontested seats and these whose seats were contested and who had been admitted to seats by the house. Without dwelling upon it, the officer says to that legislative body that he is ordered to, and he does at the point of the bayonet by the power of the Army of the United States, put the five members out of their seats and admit others in their places. That is done in a government where there is in the State constitution the same provision which is in the Constitution under which you, Senators, meet, that each house shall be the judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its members. The Legislature is changed in its political complexion by those who are put out and by the addition of those who are brought in.

Now do not misunderstand me. It would be unworthy of the question for me to argue here whether those men were rightfully in or not. This report signed by men of the same political party with the majority here comes to the conclusion that the men who were ejected were really elected; but I do not argue it, because whenever the time comes that the armed soldier by the power of the Federal Government can walk into a State Legislature and say "I require you to tell me which are the men named upon my list," and when he ascertains which they are can say to them "You must go out," and when they sit there and say they will yield to nothing but force he applies the force and expels them and this must be submitted to, republican government and liberty in that State are destroyed. I do not mean to say it is any worse whether the party character of the Legislature is changed by such an act or not. I mean to say that whenever this can be done, whenever this shall be an approved precedent for action in the legislative halls of the States of this Union, then the governments, State and Federal, which our fathers made and which we shall be faithless to ourselves and our children if we do not preserve, will speedily be overthrown whenever ambitious, bold, partisan men get power to wield the Army of the Federal Government and can command its obedience.

This resolution reads that the action of the President "is approved." How will the world read this, how will the great body of our own people read this? It will mean to them that this act which I have referred to is approved, and they will assume, whether rightfully or wrongfully, that the officer who did this was under the command of the President as Commander-in-Chief, and that he acted by his authority; for I believe there never has been a disclaimer that he had some authority to do this as an officer of the Army, and he has never been reprimanded by the President.

Senators, no matter what may be your party, remember that this is a Government that belongs to us all; that if it goes down, we go down in a common ruin; if it is preserved, it is preserved for the benefit of us all. I ask you are you willing to pass an ambiguous resolution that it will be claimed, whether it be so intended or not, approves an act like that by Federal authority?

I agree with Senators who are opposed to me politically that it would not be proper for this body at this time to pass a resolution censuring the President on account of this act. It would excite partisan feeling. Let it go before the people, who will correct it if they disapprove it, and let us do our duty here and not attempt to indulge in resolutions on a subject fraught with so much that is exciting and so much that engenders irritation among the people, and among the people especially of Louisiana.

I do not wish to be misunderstood. I do not intend in the remarks which I make here to charge anything on this subject beyond calling attention to the construction which will be given to this resolution if adopted. I ask Senators whether they would not rather go to their graves than to have it said that they did approve of an act like this of the 4th of January in republican America? It is an act destructive of all free government. It is an act that would not be tolerated for a moment by the legislature that sits under a monarchy in England. If an officer of the British army with soldiers should march into Parliament and put members out of their seats, that people, though they live under a monarchy and have not the notions of local government and liberty in all respects which we have, would shake from his throne the monarch who did not rebuke such an act and rebuke it speedily. Has the officer who did this act been rebuked or reprimanded? This act was done on the 4th day of January, and on the 5th of January information of it was flashed all over this country, every portion of the country was informed that this act had been done by a Federal officer, Colonel De Trobriand, who I believe no man pretends had any desire personally to do anything but his duty; and you find that whether General Sheridan was actually in command, as I suppose he was, or some one under him, he sends an extraordinary telegram on the 5th of January to the Secretary of War. You have all read it. We all knew when we read it that the Legislature of Louisiana had been invaded by Federal soldiers, that men who sat there and who this committee say left their homes never having heard that their seats were contested and who were legally elected and had the legal returns, had been expelled from the legislative body where they sat representing their districts, by an officer and soldiers of the Federal Army, and others seated in their places. This was known when General Sheridan sent his telegram asking for an act of Congress or a proclamation by the President declaring the "white-leaguers" banditti that he might try them by military commission.

And this is suggested in a land where we profess to have personal liberty secured by guarantees in every constitution that no man shall be touched in life, liberty, or property except by due process of law! I am not aware that there was any response rebuking the Lieutenant-General for proposing this; but on the 7th of January, with full knowledge I assume—for everybody else knew it—of what had been done on the 4th, a response is sent to General Sheridan by the Secretary of War—one who is near to the President—and what is it? It is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, January 7, 1875.

General P. H. SHERIDAN,
New Orleans, Louisiana:

Your telegrams all received. The President and all of us have full confidence and thoroughly approve your course.

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

A Lieutenant-General is in a distant State; he has soldiers under his command; a Legislature convenes in that State; there is no insurrection; there is no domestic violence that any police could not deal with at once; and an officer under him walks into the legislative hall and calls off the names of certain men and he puts them out at the point of the bayonet, and two days afterward from the Secretary of War at the capital, in daily communication with the President as I have a right to assume, consulting the President, there is telegraphed back not a rebuke, "You have transcended your duty or your orders," not warning him that in this land no soldier from the Lieutenant-General down has a right to do such an act, no protest on behalf of liberty and right, no admonition that he had made a mistake, but "We have full confidence and thoroughly approve your course." All this occurred in January, and this Senate sitting here in March, convened for extraordinary purposes at the will of the President, is asked to pass a resolution that the act of the President in protecting the government in Louisiana of which W. P. Kellogg is the executive is approved.

If this resolution means only that we approve of his fulfilling his constitutional duties when there is insurrection or domestic violence and when the Legislature calls for aid to suppress it or when it cannot be convened and the President is called upon by the governor to suppress it, then there is surely no reason for its passage. Why should it be passed if that is all there is of it? It will be understood as a resolution approving of the action of the military in invading the Legislature of Louisiana. Here is a general resolution of approval passed in March when this invasion of the Legislature of Louisiana has been the theme of discussion in the press, in public meetings without regard to party all through the country, and those meetings and the press have denounced in very strong terms this action of the military and have protested on behalf of liberty and our republican form of government most earnestly against this act of the Federal Army in January. Is it wise in view of these facts to pass a resolution which, if it does not mean in the minds of those who propose it to approve that action, certainly can be claimed and will be believed to be an approval? I fear it is sought as an approval of that action by some. I believe it will be a very dangerous precedent. I believe that in times of party heats, when party feeling runs high, this resolution if adopted will be a precedent which will be used to encourage action by those in power in violation of the Constitution and dangerous to liberty and self-government.

We are asked also in this resolution to approve the action of the President in "enforcing the laws of the United States in that State." Of course it is his duty to see that the laws are enforced. If that is all it means, why is it to be passed? Why should there have been, if that is all it means, this long labor to word it so as to unite a majority of the body to pass it at all? But when we remember that for the past two years the subject that has been most discussed in this and the other House in regard to Louisiana, the subject that has occupied the minds of the people from one end of the country to the other has been the action of the Executive or those acting under him in creating and upholding the Kellogg government in Louisiana; is not this resolution an attempt to have this body approve of that action?

I am not going to discuss that question. The Federal power, the Army, was used to enforce the order of Judge Durell; this set up and sustained the Kellogg government. We are familiar with this order and the action under it.

There was an election in Louisiana in 1872. A body of men were returned as elected members of the Legislature; I do not know whether rightfully or not; but they were the only ones, as the committee of this body known as the Carpenter committee says, who had any colorable right to sit as a Legislature. There may have been frauds. It may be true that there were frauds and intimidations which would have authorized the setting aside of that election; but they were the only men who were elected, who had the returns, who had color of authority as a Legislature. A judge at night, who the United States marshal with some vehemence, according to the report, swears was sober when he signed it, made an order in a suit in the United States court to perpetuate testimony so that men could have a chance to contest the election—an order which commanded Packard, the marshal of the United States, to take possession of the State-house, to exclude all men claiming under any color or pretense of authority from the returns of a certain board, to keep them all out of the State-house, but providing nevertheless that he, the marshal, should not exclude any one having a right to go in. That was the substance of the order; in a word, making Mr. Marshal Packard, who seems to have been a pretty warm partisan in State matters down there, the exclusive judge of who should go into that State-house as members and make up a Legislature. The President authorized the Federal troops to sustain Packard in executing this order of Durell's, and the troops were brought in and they did sustain Packard in enforcing that order, to wit, in keeping out every man who had color of an election to the Legislature, and letting in as members those who had no colorable claim whatever to have been elected. The Federal Army was brought in to enforce that order and to protect the Legislature thus set up by Packard by virtue of Durell's order. The same power protected Kellogg, who acted as governor.

Is that the action of the President in enforcing the laws of the United States which you wish to approve of? Think of it a moment! I ask Senators how long it would take a President to have in every State such a government as he wished if this mode is approved and practiced? If such orders can be rightfully enforced by the President, or those acting under him, with the Army of the United States, how long will it take to overthrow the State governments unless they resort to resistance? Your Federal appointees can get up a pretense of an order like this, and they can exclude the real Legislature from the State-house by taking possession of it; the marshal can let in those who desire to organize the Legislature on different principles and of a different character from what the majority of the people of the State have decided, and the Federal bayonets protect it, and the will of the people is trampled in the dust! You have the mere shell and form of a republican government, but its vitality, its power to protect and perpetuate itself, is taken away if the Federal Army be strong enough to do it.

I ask gentlemen, in view of these facts, read them any way you please, of the last two years, especially in view of these two marked instances of interference by soldiers, the one under the pretense of protecting from domestic violence when there was nothing worthy of the name, and the other under the pretense of enforcing an order of the United States court which your committee says was void and void on its face, void on the record, which was upon the evidence a mere pretense and sham to prevent the meeting of the Legislature that had color of election, that had the majority of the votes cast—I ask how long will State governments last if under the pretense of enforcing such an order the Army of the United States can be used by the marshal to enforce the order and thus overthrow a State government?

How long can our Government last if the Senate of the United States, that which is looked to as the most conservative body, the freest from passion and party heat, the great conservator in our form of government, can, when such matters have been prominently before the country for two years, pass a resolution which will be read as approving all that has been done? Is it wise; is it just toward either party in this contest? Is it not fair to leave the Executive to do his duty as he understands it, and say nothing of approval or disapproval in this body now? Leave the people of Louisiana with the conviction impressed upon them by the Wheeler committee that they must settle down and agree to some arrangement by which they will have local government, by which they will have peace, by which they will have prosperity again. Give to no faction in that State encouragement that they will be sustained by the Federal authority in any such conduct as is described in the report of your committee.

Domestic violence, insurrection, does not mean such squabble as was going on for the possession of that legislative hall and that Legislature in January last. The State had power to keep the peace. There was no insurrection or violence which could not have been put down without Federal troops. Can we shut our eyes to the fact that the interference was for the purpose of having one party get political control of the Legislature against the other?

Therefore, Mr. President, it seems to me that no resolution in general terms approving the acts I have referred to and others of a similar character should be passed by the Senate. It can do no good. It may do great harm. If this resolution is adopted, it will be invoked as authority for similar acts of outrage by military power in the future.

It seems to me that we are passing a resolution which may be of very great detriment. No evil will come from its being omitted; great evils may come from its being passed, both from the fact that it may be used to encourage partisan men in Louisiana to renew the struggle which there has been an effort to settle, and from the fact that it will be used as a precedent in the future when there are party strifes in States of this character and when the party which chances to be in accord with the Federal administration and in a minority in a State may appeal to it for aid and thus real republican government may be overthrown. It is a resolution which should not be acted upon or adopted. We are not here with a view to any action on this subject; if adopted, it will be but the expression of the opinions or feelings of a bare party majority. Better leave such expressions to party political conventions.

Therefore I urge each Senator to realize how he would regard this matter had this action by the Federal Government been taken in the State he represents. Would he not feel that the rights of himself and the people of his State had been trampled down and that a serious blow had been struck at republican government and civil liberty?

I trust, Mr. President, that the resolution will not pass. I do not believe its adoption will even be advantageous to the political party of our opponents. The American people do not approve this action in Louisiana, and they will not approve the adoption by the Senate of this resolution. If it means what it imports to me, in view of the transactions in reference to which it was drawn, it approves that against which every American, if he hopes that our government, national and State, shall live, must utter his earnest protest every time it is alluded to either in the halls of legislation or in peaceful meetings of the people when they assemble to take counsel together as to their public affairs.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly that the majority on this floor have declined to permit gentlemen who desire to address the Senate upon this resolution, I will not say the courtesy—for I will not use a harsh term—but have declined after we had assured them on the honor of Senators that there would be no factious opposition to this resolution, no consumption of time unnecessarily, to permit the discussion to go on in the ordinary way. I did not intend on this occasion to trouble the Senate with any remarks; I have matured none, and I am not well to-night. I am unfit physically to address this body; but, sir, this resolution cannot pass until I have given my opinions with relation to its demerits.

Mr. BAYARD. With the consent of the Senator from Connecticut, as it is now after nine o'clock, leaving but three hours between this time and Sunday morning for the discussion of this matter, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (at nine o'clock and twelve minutes p. m.) The Senator from Delaware moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (after having voted in the negative.) I notice that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] is not in his seat and we paired with each other. Therefore I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Gordon, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones of Florida, Kernan, McCreery, Maxey, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, Saulsbury, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conkling, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, McMillan, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Patterson, Robertson, Sherman, Spencer, and West—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Booth, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Dawes, Dennis, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Hamlin, Johnston of Virginia, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, McDonald, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Paddock, Sargent, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Windom, and Wright—28.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. EATON. I have no doubt that my distinguished friend from Delaware made this motion because he believed that I was unable to go on upon this occasion. I regretted at the time that he made the motion, and I trust that neither he nor any one else will ask the courtesy of the majority of the Senate on my account, whether I be in good health or ill health.

Mr. President, it will not do any harm in the consideration of this resolution for a few minutes to direct attention to the nature of the Government under which we used to live; whether we do now or not is another question. Let us examine into its characteristics somewhat. Let us see whether this resolution introduced by the Senator from Rhode Island travels out of the Constitution and records of our fathers. What is this Government? I heard an honorable Senator on this floor within the last twenty days call it "a sovereign nation." A curious idea that Senator has of a representative republic. This Government of ours, this great confederation of States, is not a nation, it is a confederacy of nations, it is composed of sovereignties. I know the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] said in his seat the other night that there were no such things as independent, sovereign States. The Supreme Court says there are such things. Therefore the Supreme Court and the honorable Senator from Indiana are at loggerheads. There is another thing about it that interests me somewhat as a Connecticut man. The constitution of Connecticut says so. Otherwise no man can become a citizen of Connecticut. If the honorable Senator from Indiana wished to move to Connecticut (and I wish that he might go there to enjoy the bracing breezes of our salt air) he could never vote in Connecticut unless another amendment of the Constitution of the United States is passed for his especial benefit—no man votes in the State of Connecticut until he holds his hand up before God and man and swears to support the constitution and government of Connecticut as a free and independent State. What is "a free and independent State," let me ask the honorable Senator from Indiana? What is independence as applied to statehood? My State is a sovereign State, though a small one. I in part represent a sovereign State on the floor of this Senate, not a province.

Mr. President, let us look at this matter for one moment; it will do us good, all of us. The States of this Union not sovereign! Is it in the power of the United States Government to interfere with the laws of property in New Jersey, I ask the honorable Senator from New Jersey? Can the Congress of the United States with the President of the United States and with the Army of the United States interfere with the most sacred institution known on earth in the State of New Jersey, I beg to ask the honorable Senator from New Jersey; and is not New Jersey a sovereign State? Sovereign in everything the States of this Union are except in the powers delegated to this organ of theirs, the Federal Government. And a "nation," is it? Sir, I should disgrace my own State, I should forget the names of Ellsworth and Sherman if I did not denounce that heresy. Six times in the convention that formed the Constitution of the United States did two Connecticut men prevent the word "national" from going into the Federal Constitution and insert the word "Federal" instead of "national;" and yet I am told that there are no independent States and that this is one great consolidated empire!

Mr. President, I will not consume a great deal of time upon this branch of an unstudied speech. Therefore gentlemen on the other side need not be alarmed if I should begin at the close of the revolutionary war, for I agree that I will not take a great deal of time between that period and the present. I only allude to it for this reason: A Constitution was formed, and by the terms of that instrument it did not take effect until a certain number of States adopted and ratified it. A certain number of States, eleven, adopted and ratified the Constitution of the United States. Nine was the minimum limit. Now what became of that little Commonwealth so ably represented on this floor by my distinguished friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY?] She was out in the cold a year and a half. What was she? I beg to ask my friend, the senior representative from Rhode Island, what was she for that year and a half? Not a member of this Union; not a member of this confederacy of States. What was she then? She was one of the sovereign powers of the earth, small though she was, and floated her glorious little flag over every sea. Neither of the gentlemen from Rhode Island will deny that she was an independent, sovereign power of the earth. What was North Carolina, that refused to come into the Union? One of the sovereign powers of the earth, and every Senator knows it. Yet we are told here that there are no independent States! Those States were sovereign and independent, owing no allegiance to the Constitution of the United States. They had delegated no powers to the Federal Government. What did they lose; I beg to ask the honorable Senator from Rhode Island what did Rhode Island lose of its sovereignty when it came into the Union except the powers that it delegated to the Federal Government? If there be a member of this honorable Senate who denies that proposition, I should dearly like to give him part of my time to do it. I announce that every State in this confederacy is sovereign, is independent, as sovereign and independent as it was in 1786, except in the powers that it has delegated by the Constitution, and I defy any man or Senator to successfully controvert it here or anywhere, now or at any other time. It is necessary to talk about this when you speak of this infamous resolution which is before the Senate, and I will show it to be infamous before I get through if my strength serves me.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator appeals to me, I beg to say a word. I presume he does not hold that a State which cannot coin money, nor raise an army, nor maintain a fleet, nor enter into foreign alliance, is sovereign unless the agent to which the State has delegated those powers is bound to surrender them at her demand. I presume he does not hold that a State is completely sovereign in this Union unless she has a right to resume all that she gave to the Union and go out at her pleasure.

Mr. EATON. The Senator from Rhode Island sticks in the bark. I have said no such thing. I do not propose to be drawn into the question of secession. I never happened to be a secessionist, and I do not believe I shall begin at this day. I said this, and I say it again, let the Senator from Rhode Island or any other man or lawyer deny it if he can, that in every respect except the powers delegated by the Constitution of the United States each State in this Union is sovereign, sovereign in the institution of marriage, sovereign in all the laws it may pass with regard to property, sovereign in everything except the powers that it has delegated to the Federal Government.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is to say a State is sovereign in every respect except in those respects in which it is not sovereign. [Laughter.]

Mr. EATON. Exactly, and the United States Government is sovereign in every respect except in those respects in which it is not sovereign. [Laughter.]

I thank thee, sir, for teaching me that word.

Exactly so. The Government of the United States is sovereign with regard to coining money; the Government of the United States is sovereign in regard to declaring war; but it has no power with regard to the disposition of property; it has no power in regard to the thousand things that go to make up the sum of human happiness and human misery. All those things are left to the States themselves. Does the gentleman understand me now in what I mean with regard to the sovereignty of the States?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not precisely. I do not understand that the United States has not sovereignty in regard to property. The United States can tax your property, can issue execution to compel the payment of the tax, and sell it for forfeiture. I think that is a pretty important power over property.

Mr. EATON. So can the State do it.

Mr. ANTHONY. But the Senator from Connecticut did not reply to the question which I asked him when I answered his. He says that the States are sovereign in everything except in those powers of sovereignty which they have ceded, which they have delegated to their agent, the Federal Government.

Mr. EATON. That was not just what I said.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is what I understood the Senator to say.

Mr. EATON. It was pretty near it. I did not use the word "sovereign" there. I said the States were sovereign except in the powers—not sovereign powers—which they had delegated to the Federal Government.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then, if the States cannot resume those powers, are they sovereign?

Mr. EATON. O, I have not yet said that they were sovereign except in the powers which they retained. In those powers they are sovereign.

Mr. ANTHONY. But the Senator said that the States were sovereign. When you say a State is sovereign you mean completely sovereign—"every inch a king."

Mr. EATON. I have not said so. If the Senator from Rhode Island says so, I beg to know what power there is on this continent that is sovereign in every particular?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know any.

Mr. EATON. If the Senator from Rhode Island has not been properly answered, it is because I do not feel quite well to-night, and do not take time to go on Monday morning, and therefore I go on now. Sir, I hold this, and am perfectly ready to be questioned by any gentleman, that the Government of the United States has no power which originally belonged to the States except such as the States have delegated. That is my position exactly. I desire the position to be distinctly understood, for I stand upon it here and everywhere, that the Government of the United States has no powers except such as have been delegated by the States of the Union. The States formed this Government; this Government did not form the States. I know a distinguished gentleman, now dead and gone, said that this Government formed the States just as the States form counties. That is a heresy, and every lawyer and every reader of constitutional law knows it is a heresy. This Union was formed by the States, and they are equal. Representation makes a State. The little State of Rhode Island, the little State of Connecticut, and the little State of Delaware stand on this floor the equals of Pennsylvania, of New York, and of Ohio. Why? Because of State sovereignty. That is the reason, and there is no other reason on earth; and every Senator knows it if he will give it his careful attention. Connecticut with six hundred thousand inhabitants is the equal of New York with its five millions. God forbid that I as the representative of one of the smaller States should so far forget not only my patriotism but my love of the States as to admit that this is a government of majorities. There is no greater heresy known on the face of God's footstool than that. This is a government of States—equal States, sovereign States, independent States. When it ceases to be a government of that character, may it be long after I have laid my bones in the soil near my own river!

That is the nature of this Government, in brief, formed by independent sovereignties, formed by free States, formed by equal States. It may be deemed a heresy at this late day, but it was not heresy when Jefferson and Madison lived. This, then, is the nature of the Government, a federal representative republic of equal sovereignties, States of equal power.

Another thing gentlemen ought to recollect, and that is that in a certain contingency the little State of Delaware, the little State of Rhode Island, has the same voice in the election of a President that the State of New York has. Whenever there are three candidates and no election by the people and it is thrown into the House of Representatives, then Delaware has the same power that New York has, Rhode Island the same power that Pennsylvania has, and Vermont the same power that Ohio has; and long may it be so. As my friend from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] suggests to me—and I thank him for the suggestion—the sovereign power of Delaware prevented the election of Aaron Burr to the Presidency.

Mr. McCREERY, (at nine o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) I should like to postpone the hearing of the Senator from Connecticut, and I believe I will make one further appeal to the courtesy of this House. If it is the desire of the majority to sit this measure out, they can do it on Tuesday night. I appeal to them to vote for a motion now to adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is the Senator authorized to state that the Senators on the other side will agree to the proposition to vote on Tuesday night?

Mr. McCREERY. I say that the majority can sit it out on Tuesday night if they choose.

Mr. ANTHONY. The majority can sit it out at any time. If the Senators on the other side will agree that the vote shall be taken on Tuesday night at any time, as long as they choose to prolong debate, I have no doubt the Senators on this side will accede to it.

Mr. McCREERY. As far as I am concerned, I will make the agreement. [Laughter.] I make the motion that the Senate now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. Unless there is an understanding of that kind, it is of no use to make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will state that it has been several times announced that we had no factious opposition to make. It has been repeatedly asserted that we on this side did not intend or desire to make any factious opposition to the passage of this resolution. Our word has been delivered here in the open Senate; it has been distrusted. I say that distrust would now justify us, if we think proper, in resorting to faction in order to prevent this vote. We have stated that while we were unwilling to announce that we would agree that the vote should be taken at any particular hour or any particular day, nevertheless when legitimate debate on this question was terminated we would make no factious opposition; and yet our declarations on this point have been distrusted by the other side, and I say that it would now, if we saw proper, justify us before the country and before the world in resorting to factious opposition if we saw proper. I hope we shall not be driven to that extremity. Legitimate warfare I am always ready to enter into; I do not want to enter into any other; but if driven to extremities, then for one I will defend myself by all the powers which God and nature have put in my hands.

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, Mr. President, the Senator raises up his own enemies and he can very easily subdue them. My friend from Delaware is mistaken when he says that the declarations on the other side that they were not making factious opposition have been distrusted. On the contrary, I stated distinctly that we received them in perfect good faith, and the whole debate has given evidence of the sincerity with which the declaration was made. But we say that if we cannot have a time fixed for taking this vote, we must have the control of the time. If Senators on the other side will fix the time for the close of the debate, if they will fix it on Wednesday at twelve o'clock or at one o'clock, they may use the intervening time just as they see fit and adjourn as early each day as they please.

Mr. SAULSBURY. So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing that gentlemen on the other side shall conduct this debate in their own style. We have said to them candidly and frankly that there were gentlemen on this side of the Chamber who were unwilling to enter into an arrangement to take the vote at any particular time; but at the same time we have accompanied it with the assurance that no factious opposition was contemplated or desired. With that declaration I think our word might be taken. If, however, gentlemen are not willing to acquiesce in that, then I say for one let them select their own time to terminate this debate. For one, I say, I will not consent to fix an hour or a day; but I will do this: I will consent that when proper, fair, and legitimate debate is terminated, I will make no factious opposition to taking the vote, provided we are treated properly. But if we are driven to the use of such parliamentary tactics as we may legitimately employ, I will not pledge myself, unless there is a proper courtesy extended to this side of the House, that we will not resort to them.

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, Mr. President, my friend says an undisputed thing in a very solemn way. Nobody disputes the sincerity of the declaration that has been made on the other side, and we have distinctly admitted it; certainly I have expressly done so. Now, if the Senators will agree that the vote shall be taken on Wednesday at one o'clock, I have no doubt it will be acceded to on this side.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope that the vote will not be postponed half so long, but we do not propose to treat this measure otherwise than in the orderly and usual manner; and to have a measure put upon us instantly without time for consideration I object, and I say to those who urge it, we will talk it out at our pleasure.

Mr. ANTHONY. This question has only been debated about two years; and of course it is now sprung on the Senate! I think we had better have it go on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays are called for on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Gordon, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones of Florida, Kernan, McCreery, Maxey, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, Saulsbury, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Logan, McMillan, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Robertson, Sherman, Spencer, and West—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Booth, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Conover, Dawes, Dennis, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Hamlin, Ingalls, Johnston of Virginia, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, McDonald, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Sargent, Stevenson, Wadleigh, Windom, and Wright—25.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut is entitled to the floor.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I was observing that such was the nature of our Federal Government. When I remarked that the Supreme Court of the United States had decided precisely as I claim, I noticed a smile of derision upon the face of one of my honorable friends on the other side; and therefore I beg leave to read from Wallace's Reports, volume 14, page 113, the case of The Collector vs. Day. The head-note of the case is this:

It is not competent for Congress, under the Constitution of the United States, to impose a tax upon the salary of a judicial officer of a State.

But the State can. That is not in the book; that is the assertion of the speaker. I say it is competent for the State of Connecticut, or Massachusetts, or New Jersey, to tax the salary of a judge, but not for the United States to do it. I read now from the one hundred and twenty-fourth page, because I find here precisely the same idea and very nearly the same language which I used myself:

It is a familiar rule of construction of the Constitution of the Union, that the sovereign powers vested in the State governments by their respective constitutions remained unaltered and unimpaired, except so far as they were granted to the Government of the United States. That the intention of the framers of the Constitution in this respect might not be misunderstood, this rule of interpretation is expressly declared in the tenth article of the amendments, namely, "the powers not delegated to the United States are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." The Government of the United States, therefore—

Mark it, Mr. President—

The Government of the United States, therefore, can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution, and the powers actually granted must be such as are expressly given, or given by necessary implication.

A little more of this document may be wholesome. It is not old; this is in 1870, decided by a full court:

The General Government and the States, although both exist within the same territorial limits, are separate and distinct sovereignties, acting separately and independent of each other, within their respective spheres.

Am I wrong then when I say that each of the State governments of this Federal Union is sovereign, is independent, is free, except as to the powers delegated by each of them respectively to the Federal Government in the Constitution of the United States? I am not quite through with this decision yet. The court say further:

The former—

in its appropriate sphere is supreme; but the States within the limits of their powers not granted, or, in the language of the tenth amendment, "reserved," are as independent of the General Government as that Government within its sphere is independent of the States.

Let there be no sneers then from any Senator when I say that the governments of the States are free and sovereign and independent, except in the powers delegated by the States to the Federal Government; and yet the honorable Senator from Indiana, who played the driver here the other day on this floor and cracked his whip over the heads and shoulders of recusant Senators, says that there is no such thing as a sovereign State, an independent State; and the honorable Senator from Rhode Island adopts his theory! Sir, let both those honorable Senators examine this decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and my word for it they will both change their opinion in regard to the nature of this Government and the powers of the States.

Mr. President, I should not have gone back to the history of the formation of this Government and traced it as briefly as I have done, except that I believe in these latter days, under the teachings of men who have forgotten the theory of our Government, there is danger to our country. Sir, this very resolution on your table, emasculated as it is, is in itself evidence that the people are beginning to forget the history of the formation of their Government. I said it was emasculated. Mr. President, there is a trinity here. On the 5th day of March, 1875, the Senator from Indiana submitted the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, That the State government now existing in the State of Louisiana, and represented by William P. Kellogg as governor, is the lawful government of said State; that it is republican in form; and that every assistance necessary to sustain its proper and lawful authority in said State should be given by the United States, when properly called upon for that purpose, to the end that the laws may be faithfully and promptly executed, life and property protected and defended, and all violators of law, State or national, brought to speedy punishment for their crimes.

That is number 1, and where that is now I know not, but I suppose on your table. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] presented the following resolution on the 16th of March:

Resolved, That the Senate approve the action heretofore taken by the President of the United States in protecting Louisiana from domestic violence, and are of opinion that he should continue to recognize in that State the existing State government.

That is number 2. To-day my honorable friend from Rhode Island sprang this thing upon us: Strike out all after the word "resolved" in the resolution of the Senator from New Jersey and insert—

That the action of the President in protecting the government in Louisiana, of which William P. Kellogg is the executive, and the people of that State against domestic violence, and in enforcing the laws of the United States in that State, is approved.

There is a strong difference in these resolutions while there is a relationship between them. Now I am going into the region of fancy, not fact. I will suppose that when the honorable Senator from Indiana went into caucus some days ago they hooted his resolution out. I suppose so; I do not know it to be true, but we have not heard of it for fifteen days, and we have heard of conferences and caucuses. Next comes the resolution of my distinguished friend from New Jersey, and a caucus is held on that, I may say I know; that is, I believe it, because I was told so by somebody that has good reason to know. That was a little too strong for some gentlemen who fancied that they knew what the law was and what the Constitution was and what sort of a government this government of Kellogg's was. So then my honorable and distinguished friend from Rhode Island has played the surgeon and disposed of the resolutions of the honorable Senator from Indiana and the honorable Senator from New Jersey, and has at last, as I suppose, found one that he thinks, and doubtless may have good reason to think, will be voted for by all our friends on the other side of the Chamber. But how they can all do that I do not yet see. Perhaps we shall hear before we get through. How any honorable Senator who may have said or thought that that government was a government upheld by the bayonet, upheld by the sword, upheld by force which if doubled could not uphold it in another State of this Union and if increased to fifty thousand could not make the people love that government—how any constitutional lawyer, taking that view, can vote to approve the acts of the President of the United States is more than I now know. Probably I shall hear in due time.

Now, Mr. President, I have come, in the desultory way in which I have spoken, to the resolution. Ought this resolution to pass? This resolution ought not to be acted upon by this body. In the first place it is not properly here before this body in my judgment. In the next place, it approves acts which are indefensible and treasonable in my judgment. I do not mince my words when speaking of conduct that I shall speak of by and by. If the acts of the President of the United States are indefensible, then we have no business to pass this resolution. Sir, under another set of circumstances, the body that meets on this floor are the judges of that man who lives at the other end of the avenue. Sir, there is a great living witness that Presidents may be tried. If the conduct of the President of the United States with regard to Louisiana is indefensible, then we dishonor ourselves in the passage of a resolution of this character or in considering a resolution of this character; and I beg to say this, I beg to say it distinctly, I beg to say it to lawyers, good lawyers, honorable men on the other side of the Chamber, that where there is an honest difference of opinion between gentlemen equal in every particular, equal in character, equal in capacity, equal in position, equal in being the representatives of sovereign States on this floor—a difference of opinion with regard to a question of conduct in the Chief Executive of the United States, it is indefensible to undertake to pass such a resolution over the backs of those who object to it. Let it go; let it pass away; and let time determine. Do not spur forward in hot haste in order to plaster over the character of a gentleman who may have acted indefensibly.

I say then, sir, I regret that this resolution is here. I regret it the more because on my honor before God as a Senator of the United States I believe the conduct of the President with regard to the State of Louisiana is indefensible, and I believe that he knows that it is indefensible. Ah, sir, does he desire the passage of this resolution? He may under the circumstances. I well might suppose that the President of the United States who as I believe—I will not say I know, because I have never heard him say it, and therefore I will not say I know it—who as I believe before God desires the passage of a bill to give him the power to take by the throat four sovereign States of this Union, which bill his friends on this floor did not bring to the test of the Senate for some reason (and I think I know the reason)—I say I think he may well desire the passage of this resolution of commendation by the Senate. Why do they not go further and add an amendment to this resolution in order to make the thing entirely safe "that we deeply deplore that the bill died that would have given you the right to suspend the writ of habeas corpus in four States of the Union?" Sir, if we are to kiss the feet of Cæsar, let us do it thoroughly.

I see that gentlemen are pleased. I am glad that I am able to please my friends. There may not be much two years hence to laugh at in the consideration of a resolution of this character. It has gravity, in my judgment; it may not have in the judgment of others. It is a grave thing for me. True, I have not had the advantage of hearing the reasons for it, but it is a grave resolution in my judgment that seeks to cover up the conduct of the President of the United States.

I did not intend to use names, but I cannot well get along without doing it in the way in which I am meeting this question. The Pinchback swindle has been postponed, and this resolution ought to be kept as luggage to go with it until the second Monday of December next, for it is a part of the luggage belonging to the swindle, and why? Because there was no legal Legislature in Louisiana. That was proved here by a committee of your own body. I am not going to read the testimony, nor am I going to wade through the reports of honorable gentlemen, a committee of this body; but I assert here, and no man dare deny, that by the report of your own committee the whole thing was a swindle, and yet you pass a resolution upholding the President for upholding this outrage! There was no lawful governor, no lawful secretary of state, and nothing on earth in those credentials that was legal or lawful except the seal, and that was put there by fraud. Pinchback knew it. He is shrewd. Mr. Secretary, will you be kind enough to produce those credentials? There are two sets; I want both of them. If the House was open, I would have carried him to that end of the Capitol when he was dancing between the two bodies [laughter] with credentials in one hand for the Senate and in the other for the House of Representatives and commissioned as governor besides! My purpose will be answered if Mr. Secretary will report the first credential; I should like to hear that read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The indorsement is:

Forty-second Congress, third session. Credentials of Hon. P. B. S. Pinchback, United States Senator from the State of Louisiana, 1873; January 21 read; December 11 referred to Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. EATON. Now will the Secretary report the new set?

The CHIEF CLERK. The indorsement is:

Forty-third Congress, second session. Certificate of William P. Kellogg, governor of the State of Louisiana, as to the election of Pinckney B. S. Pinchback as United States Senator from that State; —— 1875. January 22 read and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections with the credentials and papers on file.

Mr. EATON. Will the Clerk be kind enough to give the date of the election in the first credential and in the second also?

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF LOUISIANA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
New Orleans, January 15, 1873.

I, William Pitt Kellogg, governor of the State of Louisiana, do hereby certify that on the 15th day of January, A. D. 1873, Pinckney B. S. Pinchback was duly elected by the General Assembly of this State to represent this State in the Senate of the United States for the full term of six years from the 4th day of March, 1873.

Given under my hand and the seal of this State this 15th day of January, A. D. 1873, and the Independence of the United States the ninety-seventh.

[L. S.] WM. P. KELLOGG.

By the governor.

P. G. DESLONDE,
Secretary of State.

Mr. EATON. Be kind enough to read the other.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF LOUISIANA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
New Orleans, January 13, 1875.

I, William Pitt Kellogg, governor of the State of Louisiana, do hereby certify that on Tuesday, the 12th day of January, 1875, the senate of the State of Louisiana met in regular session and proceeded to vote for a Senator to represent the State in the Senate of the United States for the term expiring on the 4th day of March, 1879, whereupon Pinckney B. S. Pinchback received a majority of all the votes cast

I further certify that on the same day the house of representatives of the State of Louisiana also met in regular session and proceeded to vote for a Senator to represent the State in the Senate of the United States for the term expiring as above mentioned, whereupon Pinckney B. S. Pinchback received a majority of all the votes cast.

I also further certify that on Wednesday, the 13th day of January, 1875, the two houses met in joint session and compared their respective journals of the previous day, whereupon Pinckney B. S. Pinchback was declared duly elected to represent the State of Louisiana in the Senate of the United States for the term expiring March 4, 1879.

Given under my hand and the seal of the State this 13th day of January, A. D. 1875, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-ninth.

By the governor.

P. G. DESLONDE,
Secretary of State.

Mr. EATON. Now, Mr. President, as I understand the case, Mr. Pinchback came here directly after getting possession of the first set of credentials with two sets, claiming to be elected by that Legislature as a Senator and by the people of the State as a Representative, and he applied, as I understand and believe, at both doors of this Capitol, at each end, as a Senator at one end and as a Representative at the other, and has not got either yet; and this resolution asks the Senate to say that all that the President of the United States did in reference to that whole matter is right and just!

Did Pinchback resign about three months ago? I believe he did. I do not know the fact; but if he did not resign, how came he to be elected then by this new Legislature, and how came he to bring here credentials signed in the year 1875 by William Pitt Kellogg, and did William Pitt Kellogg, the pretended governor of Louisiana, know whether this man had resigned or not?

Something is rotten in the state of Denmark.

A man holding in his hands or having placed by his hands certain credentials two years ago comes in now to the Senate with a new set and no resignation of his prior office. Sir, this whole thing is rotten, and it stinks in the nostrils of every honest man under the sun in this country. I understand—a fact that I was not aware of before, or if I read it at the time I had forgotten it—that the very credentials to which I have just alluded as alleging this man to be elected member of Congress at large were certified to by himself as acting governor; and my friend from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] says he got a second certificate signed by Kellogg in the month of March next thereafter.

Now, Mr. President, am I not right in saying that this whole business is rotten? To say nothing more with regard to the credentials certifying him as elected a Representative at large for the State of Louisiana, take these two sets; imagine, if it is possible for you to imagine, Mr. President, that a respectable gentleman from Maryland or Michigan, elected by a Legislature that he knew to be a competent and lawful Legislature, would come here as the distinguished gentleman who is your associate has come here in 1875, and if there was any informality in his credentials and he should have been denied another year, I beg to ask, Mr. President, if you or any honorable Senator believes that your distinguished associate would come back and ask for a new set of credentials next year without resigning the position to which he was elected by the Legislature this year? Of course he would not. Sir, there is something radically rotten and wrong in this whole business; and yet this honorable body, this body that has not or ought not to have any superior among the legislative bodies of the world, is called upon to indorse the conduct of the Executive of this Government in upholding these outrages and these wrongs!

Sir, is Louisiana what the Supreme Court of the United States calls a sovereign and independent State or is she a province, which? I beg to ask honorable Senators this question, I beg to ask this question of the Presiding Officer of this body, not supposing that he will come from the chair to answer me but because it is customary to ask a question of the Presiding Officer. For a moment let me suppose that in the great State of New York, so ably represented here by her two distinguished sons, there should be a controversy in regard to the election of a senate or the election of a house of representatives or the election of a governor of that State, do you think, does any living man outside of a school for imbeciles, does any man outside of a lunatic hospital think for one moment that the President of the United States would dare—that is the word, sir, "dare"—to interfere with the government of New York? Sir, I speak as the representative of a sovereignty; would he dare to do it? If he did, he ought to be impeached. What, sir, because there is difficulty in the State of New York with regard to her legislative body or the election of her governor, is the President of the United States to undertake to settle that question with a regiment or ten regiments of men? If that is to be the rule in this country let us know it, and the quicker we know it the better. That is just what he has done in Louisiana, just what he wanted to do in Arkansas; I make the charge; let anybody deny it if he dare. I say his messages are so. Just what he desired in Arkansas he did do in Louisiana.

A committee of this honorable body has said—I shall not trouble myself to read it; I have not the time nor the strength; I assert the fact—a committee of this honorable body has said that there was no legal Legislature there, that there was no duly-elected governor there. I think there was, but I take the report of a committee of this honorable body composed of both parties, as I believe. They say there was no lawful Legislature, there was no lawful government. And what did President Grant do? Uphold what? Nothing. Sir, I charge right here that there was no government for him to uphold, at the head of which was William Pitt Kellogg. Had there been a de facto government in Louisiana, then it would have been perhaps his duty to have upheld that government. What is a de facto government? Gentlemen have spoken with regard to a de facto government here and they have greatly astonished me, if not you, Mr. President. A de facto government, as I understand it, is this: Whenever any government assumes power with a color of right, but irregularly, and sustains itself by its own inherent force and power, that is a government de facto. If the law comes in and sustains it, then it becomes both a government de facto and a government de jure. But there seems to be—I make the assertion again—an inherent force in the government to protect itself and sustain and maintain itself without any extraneous assistance in order to make it a government de facto. That is a government de facto, as I understand a de facto government. If I am wrong, I should like to be corrected, either now or hereafter.

One gentleman supposed that it was a de facto government because President Grant sustained it. That is the very reason why it was not a de facto government. A de facto government sustains and maintains itself. It may be de jure or it may not be; if regular, it is then de jure as well as de facto. If irregular, it is de facto; but the very moment that it requires outside aid to come in and sustain a government that cannot maintain itself, then the power that goes there usurps the authority of the people. That is my charge here broadly and squarely, that here was no government. I cannot stop to read the telegrams, but they were that the republican party demand that arms and armed men be sent there. God help me! has it come to this, that the President of the United States is to be appealed to for arms and armed assistance to sustain the republican party! Will honorable Senators, the representatives of independent or dependent States, if the Senator from Indiana likes it best—so far as his part of the country may be concerned Indiana may be called a dependent State—but will honorable gentlemen representing independent sovereignties on this floor say, dare they say with the oath of God on them to maintain inviolate the Constitution of our land, that the Executive has any authority to interfere to sustain the republican party?

Mr. President, Louisiana trodden down to the earth as she is, Louisiana ground down to the earth as she is, has a right to an independent existence in this Union. There has not been a time in two years and two months—the exact dates I have not and it is no matter—when if the Government of the United States had kept its foot off the soil of Louisiana the people of Louisiana would not have put their own elected officers in power and maintained peace, maintained good order, protected life, and protected property. I say every man knows it. How long is it since the same story came here in regard to Arkansas? "Arkansas cannot take care of herself; Arkansas is going to ruin; Ku-Klux, white-leaguers, and the Lord knows what else, are traveling from one side of its domain to the other;" and yet seventy thousand freemen have determined upon a government in Arkansas; and is there any trouble there to-day? And yet how long is it since the Executive of the United States asked for power to interfere with that State? Now, so satisfied is the President of the United States that Mr. Garland is properly the governor of that State, that he made Brooks the postmaster at some little town in Arkansas. [Laughter.] God help them! The Executive of the United States, who a little while ago said that Garland was a usurper and Brooks the true governor, has taken it all back and made Brooks a postmaster under the Postmaster-General of the United States! And all is order, all is peace!

Mr. President, I have said and I believe that there has been no time in two years when if the troops had been kept away from Louisiana there would not have been order in Louisiana, good government in Louisiana, and the Kellogg government would not live and last there as long as an untimely frost in July. [Laughter.] It has no power, no life within itself.

Sir, is this the way to maintain republican government in the States of the Union? Is the Executive of the United States, sitting here in the chair of state at Washington, to take the opinion and words of men who by his own messages he does doubt and has doubted? Sir, this Government cannot stand; this Government of our fathers I mean, this Government of independent States through its delegated powers given to a Federal Union, cannot stand if this is the way the powers of the Federal Union are to be exercised. Sir, I love the whole of this broad land; I love my own State best, I agree; I would see peace and good order and good government everywhere; I would like to see the dream of an English friend of mine realized. He said to me years ago, with his hand upon his little boy's head, "You and I may not live to see it, but in your country, sir, this child will live to see one hundred sovereignties representing one hundred millions of freemen living under the laws of one country and speaking the language of Shakespeare and Milton." Sir, that was the dream of an English statesman, that in the not distant future there would be one hundred free, independent States here, numbering one hundred millions of freemen, all speaking the Anglo-Norman tongue. Sir, the only way that that dream can be realized is by not building up a strong central government here at Washington, but by letting each State maintain its own government, enact its own laws, and carry them into successful execution. There is no other way. That consummation I work for; that I hope for; that I pray for; that is, the independence of every State free from the interference of the Federal Government. The States are sovereign. Any man who denies that denies the evidence of his own senses. They are sovereign in everything except in the powers which they have delegated. Let us one and all exert a healthful influence upon all our respective communities.

A word more with regard to Louisiana. I said that in my judgment there had not been a time in two years when if the troops of the United States had been removed there would not have been peace, good order, and good government in Louisiana. Does anybody doubt it? Can anybody doubt it? How long is it since the same story was told of Georgia? A little while. How long since the same story was told of old Virginia, God bless her, the mother of Washington, of Jefferson, of Madison, of Clay? It is but a little while since the same story was told of Virginia. Is there a better government now in the Union than the government of Virginia? Is not life safe, property safe? Is not the black man secure in his rights in Virginia? Does anybody deny it? Does anybody doubt it? And is it not true as to Goorgia, is it not true as to Texas, is it not true as to Maryland, is it not true everywhere where the people of the States govern and make their own laws? I assert that it is, and I defy denial. There is not a State in this Union, north or south, east or west, from the Pacific to the Atlantic, from the great lakes to the Gulf, there is not a State anywhere where the mind of the State governs but what the laws are good, property is safe, and life is safe.

Why should Louisiana be made the plaything of the central government? What reason is there for it? There is none. Let it alone. Let the men of Louisiana make their own laws; let the intelligence of the State come to the front and you are safe; the people are safe. Senators talk about the black man's rights not being safe. They are as safe in Georgia as they are in New York, as safe in Virginia as they are in Maryland. It is about time to talk about the white man's rights, our own kith and kin. They have rights; the rights are not all on one side. I ask no especial protection for the white man; but for God's sake in this land of ours give our brethren equal chance. Do not make laws to cripple the white race. Let the laws be equal, even, well balanced; let the scales be held properly, justly, equally. Sir, I should scorn myself as a representative of one of the old original thirteen if I did not hold this doctrine on this floor. I represent my people when I hold it. It is the same doctrine that my distinguished colleague would hold here to-night if he was on this floor. We represent our people, democrats and republicans, when we say, Let the people govern everywhere in every State. Why should you or I undertake to make laws for Missouri or Arkansas or Louisiana or Georgia? That maxim of Jefferson should be written in letters of gold and placed over every legislative hall in this broad land: "That government is the best which governs the least." Let the people be self-reliant, not slaves. Let them govern themselves. Make as few laws as possible. That is the way to do your duty to the people whose servants you are. You are not sovereign. The people of the States are sovereigns, not we; not the gentleman who lives at the other end of the avenue; he is their chief servant, not their sovereign.

Mr. President, ought this resolution then to pass?

That the action of the President in protecting the government in Louisiana—of which W. P. Kellogg is the executive, and the people of that State against domestic violence, and in enforcing the laws of the United States in that State, is approved.

God save the mark!

I think I asked the question what is the object of this resolution. Will somebody tell it before we get through with this discussion? Did ever any Senate in executive session pass a resolution approving the conduct of George Washington for preventing domestic violence in Pennsylvania? Did ever anybody in executive session pass a resolution of this character because there was no domestic violence permitted in Rhode Island on one occasion? Sir, what is the object of this resolution? Why is it offered here? Is it "the beginning of the end," and is the end a third term? Is this Senate of the United States required to shoot the first gun with regard to the election in 1876? What is the object of this resolution? Some of my learned senatorial friends on the other side will tell me by and by, I hope. I should be glad to learn its object either now or by and by.

What is its object? Has the man done his duty in Louisiana? If so, let him alone. Do not pass a resolution or make a stump speech over him either. This resolution would do very well in a convention that may be held one of these days in Louisiana or in Arkansas or in Nevada, or anywhere else, that the people of that State thought he did his duty by Louisiana. I do not think so, but if they do, it would be very well in a political convention to say so. It is out of character here, and as I said in opening it is asking nearly half of this body to vote for a resolution that they believe to be fundamentally wrong in principle as well as wrong in fact; and such a resolution, as I had the honor of saying before, ought not to be pressed upon a body of the great character of this Senate.

So, Mr. President, I have—I know very imperfectly—given some of the reasons why I will not vote for this resolution. It would degrade my manhood to vote for it. I am speaking of myself and not of any other honorable Senator. I should dishonor my State to vote for it. I should vote for a resolution fundamentally wrong in principle, to say nothing about its being wrong in fact. Gentlemen—I do not use the word offensively, beginning with number 1, voting that down, then number 2, voting that down, then number 3—may be brought up to the mark and may be dragooned to vote for this resolution, and why? Let us have a reason why. I hope it will not be forced down anybody's throat by the mere force of numbers without a reason being given for it. Let us have a reason, a satisfactory reason of some gentleman, why a resolution of this character should be proposed at this time.

We were not called here to sing pæans to the President of the United States. We were called here in executive session to do two things only, or three perhaps. We had a claimant for a seat here. That was proper business for this called session. We had a treaty or two to examine and we had appointments to confirm, and that is all we were called here to do.

While I do not find any fault, Mr. President, that the Chair ruled as he did—as we say in the courts, doubtless I was wrong and the Chair right and therefore I find no fault with the ruling of the Chair—but I beg leave to say that there is not any parliamentary law in any civilized land on earth where a body just like this is constituted and brought together under parliamentary law for great purposes where a resolution of this character would not be pronounced out of order. I stake my reputation as a parliamentarian of some experience against that ruling. We were called here for certain purposes, had certain powers and no other powers under parliamentary law. We have the power of the Senate; we can put our feet on all parliamentary rules and can do just what we please, but we do it in violation of parliamentary law if we do it, and so I say with regard to this resolution.

It has been suggested that the Constitution requires the President occasionally to approve the action of Congress, but never, so far as I know, the Congress or the Senate either to approve the action of the President. The cart is before the horse; it is a contradiction of terms. I oppose this resolution for these various reasons: in the first place, because the resolution is improperly before this body; in the second place, because it is fundamentally wrong in principle as well as wrong in fact.

I beg leave to say right here not offensively to anybody, to the draughtsman of the resolution or any other honorable Senator, that there is not one word of truth in this resolution or to be deduced from it. If by truth you mean that you will approve of the act of the President because that act is constitutional and proper, then it is untrue and there is not one word of truth in it. No act of his with regard to the government of Louisiana has been constitutional, not one; and therefore if by protecting the government in Louisiana you mean there was a legal government, it is untrue.

Of which W. P. Kellogg is the executive.

If you mean by this resolution that he is the lawful executive of that government, then it is false and untrue. He is at the head of a usurping government, not even a government de facto, to say nothing of a government de jure. This Government holds him there with the broadsword and the bayonet, and everybody knows it. No man will deny that. His government would not last one minute without the assistance of extraneous power, and yet we are called upon here to approve of that usurpation.

Sir, the resolution ought not to pass, and when it does pass the Senate of the United States will have written a disgraceful and dishonorable chapter in its history.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the substitute proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, obtained the floor.

Mr. ANTHONY. Unless the Senator from Tennessee prefers to go on this evening, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Very well.

Mr. LOGAN. Let us have an executive session for a few minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to that. I give way for that motion.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at eleven o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, March 22, 1875.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I submit a resolution which I will call up for consideration after the resolution now before the Senate shall have been disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Presiding Officer of the Senate be, and hereby is, directed to adjourn the Senate without day on the — day of ——, A. D. 1875, at —— o'clock.

PAY OF PAGES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. MITCHELL. I offer the following, to lie over until to-morrow:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay to the pages of the Senate at the rate of $2.50 per diem pay to the 15th day of April, 1875.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

PRESIDENT'S ACTION IN LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN on the 16th instant:

Resolved, That the Senate approve the action heretofore taken by the President of the United States in protecting Louisiana from domestic violence, and are of opinion that he should continue to recognize in that State the existing State government.

The question pending being on the amendment of Mr. ANTHONY to strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert the following:

That the action of the President in protecting the government in Louisiana, of which William P. Kellogg is the executive, and the people of that State against domestic violence, and in enforcing the laws of the United States in that State, is approved.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Mr. President, notwithstanding I have been in the habit of speaking in public for a number of years, sometimes in deliberative bodies and sometimes before the people, I confess that I appear before the Senate this morning under great embarrassment. I fear that the fact of my having obtained the floor on Saturday night and notice having been given that I would address the Senate to-day may have created an expectation with some that cannot be realized, and especially so with those who are not acquainted with me. If any such expectation has been created in the minds of any of those here present, I trust and hope that they will let themselves down, for they will be greatly disappointed on this occasion.

It was my intention when this question was first brought before the Senate not to participate in the discussion. My entrance into the Senate was of so recent a date and under such peculiar circumstances, that I had determined that I would not participate in any discussion during the present session of the Senate; but things have taken such a direction that I feel it incumbent on me to say something in reference to the resolution now under consideration; and what I may say on this occasion I want it distinctly understood grows out of no party bias or partisan feeling whatever, but proceeds from the ground which I take that the resolution proposes to cover and indorse an act and a measure that I think clearly violative of the organic law of the land. That being so, I could not get my consent, being compelled to vote against it in compliance with my view of the Constitution of the country, to do so without assigning at least some of the reasons which actuate me.

I ask the Secretary to please read the original resolution and then the substitute offered in lieu of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the resolution and the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution originally submitted by Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN is in the following words:

Resolved, That the Senate approve the action heretofore taken by the President of the United States in protecting Louisiana from domestic violence, and are of opinion that he should continue to recognize in that State the existing State government.

It is proposed to amend that resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved" and inserting—

That the action of the President in protecting the government in Louisiana, of which William P. Kellogg is the executive, and the people of that State against domestic violence, and in enforcing the laws of the United States in that State, is approved.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. In the first place, Mr. President, it seems to me that a resolution embracing questions of such great importance is not legitimately before this body, or, in other words, it is not legitimate to consider it before a Senate convened in such a session as we are now holding. I understand that the Senate has been convened in extra session for the purpose mainly of acting upon executive business, not embracing questions of legislation, but simply to act upon business pertaining to the executive department. The Senate being a part of the treaty-making power, the Senate having to confirm or reject nominations that may be made, it is convened for these purposes; and I consider the legitimate business of the Senate during this session confined to matters falling under these heads; but the Senate has assumed and taken charge of measures that look far beyond this. If it is legitimate to consider the measure now under consideration by this body, it is legitimate to consider every question upon which the Administration has acted since its advent into power. It would be as legitimate, for instance, to offer a resolution expressing an opinion in reference to reducing the expenditures of the Government, saying that that ought to be done, that retrenchment should be commenced, that we should return to a sound currency, and a long list of questions that might be enumerated.

Again, it seems to me we are traveling still further out of the record when the Executive goes forward and presumes to act in advance of the Legislature for the Legislature to reverse positions with the Executive and take up his acts and approve them. Ordinarily measures are presented to the consideration of Congress, and when Congress acts upon them it is the duty of the President to consider its acts and to approve or reject them, and it is not the duty of the Senate or the Congress of the United States to sit in judgment, as it were, upon his acts and approve or reject such measures as he may think proper to act upon. This is reversing the whole order of things, reversing the origin of legislation; it is reversing the policy and the principle on which the Legislature has acted for a number of years, or perhaps from the very origin of the Government to the present time.

I presume every Senator remembers well the famous resolutions brought forward years ago by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, Mr. Clay, in reference to General Jackson, resolutions condemning him for the removal of the deposits from the Bank of the United States, condemning and censuring that act in strong terms. Both Houses of Congress were together then; they were sitting as the legislative department of the Government. Notwithstanding the Senate passed those resolutions, it was considered, and so determined by the country afterward, that they were illegitimate and that it was not the place of the Senate to pass upon the action of the Executive unless they were sitting as a court of impeachment. But now we are called upon as a Senate to approve past acts of the President of the United States. The resolutions adopted by the Senate in regard to the action of General Jackson when he was President of the United States was at a time when both Houses of Congress were in session, when they were convened under the provisions of the Constitution; and yet though they acted in that position, the separate action of the Senate in regard to the act of the Executive was subsequently determined and declared by this body to be unconstitutional and expunged from the Journal of the Senate of the United States.

It seems to me that that should settle the question most clearly and prove that we have no such authority, especially in the absence of the other House. There are many things that it is as legitimate for us to express an opinion upon as upon this resolution. What does this resolution propose? It seems that it has required great care and attention on the part of those who have prepared this resolution to get it in its present shape. The first resolution, introduced by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] was drawn up in somewhat broader terms, perhaps too broad for some members of the Senate to support. Then the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] introduced a resolution, seemingly not so broad. Then came the substitute proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] which seems to narrow it down almost to an abstract idea; but when we come to get at it in substance, the resolutions are all the same, and a mere modification in the matter of verbiage to suit the particular views of some individual does not change the substance in the slightest degree. It is simply calling upon the Senate to express an opinion in reference to the executive conduct in the organization of the State of Louisiana and to approve of that act.

Now the query comes up, what has been the course of the Government in reference to cases of this kind? I will refer to one for the sake of making an introduction to what I am going to say; and it is a case which occurred in 1866. In the State of Tennessee, in a reorganization of government there, there was a governor elected and a Legislature elected under an amended constitution which had been adopted by the people in convention amending the original constitution. The Legislature was convened; the governor was qualified and in the discharge of his duties as governor of the State. Here was the legislative department, here was the executive department, here was the judicial department, co-ordinate branches of the government. According to the theory that has been acted upon by the States and by the Federal Government, each one of these branches of the government, each one of these departments, should move in its appropriate sphere, and one has no right to encroach upon the others.

When the Legislature was convened, there came to be a difference of opinion between the governor of the State and the Legislature, and that difference of opinion became almost factious; the Legislature became refractory and the governor became refractory. The governor undertook to control the Legislature. The Legislature refused to keep a quorum. Here was a contest between two civil departments of the government of the State of Tennessee. The governor wanted his policy carried out, his measures acted upon. The Legislature were opposed to them, and for the purpose of defeating the governor in carrying out his plans they reduced the number of members present below a quorum.

Here was a struggle between two civil departments of the government, the legislative and the executive. According to the theory and according to the constitution itself they were co-ordinate branches of the government and one had no right to encroach upon the other. We know the provision that is made in nearly all the States, and perhaps in all of them, in the establishment and in the government of Legislatures. There are certain rules prescribed. The executive department is laid down, the legislative is prescribed also, and the Legislature has the power to be the judge of the qualifications and elections of its own members. It has a right to prescribe rules for its own government; it has the power to compel the attendance of absent members, thereby making inherent in the body the power to preserve its organization and its existence, and the responsibility is upon the Legislature and not upon the governor. To defeat some measure that was favored and advocated and recommended by the executive department the members of the legislative department reduced the Legislature below a quorum. Then the struggle came. The executive assumed the high prerogative of taking charge of the Legislature and having the members brought in and compelled to act. Some of the members tendered their resignations which were rejected by the governor; others absented themselves or refused to vote, and thus reduced the house below a quorum. Here was almost the precise case that you have in Louisiana. Here, though the struggle was not strictly between the governor and contending members for seats in the Legislature, the main issue was between the Legislature and the governor. That was the great struggle. We find in the case of Louisiana, and it is so said and conceded by all who speak on the subject, that the military was there obeying the behests of the governor in organizing the Legislature and organizing a Legislature that favored him. In principle it is precisely the same case. Let us see what was the action of the government in the first case referred to in 1866.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, July 5, 1866.

SIR: As it is evidently the design of your resignation to reduce the house below a quorum, and to break up the Legislature, the same is not accepted.

W. G. BROWNLOW.

Hon. M. E. W. DUNNAWAY.

Here was an attempt to force a member to act by a refusal of his resignation on the part of the governor. It was not for the governor to organize the Legislature; it was not for him to compel the attendance of absent members. No; that was a prerogative belonging to the body itself and not to the governor. I proceed with the account of the transaction:

Mr. Williams, member from Carter County, sent in a communication, declaring that he could not and would not participate in adopting the proposed amendment until he had first submitted it to his constituents, and he therefore refused to attend the session.

Well, that is a pretty good reason on the part of a member.

The governor applied to the military commander of the district for assistance in bringing the fugitive members back to their duties, when the following correspondence took place.

General George H. Thomas was then in command of that department, and he was induced by the governor to apply to the Lieutenant-General of the Army, here at that time, for military aid to assist Governor Brownlow in organizing the Legislature. This is his dispatch:

NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE, July 14, 1866.

Lieutenant-General GRANT, Washington:

Some of the members of the house of representatives of the Tennessee General Assembly conduct themselves in a very refractory manner, absenting themselves to prevent a quorum, thus obstructing business.

The governor cannot manage them with the means at his disposal, and has applied to me for military assistance. Shall I furnish it?

GEO. H. THOMAS,
Major-General Commanding.

This dispatch was sent to the Lieutenant-General of the Army at that time—and in calling him by name it is simply to be understood, for it is not my intention on this occasion to give utterance to a single personal expression, but to speak of public acts in the manner and mode that a public man has a right to speak of them. This dispatch was brought to the Secretary of War, by the Secretary of War it was brought to the President of the United States, and this reply was prepared and forwarded to General Thomas, to which I call the attention of the Senate:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 17, 1866.

General Grant will instruct General Thomas that the facts stated in his telegram do not warrant the interference of the military authority.

The administration of the laws and the preservation of the peace in Nashville belong properly to the State authorities, and the duty of the United States forces is not to interfere in any way in the controversy between the political authorities of the State, and General Thomas will strictly abstain from any interference between them.

There is the precise case and that was the action of the Government. It was thought then that that was a civil struggle, a contest between two divisions of a State government, with which the military authority of the United States could not interfere, as stated in the telegram sent back by him. That dispatch was signed by the Secretary of War, but written in the presence of the President, and sent by General Grant to General Thomas, saying that this is not a case that calls for the interference of the military, and that General Thomas should abstain under all circumstances from any interference whatever.

It would seem that this marked the line between the civil and military authority. There is the precedent of the Government in that case, and the cases are almost parallel. That is what this Government thought then; that was the course that it took. But what are we told now? We see that the now President of the United States was familiar with and understood what was the construction of the Government in cases of this kind as to the interference of the military with the civil power. We see that the question is not a new one to him, and that he has not acted without proper and thorough information upon the subject. If he conveyed in a telegram an order of this kind to General George H. Thomas, of course it must have been understood by him what was the true doctrine and principle upon which cases of this kind should be managed by the military.

But there is another circumstance in this line of thought, a great fact as I conceive it, and that is that in 1867 General Sheridan was in command of the fifth military district, as it was called at that time, and that his management of that district produced so much dissatisfaction, such was his officious interference, such were his oppressive acts, that there was one general wail, one united murmur coming up from that section of the country, and that was for his removal, and he was removed from the command.

The complaints against him originally grew out of his manner of executing the so-called reconstruction laws. The Attorney-General gave an opinion as to their meaning which seemed not to suit the views of this commandant, and when he telegraphed this fact to the commanding general at Washington that officer replied to Sheridan:

Enforce your own construction of the military bill until ordered to do otherwise. The opinion of the Attorney-General has not been distributed to the district commanders in language or manner entitling it to the force of an order.

He persevered in his course and made many removals of local civil officers, and finally his conduct became such that he was taken from that district.

I merely refer to these facts to show that what now transpires is nothing new to the parties engaged in the work of usurpation, in the work of tyranny, in the work of violating the organic law of the land, which is being transacted. In consequence of this wail that came up from the people it was determined by the President then that this man should be removed, and his removal was ordered in this order, dated August 17, 1867:

Major-General George H. Thomas is hereby assigned to the command of the fifth military district, created by the act of Congress passed on the 2d day of March, 1867.

Major-General P. H. Sheridan is hereby assigned to the command of the Department of the Missouri.

Major-General Winfield S. Hancock is hereby assigned to the command of the Department of the Cumberland.

That order was changed afterward on account of the indisposition and sickness of General Thomas, and General Winfield S. Hancock was sent to take command of the fifth military district, which included the State of Louisiana, by this order of August 26, 1867:

Major-General P. H. Sheridan will at once turn over his present command to the officer next in rank to himself, and proceeding, without delay, to Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, will relieve Major-General Hancock of the command of the Department of the Missouri.

Major-General George H. Thomas will, until further orders, remain in command of the Cumberland.

It will be remembered by most persons, and especially by members of the Senate, that when General Hancock took command some of the persons who had been removed from office were reinstated and peace and quiet were restored to the department; general satisfaction was insured and General Hancock in an order addressed to the people of that district laid down the true dividing line between the military and the civil power and gave supremacy to the civil authority over the military, and sustained and restored the civil authority in that department. Perhaps I might as well read the order issued by General Hancock on assuming command:

First. In accordance with the General Orders No. 81, Headquarters of the Army, Adjutant-General's Office, Washington, District of Columbia, August 27, 1867, Major-General W. S. Hancock hereby assumes command of the fifth military district—the department composed of the States of Louisiana and Texas.

Second. The general commanding is gratified to learn that peace and quiet reign in this department, and it will be his purpose to preserve this condition of things. As a means to this great end, he regards the maintenance of the civil authorities in the faithful execution of the laws as the most efficient under existing circumstances. In war it is indispensable to repel force by force, and overthrow and destroy opposition to lawful authority; but when insurrectionary force has been overthrown, peace established, and the civil authorities are ready and willing to perform their duties, the military power should cease to lead, and the civil administration resume its natural and rightful dominion.

Solemnly impressed with these views the general announces that the great principles of American liberty still are the lawful inheritance of this people and ever should be. The right of trial by jury, the habeas corpus, the liberty of the press, the freedom of speech, and the natural rights of persons and the rights of property must be observed. Free institutions, while they are essential to the prosperity and happiness of the people, always furnish the strongest inducements to peace and order. Crimes and offenses committed in this district must be referred to the consideration and judgment of the regular civil authorities, and these tribunals will be supported in their lawful jurisdiction.

Should there be violations of existing laws which are not inquired into by the civil magistrates, or should failures in the administration of justice by the courts be complained of, the cases will be reported to these headquarters, when such orders will be made as may be deemed necessary. While the general thus indicates his purpose to respect the liberties of the people, he wishes all to understand that armed insurrections or forcible resistance to the laws will be instantly suppressed by arms.

By command of Major-General W. S. Hancock.

When this change was made in the command of that district there sprang up a controversy between the Executive and the commanding general of the Army, the latter protesting against the removal of General Sheridan, alleging that he was a very popular man and that to remove him was violating the will of the people; but notwithstanding this assertion, which was mere assertion and so stated and proven to be at the time, quiet and order were restored by General Hancock. Some of the reasons for removing Sheridan I will give from a communication made at the time:

Their affairs appear to be in a disturbed condition, and a bitter spirit of antagonism seems to have resulted from General Sheridan's management. He has rendered himself exceedingly obnoxious by the manner in which he has exercised even the powers conferred by Congress, and still more so by a resort to authority not granted by law nor necessary to its faithful and efficient execution. His rule has, in fact, been one of abolute tyranny without reference to the principles of our Government or the nature of our free institutions. The state of affairs which has resulted from the course he has pursued has seriously interfered with a harmonious, satisfactory, and speedy execution of the acts of Congress, and is alone sufficient to justify a change. His removal, therefore, cannot "be regarded as an effort to defeat the laws of Congress;" for the object is to facilitate their execution, through an officer who has never failed to obey the statutes of the land, and to exact, within his jurisdiction, a like obedience from others.

That is what was said then to the general in command of the Army on the transfer of General Hancock to this department; and after taking command of the department he issued the orders that I have alluded to, giving general satisfaction and acknowledging the supremacy of the civil over the military authority of the country.

In view of these facts, the query comes up in this distracted condition of affairs in Louisiana, why is it that this man has been selected and sent back to those people who before condemned his acts and prayed for his removal? Why is it? It was known that he was a source of altercation and dissatisfaction when there before; and why was it now in contemplation to send there an enemy, a man who was obnoxious to that whole people, except to a few perhaps who may have been interested in a particular line of policy or measures or something that they wanted to accomplish? How many distinguished men are there in the Army who could have been sent, and why should he have been selected to be sent there? Was it for the purpose of irritation? Was it for the purpose of provoking that people to acts of violence? Was it for the purpose of getting up insurrections and mobs and riots, so as then to raise the cry "these southern people are in revolt," and in the midst of the war-cry and through the prejudices of one portion of the country excited against another go into a presidential election? It is very easy to see what the result would be, or what the expectation might have been. No; "let us have peace!"

I know the determination of that people. Their great object is to be restored back into the Union upon equal footing with all the other States, and have a fair participation in the legislation of the country. That is all they desire. But what is that to those who are acting behind the curtain and who are aspiring to retain power, and if it cannot be had by popular consent and the approval of their public acts would inaugurate a system of terrorism, and in the midst of the excitement, in the midst of the war-cry, triumphantly ride into the Presidency for a third presidential term; and when that is done, farewell to the liberties of the country. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will interrupt the Senator at this moment to remind the galleries that it is contrary to the rules either to approve or disapprove. The Sergeant-at-Arms will put sufficient force in the galleries to maintain order.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Sir, it is my honest conviction that the real meaning of all this is a desire for a third term for the Presidency of the United States, violating the example that Washington set and which has become equal to a part of the Constitution by the general acquiescence and approval and almost looked upon as sacred as if it was a part of the Constitution itself. Even Washington, the Father of his Country, when he had served four years, wanted to retire at the expiration of his first term. He thought that was long enough, and his farewell address was partly prepared at the termination of his first term of four years; but being prevailed upon by those who surrounded him, in view of the peculiar condition of the country, to accept a second term when that expired, he terminated his connection with the Government. That example has since been pursued and followed and looked upon as a part of the Constitution of the country. But I suppose it is almost out of order to refer to Washington now! Is not the present condition of affairs humiliating when we look at the example that he set in many things? Look at the great probity of his character. When he accepted office what did he say in reference to the morals of the country and the expenditures of the Government? In his message that he sent to Congress with regard to making provision for the executive department he asked them to make no further provision for the executive department than was absolutely necessary to defray the legitimate expenses of the office. We know furthermore that Washington was opposed to a third term, and set the example of serving but two. We know also that in sustaining the morals of the country, and in setting an example both by his practice and in precept, Washington received no more while he was serving the country even in the Army than a bare sufficiency to defray his expenses.

There is a provision contained in the Constitution which declares that "no title of nobility shall be granted by the United States; and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them shall * * * accept of any present, emolument, office, or title of any kind whatever from any king, prince, or foreign state." The minds of those who made the Constitution were directed to the other side of the water; they thought temptation was most likely to come from that direction. If in the last line of this clause of the Constitution they had added "or any citizen of the United States," what a fortunate thing it would have been. [Laughter.] More danger lies in gifts and presents and gratuities from citizens of the United States to public officers than from any prince or potentate or foreign power. Here it is in our midst, right among us, and if some Senator were now to offer a resolution suggesting the propriety, and giving it as the Senate's opinion, that the Constitution ought to be amended in this respect, it would be a subject of very important consideration about this particular period.

Here let me refer to a resolution passed in 1695 in the House of Commons in reference to the speaker of that body, Sir John Trevor, who in thirty years mounted from the lawyer's stool to such dignity, that in a national and royal procession for him was reserved a very distinguished place; and how high this distinction was you will understand when you know what this procession was in which he thus appeared. It was the funeral of Queen Mary, the wife of King William III. Her burial took place on the 5th of March, 1695, a day long memorable in London. The queen had died young; she died beloved. Her death was sudden, almost terrible; she was struck down by the malignant small-pox. Public sorrow for Queen Mary was great—never was so universal a mourning, constrained by true sympathy. Parliament resolved to follow her body to the grave. Never before had Parliament followed a royal female. They did so, however; robed in long cloaks of scarlet and black, attended by the maces, the emblems of their dignity, both the House of Lords and the House of Commons came after the hearse, on which was laid the purple velvet-shrouded coffin. The streets were hung with black. It was, in truth, a pageant of unusual solemnity. The whole English nation was represented there—the nobility, the judges, the lord mayor, all the authorities both civil and religious; and walking in this grand procession between the Peers and the House of Commons, in a space set apart to do him honor, with a mace borne before him and his train carried up, there walked that knavish, squinting lad, now grown into a knavish, squinting man. His name was Sir John Trevor. As speaker of the House of Commons he took this place, nor had any of their speakers before him been thus distinguished as the first commoner of the realm; no former speaker had been honored by heading in a royal procession the whole House of Commons. Thus was Sir John Trevor, as the first commoner of the realm, publicly ennobled on the 5th of March, 1695. Within a week, in the eyes of all England, he was a man the lowest and most degraded among Englishmen. This was how it happened. We saw Trevor on that 5th of March, as speaker of the House of Commons, leading the house after Queen Mary's coffin. What is it that only seven days later Trevor had to do as speaker? Standing in his high place, standing there before all the representatives of England, he had to read aloud words to this effect:

Resolved, That Sir John Trevor, speaker of the house, for receiving a gratuity of one thousand guineas from the city of London, is guilty of a high crime.

This was the resolution of the House of Commons, and this was what England did in 1695. Notwithstanding there has been so much reference made to the corruptions of England and the English government, such was their view and such was their action in reference to the speaker of their House of Commons who had received a thousand guineas as a gratuity for his influence and assistance in passing a bill through the House for the benefit of the city of London. A thousand guineas! Only $5,000! If you look around and contemplate for a moment can you not find that this principle could be applied in this country? Perhaps it would be as legitimate to have a resolution of that character under consideration for the expression of opinion in this body to-day as the one that we have before us. This resolution was adopted on the 12th of March, 1695, now one hundred and eighty years ago. It lives in history. Notwithstanding the government of England has been called corrupt, that was their view of gratuities. We find that they carried it so far as that. You will find it in Macaulay or in the History of the Speakers of the House of Commons. They carried this proposition so far that he was made to read the resolution so as to feel to the fullest extent his own degradation. When the resolution was adopted he was made to get up and read the resolution which condemned him and which expelled him from the house.

This would be just as legitimate a subject for the Senate now to consider as the one before us. I might express an opinion in reference to citizens receiving gifts from citizens, when it is provided in the Constitution of the country that they shall not receive them from any foreign prince, potentates, or power. Why not consider a subject like that? Let the popular heart understand it and let it respond. It is time we turned our attention to things like these. Where are we going? What is the condition of the country? I merely refer to this for the purpose of making a general application to anybody that is guilty of like conduct. That is what England did to one of her speakers who had accepted gratuities from a corporation for his influence in its behalf.

When we get to the Kellogg government in Louisiana what do we find there? Do we find a case like the one to which I have called the attention of the Senate and then do we find the action to correspond with the action then taken? When we get to Louisiana we find that Kellogg comes in as governor; how? A committee of the Senate, composed of able gentlemen, made a report in reference to Mr. Kellogg and the government of Louisiana, and in the conclusion of their report they say:

It cannot be maintained that its prudent exercise violates the rights of the States, because the States, for their own protection and security, have conferred the power upon the National Government; and this Government cannot refuse or neglect to exercise it in a proper case without disregarding the obligation which the Constitution has devolved upon it. We think the melancholy condition of the people of Louisiana, who are substantially in a state of anarchy—makes it the duty of Congress to act in the premises.

The committee report that it is the duty of Congress to act in the premises. The committee who made this report argue I think very ably and refer to the Constitution of the United States to show that it is not the Executive, it is not the Senate, it is not the House of Representatives, but the United States that is to guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government. Is the President "the United States?" When and how did the President get to be "the United States?" The Constitution reads:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government.

Does that authorize the Executive upon his own volition, upon his mere ipse dixit, to take charge of a State government in person or by his agent, some man selected from the Army? No, sir, it authorizes no such thing; and the interference with the State of Louisiana today by the President taking charge of that government is a palpable violation of the Constitution of the United States. The committee in their report say:

Therefore your committee recommend the adoption of the following resolutions: 1. Resolved, That there is no State government at present existing in the State of Louisiana.

"That there is no State government at present existing in the State of Louisiana." Hence immediate action is to be had. The State has reached that point in which she shows her incapacity, her want of capability to govern herself, and, as the committee ably argue, it must be a very extreme case for even Congress and the President together to act in reference to a State government. I should think in a great case of emergency, when the State was in anarchy, when all was confusion and disorder, there might possibly arise a condition of affairs in which the Government of the United States, "the United States," according to the forms of law and the Constitution, might pass a law for the rescue of a community like that from anarchy and disorder; but the case should be extreme and the interference should be well considered before it is done. But how is it in this case? The President of the United States assumes to take command of the State and assign these people a governor. What does he say himself on this point? Let us put what he says with what the committee say. He says in his message sent to the Senate, as my friend from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] read the other day, but I read it again in this connection:

It has been bitterly and persistently alleged that Kellogg was not elected Whether he was or not is not altogether certain, nor is it any more certain that his competitor, McEnery, was chosen. The election was a gigantic fraud, and there are no reliable returns of its result.

Here are two men who have been contending for the gubernatorial chair of a State, neither of them entitled to it, and in that contest there has been a most "gigantic fraud" practiced, in the language of the President, thereby precluding and disqualifying either for holding the office, but the President finds a usurper in power, and he takes it upon himself to make the Government of the United States a party to his usurpation. If this course is to be practiced, and the Federal Government is to be made a party to every one who is an aspirant for the office of governor or for a seat in a Legislature, if it stands here ready and willing to make itself a party to any contestant for power in a State, I say we have inaugurated a state of things that will result in the overthrow of the States which compose this Union. In that case the existence of the State governments would depend entirely on the interference of the Federal Government. The contest would be which would be the stronger party successful in the State, and then, it being successful, it is made incumbent on the party in power here to maintain and preserve it as a State in such shape, dependent on the bayonet and dependent on the sword. In this case this able committee in their report made by these distinguished men, all united and agreeing in politics, four in number, say there was no government there, and they reported a bill for the United States to provide for the difficulty and not to authorize General Grant to take possession of Louisiana and make himself the supporter of one of the parties there.

Is not this monstrous in a free government? The time has been in this country, and since my recollection, when had an act of usurpation been perpetrated and practiced like this it would have produced a shock throughout the nation. The nation would have been shaken from one extreme to the other, and would have been ready to have hurled from power the perpetrator of such an act. But now we see things differently. We see men exercise powers not authorized by the organic law of the land. They have gotten outside of the instrument altogether, and they are acting in a way that will bring this Government to an end or change its character so that its ancient features and its familiar structure will all be lost. What more do we find? In looking to General Grant's message he says:

I sent General Sheridan there.

As though it were a matter of cognizance for him to look over the country! Then when we come to the report of the Secretary of War we find a very strange letter, with all due respect to the Secretary of War—I am merely referring to him as such; he wrote the following letter to General Sheridan:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, December 24, 1874.

General P. H. SHERIDAN,
Chicago, Illinois:

GENERAL: The President sent for me this morning, and desires me to say to you that he wishes you to visit the States of Louisiana and Mississippi, and especially New Orleans, in Louisiana, and Vicksburgh and Jackson, in Mississippi, and ascertain for yourself, and for his information, the general condition of matters in those localities. You need not confine your visit to the States of Louisiana and Mississippi, and may extend your trip to other States, Alabama, &c.—

That means all States—

if you see proper; nor need you confine your visit, in the States of Louisiana and Mississippi, to the places named. What the President desires is to ascertain the true condition of affairs, and to receive such suggestions from you as you may deem advisable and judicious.

So much for that. The concluding part of the letter of the Secretary of War is in the following language:

Of course you can take with you such gentlemen of your staff as you wish, and it is best that the trip should appear to be one as much of pleasure as of business, for the fact of your mere presence in the localities referred to will have, it is presumed, a beneficial effect.

Yes, it is to be a trip of pleasure, of leisure, to look at the condition of the country with a retinue of officers, with the glittering sword and regalia that pertain to the military! They are to display themselves through the country and let the people, the sovereigns, the working, producing people of the country, see in what gigantic style and magnificent splendor the representatives of General Grant appear in that region of country! It is to be a trip of pleasure and display, and he thinks it would have a beneficial effect! The Secretary further says:

The President thinks, and so do I, that a trip South might be agreeable to you, and that you might be able to obtain a good deal of information on the subject about which we desire to learn.

It might be agreeable to him, with a staff of officers, to visit the country, to display himself before the people and get such information as he wants, and I suppose manufacture public opinion if he could, and report to the President! He thinks it would have a beneficial influence upon that region of the county to see General Sheridan, the representative of the President of the United States, displaying himself all through those States!

What is still more remarkable, if I can turn to it, is a telegram dated New Orleans, January 4. I know we have had some special pleading in the case. The disturbance and interruption of the Legislature took place on that day, and they make a special plea that the general did not take command until about five hours afterward. But he comes forward and takes the responsibility, he is there all the time, although this was done before he nominally took command. He shows great willingness to take the responsibility while it would have exonerated these men from any liability:

[General Order No. 1.—9 p. m.]

Under instructions from the President of the United States, communicated through the Adjutant-General of the Army, the undersigned hereby assumes control of the Department of the Gulf, consisting of the States of Louisiana and Mississippi and the Gulf posts as far eastward as and embracing Fort Jefferson and Key West, Florida, including the forts in Mobile Bay, which will hereafter constitute one of the departments of the Military Division of the Missouri.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General United States Army.

Here a general of the Army is sent back to a people, who had repudiated him, with authority to go and look over the country and to mark him out an empire, prescribing the limits of his government, what he should take under control; and there it is at his discretion. He marks the area, he describes the bounds or limits, and in it his power is as absolute as that of an emperer!

In all this proceeding does any one see anything of the General of the Army, who is by law at the head of the forces of the United States? Where is General Sherman all this time? Perhaps he may not be entirely in accord with this proceeding. General Sheridan is placed in direct communication with the President of the United States and the Secretary of War, and he is authorized to go South among those States, lay off his bounds, prescribe his district, and take command. Where is this authority derived from? From the President of the United States. It is true he is made Commander-in-Chief of the Army; but has he a right to exercise the power to lay off and define districts for another at his discretion? Was there ever such an assumption? Why could he not lay the whole South off in one military district and take charge of it himself?

Look at the growth of power; look at its advance; look at the usurpation; and when we come to bring ourselves to consider it calmly and deliberately, without party bias and prejudice, it can be viewed as no other than an act of usurpation and an act of tyranny. Where does this power come from? And I might ask, where would it go? Referring to the other end of the avenue as President, not as an individual, I might ask the question:

Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed,
That he is grown so great—that he can prescribe and lay down empires and place commanders over them? It is time that the country should be awakened to and consider these things. If excitement has been so high in times gone by that many things have been overlooked, I think the time has arrived and I trust the excitement has gone down, so that the American people—a term not repeated much here latterly; the people used to constitute an important part of this Government, but now they have almost ceased to be any part of it—it is time that the people had begun to consider and weigh well these things.

I have shown you that in reference to this Kellogg government General Grant said it was "a gigantic fraud" and that neither Kellogg nor his opponent was entitled to the office, but having found a usurper in, he takes him by the hand and sustains him. Well, to come to the sitting of this recent Legislature, there seems to be an impression that the democrats on the one hand asked for the protection and interference of the military and then the republicans on the other. It seemed to be wholly a matter of party, not a matter of principle; first the democrats through this man Wiltz—I believe that is his name—asked the military to interfere and sustain him; and on the other hand when a protest was sent in by fifty-two men, I think, the military were called upon, and what did the military do? As General Sheridan says himself, Mr. Kellogg, the governor of the State, or rather the usurper, the pretender, a man who had assumed the government without authority and been sustained in violation of law, tells the military of the United States "put this man out, and put that man in," and the Legislature is organized upon the military. At the point of the bayonet and with the sword presented, through pretense of keeping peace, a Legislature is qualified and assumes legislative authority. That is a new way of qualifying members of a Legislature and contrary to the genius and theory of our Government. Have we gone back to Cromwellian times when Colonel Pride rode into Parliament booted and spurred? Here in the Legislature of Louisiana stand the military with drawn sword and fixed bayonets, and a Legislature is qualified accordingly and go into power. May we not well inquire—

Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed?

How has it come that all these things are being transacted in this country? We see in every step that we progress in the investigation of this case that it gets worse and worse, a state of things that ought not to be tolerated and ought not to be sanctioned. Is there any reason to believe, as is suggested in one of the reports, that there was danger of bloodshed? Was that a reason for the Army interfering as peace-makers? The mere contending members of the Legislature would not have shed much blood. In the case of Tennessee, where the military were forbidden to interfere, the Legislature got together and went on harmoniously and transacted their business and passed their laws. So in this case. If there was likely to be a riot or a disturbance of the peace, what should have been done? There was no application to the President of the United States for force as in case of insurrection or riot; and the furthest they ought to have gone was to preserve the peace and leave the contending parties of the Legislature and the contestants for office to settle their rights in the proper forum. There would have been no bloodshed; they would have managed to settle it; they would have gotten out of the difficulty without the shedding of blood. All this is thrown in simply to justify the arbitrary action which has been practiced by the military in Louisiana.

So far, then, as Louisiana is concerned, for the reasons I have given I cannot record my vote for the resolution. I do not vote against the resolution because it is a republican measure; I vote against the resolution because it is wrong in principle and calls upon the Senate to express an opinion favoring practices and usurpations by the Executive of the United States that I think unauthorized and unwarranted. If it stopped here I could not record my vote for it; but if we should record our votes sanctioning presidential interference in this case, what ought we to do in another? Why single out this particular act and in principle sanction this particular act and commit the Senate in opinion to all the high-handed kindred measures that have preceded it? There is another case of this kind which is familiar, and yet I beg the indulgence of the Senate while I refer to it for a few moments. History records that General Grant issued a proclamation to the people of Arkansas on the 15th day of May, 1874, in which he said:

Whereas said Elisha Baxter, under section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States and the laws passed in pursuance thereof, has heretofore made application to me to protect said State and the citizens thereof against domestic violence; and whereas the General Assembly of said State, convened in extra session at the capitol thereof on the 11th instant, pursuant to a call made by said Elisha Baxter, and both houses thereof have passed a joint resolution also applying to me to protect the State against domestic violence; * * * and whereas it is required that whenever it may be necessary, in the judgment of the President, to use the military force for the purpose aforesaid, he shall forthwith, by proclamation, command such insurgents to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective houses within a limited time:

Now, therefore, I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, do hereby make proclamation and command all turbulent and disorderly persons to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes within ten days from this date, and hereafter to submit themselves to the lawful authority of said executive and the other constituted authorities of said State; and I invoke the aid and co-operation of all good citizens to uphold law and preserve public peace.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done in the city of Washington this 15th day of May, in the year of our Lord 1874, and of the Independence of the United States of America the ninety-eighth.

We find then that the Legislature elected with Elisha Baxter and Baxter as governor were maintained and recognized by executive proclamation as the true government, the one in authority under proper circumstances in Arkansas; and yet not more than nine months afterward a message was sent in to this body which is in the language I will read. Remember here was a government recognized, here was a government maintained in existence, and all evil-disposed persons, all riotous or insurrectionary people were warned to go to their homes within ten days and stay there, and then this message comes in:

To the Senate of the United States:

Herewith I have the honor to send, in accordance with the resolution of the Senate of the 3d instant, all the information in my possession, not heretofore furnished, relating to affairs in the State of Arkansas.

I will venture to express the opinion that all the testimony shows that in the election of 1872—

Mark you, prior to the issuance of the proclamation—

Joseph Brooks was lawfully elected governor of that State; that he has been unlawfully deprived of the possession of his office since that time; that in 1874 the constitution of the State was, by violence, intimidation, and revolutionary proceedings, overthrown and a new constitution adopted and a new State government established.

These proceedings, if permitted to stand, practically ignore all rights of minorities in all the States; also, what is there to prevent each of the States recently readmitted to Federal relations on certain conditions changing their constitution and violating their pledges, if this action in Arkansas is acquiesced in?

What does that mean, Mr. President? If one government is recognized in a presidential proclamation as being the genuine, true government, the lawful authority of the State, can it afterward be overthrown by a simple recommendation of the President of the United States? What does all this mean—

These proceedings if permitted—

What proceedings, if permitted? If this government of Arkansas stands, all the States that have been reconstructed will change their form of government! This is assuming that the constitutions of all the States readmitted under the reconstruction acts are to stand unchanged, immovable, unalterable through all time unless by the consent of the Federal Government. Has not any one of these States now in the Union, notwithstanding as he says they were readmitted under the reconstruction acts, power and authority to alter, change, and amend its constitution in such manner as its people may prescribe? Here is a blow struck at one of the fundamental principles of free government directly. It is denying that certain States in this Union are upon an equal footing with the other States, warning the country "if you sanction this government in Arkansas that I have sanctioned heretofore, but now for some reason"—best known I presume to himself—"I send you in a message to overturn and overthrow, other States may change their constitutions without the consent or permission of the Federal Government! What a doctrine! Go to the Constitution of the United States; go to the bill of rights of all the States. It is laid down in the bill of rights of each State of this Union and in the Constitution of the United States that the people have a right to change, alter, or abolish their form of government in their own mode and in their own manner within certain limits. That is of the very essence of a republican form of government. I should like to know what authority you have to interfere with the States in exercising that indefeasible authority? But we find lurking through almost every document, through every order we receive, this assertion of usurping power, denying the great principle of a free government which is inherent in the people. But let me finish the reading of this message; the last paragraph is:

I respectfully submit whether a precedent so dangerous to the stability of State government, if not of the National Government also, should be recognized by Congress.

I earnestly ask that Congress will take definite action in this matter to relieve the Executive from acting upon questions which should be decided by the legislative branch of the Government.

U. S. GRANT.

A threat! The iron hand, though clothed in softest silk, is in that paragraph. "If you do not do so and so," the inference is "I will." Would it not be well to have a resolution under consideration inquiring into the matter of the proposed exercise of such a power as this? Is it not more appropriate than the one now under consideration which is for indorsement.

I earnestly ask that Congress will take definite action in this matter to relieve the Executive from acting upon questions which should be decided by the legislative branch of the Government.

"If you don't, I will." Thus we see how power travels. An empire is laid off in the South for one military chieftain; a force bill is proposed in the House of Representatives; the indorsement of Congress is asked to what has been done; and is there nothing that lies behind all this? The change of position from May 15, 1874, to February 3, 1875, must be for some good reason. Can it be possible that the Executive had forgotten what he had done? It would be impugning his memory or his intelligence to suppose he did not discover the inconsistency between the two papers. There must be some great reason that underlies all this.

With your force bill, with the authority to take away the State government of Arkansas, with the government of Louisiana usurped, with a military empire laid off, it seems as if a pretty good part of the Union had been usurped and put under the control of a dictator, and that the States North and West had better begin to look into this. It suits the purpose now to take charge of certain Southern States for the approaching presidential election. "When we get them firmly in our grip, when we have once fixed upon their necks the mailed heel of power," do you think the usurper will stop his hand? No; he will go on conquering, he will go on extending his military power until he has accomplished his purpose, and then perchance the time may come when somebody in this Hall may introduce a resolution:

Whereas great disturbance and dissatisfaction exist; for the purpose of preserving peace and harmony: Therefore,
Be it resolved, That A or B is hereby declared President—

I do not care whether you call him President or monarch or king—for the next presidential term or "the next eight years."

What would you do? Where is the Army? Where is the Navy? Who is commander-in-chief? Who has a portion of the confederacy under his heel, the mailed heel of power, with a powerful party in the other States? What would you do? Do not all know the impotency, the weakness of an unarmed people when brought in contact with an army? The people would be powerless. Here in my place, not in a personal sense but a public one, as one of the Senators of the United States, I to-day warn this people against the approaching danger. I tell my countrymen that empire is ahead. Instead of having a free and republican government now, we have the kind of government that I will call their attention to. I hold in my hand a volume that treats upon the various kinds of government, defines them, and gives a proper definition. After laying down the three principal forms of government, monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy, then among the various enumerations the writer says that governments out of these three can be divided to infinity into mixed governments of various kinds, and one form is:

Stratocracy is a military government. This word is derived from two Greek words which signify "army" and "power."

We have got now "army" and "power." We have got a stratocracy; we have not got a democracy, and we have not got a republican form of government. How far off is empire? How far off is military despotism? I warn the people of my native country and of my native State of the danger ahead. On a former occasion, when there was great difference of opinion among us, I warned my countrymen against the dangers that were coming. I warned them against bringing on a strife and a contest that would result in the shedding of blood and the sacrifice of property. I warned them against that struggle which set man against man and put his hand against the throat of a brother. Yes, the land that gave brothers birth was drenched with the blood of brothers. I warned my countrymen against the catastrophe that has passed and gone. The great misfortune of my life, the deep feeling of my heart is that it turned out to be true. I wish I proved a false prophet. Now to-day in my place I warn the people of the United States against encroachments upon, against violations of, and against the total disregard of the Constitution of the United States. Do not let us talk about party; let us talk a little about country, for party on the one side or the other has run this Government well-nigh to destruction. Parties have been running the Government long enough. Let the people now lay hold of parties and run them. Let us save the country. What is the great cry now? It is "save the party," and so that the party is saved all is well, the country may go. Sir, let us try to save the country and save it in the original form of its Government as handed down to us by the founders of the Republic. I warn my country to-day against these encroachments that are being made on the Constitution of their fathers. If there is not a return made to those great principles, those great truths which are recognized in the Constitution, I tell you this Government is overthrown and its character changed.

Let us forget, then, that we have been divided into parties; let us teach the people not opposition to the Government, as has been the case sometimes. Great clamor was once made against the Government, and it was said the Government is this, or that, or the other. O, let us make the proper distinction; the Government is good enough; the organic law is all right; speaking in general terms, and administered according to its designs, it would produce happiness and prosperity to the people and result in making us the greatest Government in the world. We should make the distinction between the Government and the administrators of the Government. Let us bring the hearts of the people up to love the Government, while they oppose a cruel, a corrupt, a perfidious, a treacherous Administration that tries to overturn and overthrow the Government, and have a common effort made to sustain the Government and eject from power its corrupt and usurping rulers.

I know that I have almost always acted with one party, and I have acted on certain principles laid down for my guide, and I expect to pursue and follow them, carry me where they may, for in the pursuit of a correct principle we can never reach a wrong conclusion. The Constitution is my guide, and I intend to follow it. When it is encroached upon according to my judgment, with all the ability that I may have I will resist the encroachment and call the attention of the country to it as well as I can.

So much then for the Louisiana portion of this question and the Arkansas portion. Now the government of Arkansas is going on, but Congress was called upon to interfere with it. Then if we could have the force bill passed all would be lovely! But there seems to have been some little doubt about it. Sheridan says the people are all banditti, and if he had a military commission the President need not disturb himself any further, for he could manage all the rest! We see the power that is asked for; we see the desire to exercise unauthorized powers. We see in every movement, in every phase, a desire to get from under the control of the people, to get from under the Constitution, which is nothing more nor less than the combined and expressed will of the people in the form of an organic law; and before it should be violated, even if it needed amendment, we should be patient and amend it in the mode and manner designated in the instrument as framed by Washington and his compatriots.

We are referred to that provision of the Constitution which says that the United States shall guarantee to each State of the Union a republican form of government. We see as we travel along in the discussion of this subject—and from our general reading of it we cannot but see, though partisan zeal and partisan interests may carry some so far as to assail it—that these encroachments are being made; and the query comes up, What is a republican form of government within the principles embraced in that provision of the Constitution which says the United States shall guarantee to each State a republican form of government? I know there has been much said about the sovereignty and rights of the States; but I know what the Constitution says. It declares that the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution are reserved to the people or to the States respectively. Ours is a mixed Government. I shall not discuss that question of sovereignty. It is one about which there has been much division of sentiment and about which there has been some controversy. I do not discuss that now; but I shall pass to the point where I think sovereignty resides. When we go into our theory of government and examine it, we find that all powers are derived from the people. The people wear the crown. They are the source of power, and they are sovereign. The State governments derive all their power from the people; the Federal Government derives all its power either through the States from the people or from the people directly; I shall not discuss that; but the source of power and sovereignty resides in the people, and they under our system of government can change their form of government in the mode and manner appointed by the State constitution and the mode and manner pointed out by the Constitution of the United States. This is the sovereignty that I contend for. I only fear that by usurpations, by arbitrary assumptions, by gross encroachments on the organic law, this may all be changed. As we see things going on, a power seems to have sprung up in the General Government to turn a State upside down or downside up, to turn a State outside in or inside out. A process of this kind after a while will change the whole character of the Government. But still let us hold our moorings and go back to the people, who are the source of all power; and before we attempt to exercise dangerous and doubtful powers either in a State or in the Federal Government let us go back to the source of all powers and have this question settled without violation of liberty or encroachments on their rights.

The time has arrived when it is as important to discuss the fundamental principles of this Government as it was when the Constitution of the United States was adopted in 1787. We have read the writings of Madison, Jay, and Hamilton, and many others who wrote upon the Constitution; we know the debates that sprang up in the convention in reference to the Government that should be formed. What was all this for? The design was to get the character, the principles, the frame of government in the public mind, so that we could have a standard by which we could measure what power should be exercised, and so that the representative, in whatever capacity he might be, should find there his standard and his guide and should conform his action to it. I would, for one, make the Constitution of the country as inflexible as the procrustean bedstead, so that it should be the standard of the agent acting under the Constitution when he came into power, and if he was too short for it, you should stretch him out until he fitted it; and if he was too long, you should simply reduce him to the dimensions of the standard and cut him off. When you have a standard in the public mind by which powers are to be measured the people have some security against abuse, they have some security against infringement, they have some security against violation of their organic law.

We have been in a civil war; the public mind has been agitated; the Constitution has been violated so frequently, torn in pieces and trampled under foot and totally disregarded so often, that the public mind at this day scarcely has any firm mooring to which it can anchor. All seem to inquire what the Congress does, not whether it has done according to the Constitution, not whether it has transcended the limits of its power—no, but "Congress does so and so," or "the Legislature does so and so;" and when that comes to be the case our Government is gone. Give us the Constitution. Give me the Constitution of my country unimpaired, and make no change or alteration in it, except in the mode and manner pointed out by it. Give me back the Constitution of my country that you have taken away. Do not give me arbitrary power; do not give me usurpation; but give me back the Constitution that was made and handed down to me and you and the nation by our fathers. Give that back to us, and that is the great struggle of the age. If the country is not carried back within the pale of the Constitution, it is gone. Then as patriots, as men who love our country, who love constitutional government, who love a government of law, let us unite as a band of brothers to make one more effort in this period to restore the Constitution of the United States.

I dislike to be too tedious, but upon this subject of government I wish to read from a legal authority. I have shown the kind of government we have according to the best definition that I can find. The government that we have now in practical operation is a stratocracy.

A stratocracy is a military government. This word is derived from two Greek words, signifying "army" and "power."

The country understands it. That is the meaning of the government we have now, for what have we but "army" and "power." As far as in me lies I want to inculcate some of the first notions of our Government. I have no idea that I can inform or enlighten those who sit around me here; but there are others who are equally interested with them. Let me read from accepted legal authority:

Government is the manner in which sovereignty is exercised in the state. It is the means adopted to put the fundamental law of the state in action. It is the function and the very end of the government to apply the fundamental law for the happiness and advantage of all the citizens; for the constitution of the state is the lawful expression of the wants and of the will of all. Hence follows this necessary consequence, that the government is the delegate of society, the state, or the nation. The people, being sovereign, may adopt any of the forms of government which have been devised among men.

There have been at all times, and there are now, different forms of government, the three principal of which are democracy, aristocracy, and monarchy. But these different forms are combined and subdivided to infinity. From the African prince, who disposes freely of the lives and properties of his subjects, to the European monarch, whose power is contained within much narrower bounds; from the savage cazic, who governs his tribe because he is the oldest man in it, to the republican magistrate who is elected by the free suffrage of his fellow-citizens, we perceive an infinity of organic combinations.

When the sovereign power is exercised by the people in a body, or by a majority of the people, the government is called a democracy. In this form of government all men are equal in a political and civil point of view. Democracy is the complete triumph of the principle of equality. All the citizens must have an equality of rights and not merely of privileges.

When the sovereign power is exercised by a small number of persons, in their own right, exclusively from the rest of the people, this form of government is called an aristocracy. In an aristocratic country the rulers claim the power to govern in their own right, and not by delegation, as in a representative democracy. Aristocracy and slavery spring from the same root. The first is the parent of the second, for the master and slave appeared on the same day.

When the sovereign power is concentrated in the hands of a single magistrate, the government is a monarchy, whether it bear the name of an empire, a kingdom, a duchy, or any other.

But the sovereign power may be divided and combined in a thousand different ways; hence result mixed governments, such as are most of those of civilized nations. Indeed, it may with truth be observed that the constitution of each state, consisting in the manner in which the powers of sovereignty are divided, seldom remains the same for any great length of time. Its form varies more frequently than it would strike one at first blush, in consequence of the encroachments which are insensibly made by one branch of the government over the others.

Is not that our condition? Look at the encroachments that are being made. True, they are sensible encroachments. Here the writer says that these governments are constantly changed, sometimes by encroachments almost imperceptible. Here they are patent, here they are palpable, here they are gross encroachments that are being made on the Constitution every day!

A representative democracy is a government where the powers of sovereignty are delegated to a body of men, elected from time to time, who exercise them for the benefit of the whole nation. Such is the General Government of the United States and of the several States of the American Union.

I think that is a very good definition.

A representative democracy is a government where the powers of sovereignty are delegated to a body of men, elected from time to time, who exercise them for the benefit of the whole nation. Such is the General Government of the United States, and of the several States of the American Union.

Despotism is the state where the powers of the government are not divided, but united in the hands of a single man, whatever may be the title he bears, emperor, king, sultan, president, &c.

A president can exercise despotic powers as well as anybody else, and this is the definition of a despotism: "Emperor, king, sultan, president," &c. We have mighty near got that on us here. The President is exercising all the powers of a king in a military point of view, turning it into a military government, a government of "army" and "power."

A commonwealth is that form of government in which the administration of public affairs is open or common to all persons, without any special regard to rank or property, as distinguished from monarchy or aristocracy.

A republic, which is another name for commonwealth, is that form of government in which the administration of affairs is open to all the citizens. In another sense the term republic, respublica, signifies the state independently of its form of government.

In our Constitution we find that—

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government.

There is the great idea of a republican form of government laid down—a commonwealth, a republic, a representative democracy. In fact these may be almost considered synonymous terms, for in substance they are the same—a commonwealth, a republic. These are the kinds of government that were in the minds of the framers of the Constitution when it was adopted. "Commonwealth." Where are we going, Mr. President? Is Louisiana a commonwealth as it now stands? Or is her government maintained by military power and that through the President of the United States? Is it not his government? Is it not military? What does he do in regard to Arkansas? Send a message to Congress with a threat, "If you do not do something, I will." It is not his place to interfere with either of the contending parties. If democrats apply for the exercise of improper power, he has no more right to extend it to them than to anybody else, and if republicans apply it is equally his bounden duty to abstain from any interference whatever. These States are commonwealths, they are republican governments, they are representative democracies. The whole Union being composed of the States makes it a representative government in one sense, representing the States and the States the people.

Now, sir, instead of passing the resolution which is before the Senate, how many other subjects, if we are disposed to take up questions that are as legitimate as this is, that are as germane to constitutional action as this can be—how many subjects are there that the time and the attention of the Senate might be occupied with? Would we go into all of them and keep the Senate here as a kind of town meeting to express opinions in reference to all the various questions that we think may agitate or please for the time being? Why the desire to have the committal of the Senate to an approval of this proposition? Why are we to do it? Instead of passing this resolution, I would go to the emperor of the empire, and if I were permitted to prepare a resolution that would be adopted I would incorporate into it the substance of Cato's reply in his last extremity when Decius, the embassador of Cæsar, approached him and wanted him to capitulate, assuring him that his name would be second to none except that of Cæsar; I would say to this emperor, I would say to this dictator what Cato said to the embassador of Cæsar:

Bid him disband his legions, restore the commonwealth to liberty.

Yes, I would say more; let him do this, and even I, humble as I am, and much as I am opposed to his encroachments, would be willing to go still further in the language of Cato in his reply to Cæsar; I would not only "bid him disband his legions, restore the commonwealth to liberty, submit his actions to the public censure, and stand the judgment of a Roman senate," but let him do this and "myself will mount the rostrum and strive to gain his pardon from the people" for the violations of the Constitution of his country and the transcendent impositions that he has practiced on the country. Yes, even I, humble as I am, for the sake of peace, for the sake of concord, for the restoration of prosperity and harmony among this people, would be willing to see him subjected to a pardon by my country and restored to favor, and I would mount the rostrum and strive to gain his pardon from an insulted and an indignant people. Yes, restore the Commonwealth to peace, prosperity, and happiness; restore this Government to what it was originally designed to be; restore this Government in fact and in practice to what it is in theory, the home of the immigrant, the asylum of the oppressed—do this, and it will become again the home of the immigrant and the asylum of the exile, where there is a home and bread for all. God preserve it and let it be saved! I would rather see this Capitol tumbled in ruins; I would rather see these pillars falling against each other; I would rather see it all wiped out of existence than to see the Constitution of my country destroyed. Save the Constitution, and in saving the Constitution you save the country, and in saving the country you restore it to peace, prosperity, and happiness.

What does the flag on the Dome of this Capitol to-day that flies in the breeze indicate? There is the image of the goddess of Liberty. On that flag are the stars of the United States. Is what is read in the character of that emblem true, or is it a false goddess? Is it a flag that is hung out merely to allure when the whole character of the Government is changed? Save the Constitution, bring the Government back to it, or the time will come—God forbid it, but I fear it will come—when the goddess of Liberty will be driven from this land staggering over fields of blood and carnage to witness the loss of a representative government. O, then, do not let us stop to consider about party; "the country, the whole country, and nothing but the country" should be our motto. Let us do this. In the language of Webster, let this Union be preserved, "now and forever, one and inseparable." Let us stand equals in the Union, all upon an equality. Let peace and prosperity be restored to the land. May God bless this people; may God save the Constitution; and I know when I give utterance to this sentiment it comes from a heart that never yet beat false to the Constitution or to the country.

Mr. President, let us come up to this work forgetting what we have been heretofore. Let us lay aside our party feelings; let us lay aside our personalities, and come up to the Constitution of our country and lay it upon an altar and all stand around resolved that the Constitution shall be preserved.

I thank the President and the Senate for their kind indulgence and attention.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I beg the attention of the Senate for a few moments so that I may explain the reasons which will guide my vote on the important subject now before the Senate. I fully realize the embarrassed position in which I am placed in speaking immediately after the distinguished and able Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON.] I am very well aware that the large crowd now occupying the galleries did not come here to listen to me. I am very well aware that had they known that I was to address the Senate in all probability very few of them would have been here; but it is a duty that I have to perform. The majority of the Senate have presented to the consideration of this body a resolution, and, nolens volens, we are called upon to vote for or against that resolution. I owe it to myself as one of the Senators on this floor, and as representing in part one of the large States of this Union, to give to the Senate and to the country the reasons which compel me to record my vote against this, in my estimation, most important proposition. In my estimation, at no time heretofore in the whole history of this Government has a proposition been presented to this body pregnant not only with so much importance but pregnant with so much mischief as the resolution now before us.

I am opposed to its adoption for two reasons. First, I hold that it is not properly before this body. I hold that the Senate now has no legislative power whatsoever; that we are called here by the proclamation of the President to discharge what are called executive duties, and those duties alone; that if we have any power upon the subject at all, it is as a part of a Congress composed of both Houses and not as a Senate sitting in executive session.

For this reason, if I had no other, I could not vote for this resolution. I hold it is not competent for the Senate to do anything at all of a character which is in the slightest tendency of a legislative nature. But a few days ago the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLAYTON] introduced a resolution here authorizing a committee to sit during the recess for the purpose of visiting the Indian country and obtaining information which would lead of course to legislation in the future. That resolution was laid upon the table, many members voting to lay it on the table because it was thought to be beyond the jurisdiction of the Senate sitting as an executive body.

If we have any jurisdiction on this subject whatever, it is derived from the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution, which imposes upon the United States the duty of guaranteeing to every State in the Union a republican form of government; a duty imposed upon "the United States," not upon the Executive, not upon the Senate, not upon the lower House, but a duty imposed upon "the United States" as a whole. That duty therefore can only be discharged by the speaking organ of the United States, which is the legislative department, not the Executive, not the Senate. For this reason, I repeat, if for no other, I could not vote for this resolution, which might be a precedent for action hereafter.

But, sir, I have reasons beyond the mere question of jurisdiction. I hold that if this resolution be adopted by the Senate sitting now in executive session and be ultimately ratified by the people in their elections, this Government has thereby undergone an entire and fundamental change; that from being a representative republican government we shall have gone into an imperial government; that from being a representative government speaking through the legislative department, the Executive of the nation will have control of the elections of the States and in that way have the power to have just such a Congress as he may deem proper to have.

For two years the question of Louisiana has been before this body. It has been discussed with an ability on both sides, I think I may well say, that has never been surpassed in the history of the Senate from the very beginning of the Government. For two years has this Louisiana question in all its phases been before this body, and the best minds, the ablest men, on both sides of this Chamber have time and again expressed their opinions and their views on this important subject. Yet at no time heretofore has the question been presented in the shape that it is presented now. The whole is boiled down to one simple proposition, not whether the government of Louisiana has been wrongful or rightful heretofore, not whether General Sheridan may or may not have discharged his duty as an officer of the Government, not whether Durell was right or wrong in his decision, not whether all the ten thousand different transactions which have occurred in that country have been right or wrong, but we are called upon to say that the interference of the Executive in that State is sanctioned by the Senate of the United States. We are called upon to sustain him regardless of the fact whether he had the right or not under the Constitution to interfere as he did.

The history of these resolutions, for there are three, is remarkably singular. The first resolution introduced upon this subject was by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] It was a bold, a manly, well-written, expressive resolution, partaking largely of the known characteristics of that Senator—bold, plain, decided, unmistakable. The Senator from Indiana introduced the following resolution on the 5th of March:

Resolved by the Senate, That the State government now existing in Louisiana, and represented by William P. Kellogg as governor, is the lawful government of said State; that it is republican in form; and that every assistance necessary to sustain its proper and lawful authority in said State should be given by the United States, when properly called upon for that purpose, to the end that the laws may be faithfully and promptly executed, life and property protected and defended, and all violators of law, State or national, brought to speedy punishment for their crimes.

This I say was a bold, plain, direct proposition, recognizing the action of the President, recognizing the government of Kellogg as the lawful government of that State, recognizing it as being republican in form: and it was plain and expressive. This resolution went I presume from this Chamber to what is commonly known as a caucus. Of course I am not prepared to say exactly what transpired in that caucus as I was not invited to attend it, and therefore do not exactly and precisely know what took place within that body; but report says that this bold proposition, manly in character, like the Senator who made it and who I commend, partaking of his own rugged, strong, and manly disposition, and partaking of the region of country whence he comes, the great West, with no prevarication, with no wincing at all—that, report says, went to a caucus and no doubt, as report says, it was discussed, sustained unquestionably by the Senator from Indiana with his known ability; but it was too bold, too plain, too decided, and the consequence was that another Senator was made to father another proposition, milder in form, subdued in words, but yet containing to a very large extent the same proposition though not so boldly expressed. On the 16th of March the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate approve the action heretofore taken by the President of the United States in protecting Louisiana from domestic violence, and are of opinion that he should continue to recognize in that State the existing State government.

This resolution is much milder in words and means less than the resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana. That, report says, was also discussed in this caucus, and there it was, like the former resolution, strangled, there it was killed, and another bantam, fathered by my friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] was brought before this body and is now the resolution that we have to vote upon. It is in these words:

Resolved, That the action of the President in protecting the government in Louisiana, of which William P. Kellogg is the executive, and the people of that State against domestic violence, and in enforcing the laws of the United States in that State, is approved.

This is milder than the second, and the second was milder than the first; but all these resolutions mean one thing—they mean no more and no less—that it was, and that it is, competent for the Executive of the nation, for the President of the United States, to interfere in the domestic affairs of a State beyond the requirements of the Constitution. That it is competent for the Executive when called upon in a proper manner to interfere in the domestic affairs of a State there can be no doubt, because the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution says:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence.

This is a duty imposed upon Congress and not upon the Executive. Nevertheless as I am anxious to argue the question fairly as a great constitutional question, I admit that an emergency might arise in some of the States of the Union when Congress was not in session, when Congress could not be convened speedily, for the Executive of the nation to maintain temporary peace in a State to prevent the State from being destroyed by anarchy and violence. It might be so, although the Constitution does not in words confer such a power on the Executive. It is a power conferred on "the United States;" and yet a case might possibly arise where the Executive of the nation under a full sense of his great obligation to the country might feel called upon to interfere temporarily with a view of preventing a State from being to some extent destroyed. Yet that would be beyond the words of the Constitution and could only be done in an emergency which required speedy action.

But this was not the case at any time in Louisiana. The interference of the Executive through the Departments of the Government, through the Attorney-General and other officers of the Government, has been from the beginning in anticipation, in their estimation, of domestic violence and of domestic trouble. It has been on their part purely a voluntary, uncalled-for interference, and the object of this resolution is to sanction that interference.

The democratic Senators on this floor have time and again disapproved of the conduct of the Executive, of the conduct of Judge Durell, of the conduct of the military, of the conduct of the Lynch board, of the conduct of all the persons in the employ of that government in Louisiana, and upon that we are committed and estopped, and at no time has the attempt been made to sustain the Executive in his interference. At no time heretofore has the proposition been made to the Senate that the Executive should be sustained in that interference. Why is it proposed at this day? What is the object and what will be the effect before the country? At the beginning of this Louisiana discussion—I think some time in January—I took occasion to say in a speech that I had the honor of making before this body that if it were competent for the President of the United States to control the Army at his will and pleasure and to concentrate the Army in this place or that place without any restraint of law, merely in virtue of the oath which he has taken to support the Constitution of the United States, this Government had ceased to be a republican government and was nothing more nor less than a military despotism. What I said then I believed honestly, and I believe it now. In my opinion, if the conduct of the Executive is sanctioned by this Senate and shall be sanctioned by the people in the election that is to come two years hence, this Government has ceased to be republican and is nothing more nor less than a military despotism. For if it be proper, if it be competent, for the Executive of this nation to concentrate in any State the military force of this Government to interfere in the organization of its Legislature, to interfere in elections, to control the State machinery in any shape or in any way, the whole system of the Government is destroyed, and he becomes in point of fact a great military despot, having all power in his hands, and this Senate and the lower House will sink to nothing; Senators will be elected by Legislatures created by the President, members of Congress will be elected by constituencies influenced by the action of the President, and in that way this great conservative body will be destroyed and Senators will be sent here merely to register the edicts of the Executive, no matter what those edicts may be.

Viewing the question in this light, looking upon this as a great step toward individual government, I am compelled not only to vote against the resolution but to do all in my power to prevent its passage; and as the passage of it in my estimation is a foregone conclusion, all that I can do as a humble Senator on this floor is to awaken the people, to draw the attention of the people of the country to the great danger which now threatens them.

Mr. President, history is so full of warning on the subject that it requires some courage to refer to that which must be and no doubt is so well known to every Senator on this floor, but nevertheless it will do no harm to go back and to see and to state and to point out how faithfully we are traveling the same broad road which other nations have traveled heretofore. Cæsarism, a modern word, has become very common to express individual power. It does express it very well, because it is perfectly historical. Individual power in modern times is called Cæsarism. What is meant by Cæsarism? By it is meant power in the hands of one man, and it had its origin two thousand years ago. Cæsar himself attempted to establish Cæsarism. The "great Julius" himself attempted it, and if any man on the face of the earth was worthy of being a Cæsar certainly he was, for he was an ornament of our race, remarkable in everything which can distinguish human nature. In peace and in war, in the arts and the sciences, in eloquence and literature, he had not his peer at that day, has never had his superior from that day to this. He attempted to establish Cæsarism in Rome. He met with opposition and lost his life in the attempt. The dagger of Brutus stopped him in his career; but Cæsarism was born with him. The first attempt made by him, although he individually failed, went on growing, growing from one thing to another, until a line of Cæsars reigned on the throne of Rome for many, many generations. It was a growth. Look back at the history of Augustus. He did not want to be a Cæsar at the beginning. He professed to be a lover of liberty, a lover of the people, accepted the consulship with great diffidence, and at one time resigned it because he thought it better that the office should go back to the people that they might elect another person, designing all the time not only to maintain his consulship but to obtain augmented powers, which he did. It went on from one encroachment to another, from one concession of power from the great senate of Rome to him, until he became the absolute individual dictator of Rome and of the whole civilized world.

So it was in England. Cromwell first swayed the destinies of England only because he was the great military hero of that terrible revolution. With that title, merely as the commander of the army of England, he soon became protector by law. He was anxious to become the Cæsar of his country, to become king, and gradually, and rapidly too, powers were added to him from day to day, and had he lived he would have been crowned King of England.

But the most remarkable growth of Cæsarism perhaps was that in France under the first consulate. Three consuls were elected in France. Neither of them was elected to be first consul. Bonaparte was one, Sieyès, the great constitution-maker of that day, the great Sieyès in the work of making constitutions in that period, was another, and there was a third whose name at this moment does not occur to me. They were elected to be the consuls of France, and as consuls they met to decide what department should be devolved on each one. At the very first meeting Sieyès expected to be chosen the first consul on account of his age, on account of his admitted learning, on account of the fact that he had shown great ability in many legislative assemblies of France and in making constitutions for the whole of Europe; but at that very first meeting Bonaparte was selected. When they adjourned a friend of Sieyès met him as he came out of the room and asked him who was the first consul. "Why," said he, "General Bonaparte is the first consul." "Who is the second?" "Bonaparte." "Who is the third?" "Bonaparte." "Why," said Sieyès, "he knows all, he wants all, he dares all." "Well," said his friend, "what are you and your colleagues?" "Nous sommes des imbéciles;" in other words, "we are fools." Cæsarism was established. Yet that was a temporary thing. Bonaparte was to be consul only for a very short period of time; but it grew, and in a short time afterward he was made consul for ten years, and in a short time after that he was made consul for life with the right of transmitting the office to his legal heir, and in a very short time it grew and he became the Cæsar of his country.

Mr. President, so it will be here in a very short time. Although it pains me to know that a resolution of this kind can be entertained by the Senate of the United States, yet it may be a fortunate thing that it comes at this period of the world. It may be, and I think is the fact, that the people of the United States are not yet prepared to sanction Cæsarism. I know the extent of the dry-rot—if I may use the expression—which pervades a large portion of the people of the United States. I know how they are overcome by the blandishments of power, by the allurements of office, by rewards of various kinds, high official positions, great offices having enormous emoluments. I know that the country is covered over with eighty thousand office-holders, who are all the aiders and abettors of a one-man government if they can maintain their positions. I know it; and this resolution will present to the mind of the people at the very next election this great question: "Are you prepared, citizens of the United States, to sanction the exercise of power by the President of this nation such as is contemplated here? Are you prepared to say that the President has a right to send troops to any State of the Union to influence the organization of its Legislature? Are you prepared to say that it is competent for the Executive of the nation, acting alone on his oath of office, to command and to order the highest officers of this Government to travel over this country to obtain information to be communicated to him individually, regardless of the organization of the Army, making it a mere individual military power? Are you prepared for this?"

Mr. SARGENT. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOGY. Certainly.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to ask the Senator if the same idea, the same argument, was not in the mind of Wilkes Booth when he flourished his bloody dagger on the stage at Ford's Theater and exclaimed "Sic semper tyrannis!"

Mr. BOGY. The question of my friend—for I will use that word—from California is altogether a very improper question. The word "impertinent" is not a word which should be used by a Senator. Therefore I cannot use that word, but his question is not pertinent.

Mr. SARGENT. If my friend will allow me a moment, I will say that I understand Booth's objection to the President there slain was that he was a tyrant. His words conveyed that allegation. I wish to know whether the Senator's argument does not go too far in the same direction; if it and his illustrations do not imply the right to remove the ruler who it is assumed tramples on the liberties of the country. That assumption is easily made, and, as it seems, acted upon. But shall each man judge for himself if the liberties of the country are trampled on, and apply the remedy by assassination? That is all I intended, and meant no offense.

Mr. BOGY. The question of the Senator from California is not pertinent; nevertheless I can give it a good answer. First, not having at all any sympathy with Booth on that occasion or at any time, I cannot exactly say what was in his mind. His was the act of an insane man. But this I can say, that the question of my friend from California suggests this idea: that all men in all ages of the world who have aimed at the destruction of the liberties of their country have first impressed upon the mind of the country that their person was in danger and therefore they had to be protected by guards to prevent their person from being assailed. Pisistratus, the tyrant of Athens, was surrounded by an army to prevent his life from being taken from him, and he conquered the liberties of Athens. His life was at no time in danger, but he used it as a mere excuse and became the tyrant of his country.

Sir, such arguments are part and parcel of the idea now dominating this land, that the Executive must be surrounded with extraordinary protection, and that he must be upheld in the exercise of power whether the power that he has exercised be within the limits of the Constitution or not. I say that the home of liberty is not in the executive department; it is in the legislative department; and it would be a great deal better for us to be protected in the discharge of our independent duties than to make any effort to protect the life of the President, without at the same time saying anything which can in any way be construed that I would encourage anything of the character to which the gentleman has alluded.

The tendency of the day is toward executive power. That is my argument. The tendency of the Government is in concentrating all power in the hands of the Executive, and I as an American citizen am profoundly convinced that that tendency, if not checked, will lead to the destruction of the liberties of this land, and that we cannot check it too soon. I do not speak of this as a party man; I speak of it in the higher position of an American citizen. Liberty and the spirity of liberty, freedom and the spirit of freedom, can only be maintained and can only be transmitted through the legislative department of the Government and not through the executive, and whenever the Executive of the people becomes the protector of the people in law, he is the protector in fact and he is in reality their master.

Not very many years ago this question was discussed in this very Chamber. It arose under the administration of General Jackson. Mr. Duane, Secretary of the Treasury, declined to remove the deposits from the Bank of the United States. He was removed by General Jackson from the office of Secretary of the Treasury and Roger B. Taney, who afterward became the Chief Justice of this country, was put in his place. He obeyed the mandate of the Executive, and that I think is the weakest part in all the history of the great Chief Justice. For doing so the Senate condemned him and passed a resolution condemnatory of the Executive, because it was thought then that there was a great tendency to executive usurpation and the concentration of power in the hands of the Executive.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to interpose right there?

Mr. BOGY. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Missouri has referred to the action of Mr. Taney as Secretary of the Treasury in removing the deposits from the United States Bank, and said that he considers that the weakest point in all the history of the late Chief Justice Taney. I wish to say to the Senator from Missouri that in acting in that manner the late Chief Justice of the United States only acted in accordance with what he believed to be right prior to his becoming Secretary of the Treasury. I believe it is stated in his biography that he had repeatedly urged upon General Jackson the necessity of the removal of the deposits from the United States Bank; so that when he became the Secretary of the Treasury and acted under the order of the President in making that removal he was but carrying out what he had previously urged upon General Jackson as his duty as President of the United States, and I do not join in the intimation of the Senator from Missouri that it was any blur whatever upon the character of the late Chief Justice Taney.

Mr. BOGY. I am much obliged to the Senator from Delaware for this little episode, for I did not desire to be understood as casting any reflection on the life of the late Chief Justice. I would say more: As Attorney-General of the United States he had advised the President that the deposits should be removed, and that were he Secretary of the Treasury he would remove them; but nevertheless he accepted office and removed the deposits and laid himself liable to the censure to which I have alluded. I have no doubt that he acted in accordance with his previous convictions; nevertheless, as it is the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to report directly to Congress and not to the President—in other words, although he is one of the Cabinet he is supposed to be more the minister of Congress than of the President—it was thought at the time to be yielding to executive dictation beyond that which was believed to be proper at that day. But what then was supposed to be so highly improper and which called from Mr. Clay some of his most eloquent speeches would now be considered as amounting to nothing at all. The powers of the Executive from that day to this have grown so enormously, that an act of that kind would not be noticed at all at this day. That is the objection I have to this resolution; it is sanctioning the tendency of power into the hands of the Executive, while I would like to see a tendency toward the legislative department, I repeat. Not as a party man do I say, but I say it in my higher character of a citizen of this country, that I see with great regret that such is the tendency. No one can doubt that power is rapidly passing from this body to the other end of the avenue, and at the rate that we are going now it will be but a very few years till Congress will be a body without any power, till it will be impotent for good and only potential for mischief; powerless for any good whatsoever, but all powerful for a great amount of mischief.

If it is not the object to strengthen executive power, why is this resolution introduced at all? What motive could have impelled the Senator from Indiana to have introduced the strong and expressive resolution which he introduced on this subject? What motive could have dictated either of the other resolutions but one to sustain the Executive in the exercise of a power which in the estimation of many Senators on this floor he does not possess? The Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] one of the leading minds on the other side of the Chamber, speaking upon this subject but a few days ago, denied utterly the power of the Executive on this subject, and yet I presume he will himself vote for this resolution. He has either got to vote for it or against it. If he votes for it, he has to take back that which he said the other day denying to the President all power upon this subject. He said:

> But, sir, I will not waste your valuable time in further discussing that question. I am bound to say as a Senator of this body that the attitude of the President of the United States as President upon this subject is absolutely immaterial to me. I know of no clause in the Constitution or in the laws that gives the President of the United States any right whatever—to interfere in this matter. The Senator from Vermont denied the absolute right of the President; it has been denied by many Senators on that side, and yet we are called upon now to face this thing and to record our votes for it or against it. If you sanction it now, where is it to end? Sir, there will be no end. Power is tending rapidly, rapidly indeed, into the hands of the Executive, and it will be a very short time till he will have all power. He is now commander of the Army, commander of the Navy, having the right to appoint all the sixty or seventy or I believe eighty thousand office-holders of the United States, having the power to remove them and appoint others in their stead, controlling the entire machinery of the Government. All that is needed is a subservient Congress. Let a Congress meet here at a future day that is subservient, and what becomes of the liberties of this country? And will not such a Congress come, if it has not yet come? I do not wish to be understood as saying that it has yet come, but will it not be sure to come if you permit the Executive to have any say-so in the elections of the States? Will he not so arrange it that none will be elected but men of his own way of thinking, and then this great and dignified body will have sunk into utter contempt?

I am opposed to it; yet, as I said awhile ago, it may be a fortunate thing that the question is presented at this day to the American people. These resolutions will play an important part in the next presidential election, and the question will be placed before the men of this country whether they are disposed to sanction a rapid accumulation of power in the hands of the Executive or whether they are not. And, sir, mind what I tell you, judging of the future by the past, a storm will sweep over this land the like of which has never yet been seen, and the party, Mr. President, [Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, in the chair,] of which you are so distinguished a member will be placed in the position where my party was placed a few years ago. The democratic party, in a spirit of perfect fidelity to the Constitution, became the pro-slavery party of the nation, because they believed, as I believed, that the institution of African slavery, no matter what might have been its character, was protected by the Constitution as it had been handed down to us by our fathers. Believing it to be a right protected by the Constitution, the democratic party maintained that right and were placed as a party in a position opposed to the great spirit of universal liberty and we could not help ourselves. Your party, sir, mounting the popular cry of universal liberty, the cry of emancipation, created a storm which for the time being swept us from the places of political power and you rode into power. The citizens of the Southern States acting in the same way, acting as they believed in obedience to a right guaranteed to them by the Constitution, attempted to maintain that unfortunate system of slavery in their own way, and they encountered the great popular storm which for the time being annihilated them.

There is in free countries—and thank God that there is and as long as it continues we shall see it—a spirit of liberty, a spirit of love of freedom, which is a part and parcel of the human organization. In all countries indeed, I may say it has existed and it has existed in all ages. The love of freedom, the love of liberty, exists in all animated nature. It is not confined to man. All animated nature seeks and sighs and struggles for freedom for itself. We will occupy the position before this nation that you occupied a few years ago as the party of freedom, when you will be placed where you ought to be placed as the party which sustains despotic power in the hands of one man, and you will not be able to shake off that shirt of Nessus, but you will wear it and wear it, I hope to your political destruction. Such will be the result. This question will go to the people. All over this land, on every hill, on every mountain, in every valley, along every river, from the North to the South, and from the East to the West, will the young men of this country appeal to the people of the Union whether they are in favor of putting all power in the hands of the Executive or not. Such will be the question, and you cannot avoid it.

Mr. President, viewing the question in that light, I am of course opposed to the resolution. I see no good even to the party of which you are a member that can result, but much mischief. What can be your object? What is the secret motive? What do you wish to attain by the passage of this resolution? It sanctions the one-man power and nothing else. What is the argument? Is there not something beyond? Is there not something that we do not see, something hidden, some great object to accomplish? There must be. When a resolution of this kind meets the approbation of a number of men of ability and of experience, men of known statesmanship, there must be a hidden purpose somewhere that we do not know. Why should you desire to strengthen the arm of the Executive? Is it only as a matter of personal compliment to him, soothing to his feelings? You have no power to do it as a Legislature. It is a mere experssion of opinion on the part of the Senators on this floor, which at the same time will go far to proclaim to the world that this exercise of executive power is legitimate.

We talk, sir, of the rights of the States. I heard a gentleman speak most ably and most eloquently about "sovereign States" the night before last. Why, sir, what will become of the sovereignty of the States if all power is in the hands of the Executive; and indeed how far are States sovereign at the present day? My friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] claims that they were sovereign before they came into the Union, continued to be, and are so now. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] and I might say the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] deny the proposition. I say that if the people of the United States sanction the resolution which is presented to this body, there will be no sovereignty left in the States at all, if there be much left now. That the States at one time were sovereign I have no doubt. When the question of citizenship was one left with the States alone, when the United States Government had no citizens, we could not be a nation, because citizenship is essential to nationality. There cannot be a nation without a citizen. It is impossible; it is a simple absurdity. And as there could be no citizens of the United States separate and apart from State citizenship, it was rather difficult to comprehend that there could be such a thing as nationality in this Government. That might have been a matter to be deplored or a matter to be approved; but at the present day the reverse is the fact. Citizenship is created alone by the United States, and the States have no power over the subject at all. Under the fourteenth amendment it is a power which has been wrested from the States and given to the United States, and now there is such a thing as a citizen of the United States independent from a citizen of a State, and it may be that this now is a nation. In my estimation it is, and in my estimation it is a great nation, and my desire is that it shall continue to be not only a great nation but the greatest and the mightiest that has ever existed on the face of the earth. But, sir, if you concentrate power in the hands of the Executive, your States will not amount to so much as a proconsulship of the Roman Empire. The great State of New York, having within its borders the large city of New York with a population of five millions of people, will not have as much sovereignty as the little kingdom of Hawaii has to-day. It would have no sovereignty at all, having no power, the President having the right to control its Legislature; for if he has a right in Louisiana he has in New York. Louisiana is as much a State as New York, or Vermont, or Maine, or any other State; and if he has a right to control a Legislature in the State of Louisiana and thereby shape the election of Senators, he has the same right in New York and in your own State, and the day will come when that right will be exercised, and then what becomes of your State sovereignty? It is now in my estimation—and I am very sorry to say it—but a very feeble sovereignty. I regret it, for I believe that the long duration of this Government, the security for freedom, the security for liberty, the security for all those great principles that form freedom and liberty, depends on securing to the States of the Union sovereign powers within the limits of the Constitution, or making them sovereign on their own territory at home without the power of the President to control them at all excepting in those matters which have been expressly delegated to the Government or which follow by necessary implication. But with an overgrown Executive at the head of the Army and the Navy and with the appointing power, all power has passed from the States, all power has passed from Congress, and all power is lodged in one man, and that is what in modern times is called Cæsarism, imperial power.

Sir, I call upon the Senate of the United States not to encourage such a tendency, to check it now; keep the power here and in the other House; keep the power where the States can exercise it through their Senators and the people through their members of the lower House; keep it there, and as long as you do that this Government will go on fulfilling its high mission; but put it in the hands of your Executive and its days are numbered and they will not be many.

Sir, I did not rise for the purpose of making a speech in regard to myself or for the purpose of indulging in declamation. I felt it to be my duty as a Senator, as a citizen of this country, to raise my feeble voice as a voice of warning upon this most important subject. Let us stop now. Let us stop where we are. Let us not encourage this tendency, which we all know is fact increasing from day to day. Let us stop it; and if we do that we shall have done more to perpetuate liberty and freedom than has been done in this country for many years.

Mr. President, I regret that I have detained you so long, and without further remarks I yield the floor.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, with very limited legislative experience, all unused to discussions before so grave a deliberative body as this, all the experience I have had in the discussion of questions of state-craft being that derived from the rude assemblages of the hustings, I appear with great deference and with a profound feeling of distrust in my capacity properly to discharge the duties incident to my position, and attempt to discuss a question which has already been worn threadbare by the concentrated analyses of minds matured by legal experience, by enlarged statesmanship, and by thorough knowledge of the subject. I know that it would be presumptuous in me to suppose that I can say anything new upon a subject already so thoroughly discussed. But, Mr. President, when I remember that I stand here as the representative of one of the old thirteen States which originally composed this Union; a State which I undertake to say contributed as much to the construction of this Government as any other; a State which in times past has wielded as much influence upon the policy of this Government as any other; a State whose sages, whose soldiers, and whose statesmen surrounded the very cradle of our national existence and with firm hand steadied the reeling pillars of that infant State and fixed them on the firm basis of a free constitution; a State whose sons have ever been found first and foremost in defense of those great principles of constitutional liberty which underlie the foundation of our Government, I may well claim for that State a right to be heard on an occasion such as this, when the fundamental principles of republican liberty are assailed and when it seems to be the fixed purpose of the majority to establish a precedent which will forever break down the distinctive features of this National Government and establish upon its ruins a consolidated despotism.

If in the progress of this discussion I shall in any way transgress the rules which custom has decreed in the consideration of matters before this body I beg in advance to apologize therefor and to say that it is not my purpose in any sentiment that I utter, in any expression that I use, to derogate in the slightest degree from the dignity of this body or in any way to lower the high prestige of a body composed of the conscript fathers of this Republic.

In commencing my discussion of the resolution now pending I feel impelled to concur in the sentiment announced by several who have preceded me on this side of the question, and to deny utterly the power of the Senate to consider in executive session a measure so fraught with the most important interests, but utterly foreign to the business which we have been convened to consider; and while I do not presume to question the correctness under the rules of the Senate of the decision of our Presiding Officer in declaring that the question of admissibility could not be entertained by the Chair after a resolution is once introduced into this body, I yet must express my regret that when called in executive session the Senate should have transcended what I conceive to be the legitimate limits of the business in which it can properly engage to engage in the consideration of matters such as this.

By the introduction and passage of these resolutions we propose in advance to express an opinion and commit the Senate to the indorsation of the acts of the Executive in a manner which might hereafter embarrass and impede our action. Remember that under the Constitution the Senate in some cases becomes a court of last resort, whose duty it is to try and decide all allegations made of maladministration of power in the hands of the Executive. Whether the case under consideration be one which might properly be regarded as coming within this rule it is not for me to say; but the effect of acting upon the subject will be to establish a precedent which, if not in this, yet in some future case, may debar us from the proper exercise of those judicial functions which may devolve upon us. This I conceive to be a valid objection to the passage of such a resolution as this now pending.

The history of this measure is fraught with instruction. If public reports be true, and I have no disposition to question them, it has been carefully considered day after day in a party caucus and with much difficulty have conflicting views been harmonized. Something objectionable must have been embodied in the resolutions, some serious defect, either in the mode in which they were drawn or in principles to which they commit the majority, must have existed to require such mature and repeated deliberations before it was thought proper to lay them before this body; yet when they come before us the distinguished gentleman who presented the substitute now under consideration indicated a purpose to act upon it at once, without discussion upon that side of the Chamber, declaring in few words that argument on both sides was exhausted, that it had been debated for such a length of time that nothing new remained to be said upon it, and therefore he saw no motive, no reason, no object for more prolonged debate.

It appears to me that it would have been both opportune and appropriate had this distinguished Senator, or some other who approves the resolution, indicated to the Senate some of those reasons which proved sufficiently potent to induce them to abandon the views previously enunciated in this body, to recede from their refusal to indorse the acts of the Kellogg and Pinchback government of Louisiana and consent to an indorsation of every act done by the Executive in defense and maintenance of that government. It will be remembered that it was urged here during the discussion of the Pinchback resolution by several distinguished Senators of the majority that that government was a monstrous usurpation, that it had no legal existence, and consequently the applicant who had knocked so loudly at the doors of this Senate Chamber was rejected, or, what was tantamount to a rejection, his case was relegated to December next for further consideration. I assume, therefore, that some most cogent argument must have been used with Senators who thus refused to indorse the resolution for the admission of Pinchback to induce them to approve this resolution, which is based upon a recognition of the validity of the very government that sent Pinchback here.

Sir, I would have been pleased had it comported with their sense of propriety to have been enlightened on these subjects. I should have been pleased to know why it is that the President is thus fully, completely indorsed in his recognition of a government which distinguished Senators on this floor have on more than one occasion pronounced to be a usurpation and a fraud and no legal government at all. We were told during the discussion of the first resolution presented by the distinguished Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] by that Senator and by several others who participated in the debate, that it was absolutely essential to the peace and prosperity of this country, for the preservation of good order in Louisiana, for the protection of life and property in that State, and for the vindication of the sovereignty of that State, that the question should be decided here and now; that Louisiana should no longer be permitted to remain with but one representative upon this floor; that the condition of chaos and confusion which existed there should be rectified by the fiat of this Senate; and one distinguished gentleman [Mr. LOGAN] went so far as to say that we ought, of necessity and propriety, to recognize either the one or the other of the claimants of a seat in the Senate from the State of Louisiana. He told us if we would not admit Pinchback we ought to admit McMillen and settle this vexed question, put an end to the confusion. Senators declared all this to be a necessity, and called upon us, by our sense of propriety, by our duty as Senators, by our patriotism, by our regard for the peace and safety and happiness of the people of Louisiana, to pronounce a decision. Yet when the time came and the vote was about to be taken which would decide this tremendous issue, a Senator [Mr. WEST] rose in his place, simply stating that because the party appeared not to be united in opinion, therefore all these grave considerations must be "whistled down the wind," and Pinchback's case postponed until December next, leaving these momentous issues all unsettled, these terrible dangers still imminent, these sacred rights yet unvindicated, lest forsooth the interests of the party might be jeopardized.

And here I take occasion to give expression to my full appreciation of all the high qualities of a parliamentary leader as exhibited by the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] during the progress of this discussion. Cool, watchful, and determined, with a clear and logical intellect which enables him to grasp at once the strong point of every question that is presented, of indomitable will, with a heart unquailing and a hand unflinching, he is prompt at all times to enforce party discipline whenever necessary. Wielding the whip of his party with relentless hand he lashes into subservience many who seem at first disposed to be a little recalcitrant. His action assimilates so closely those to which I have often been a witness, that I feel impelled to run the parallel, albeit a little out of place in this Chamber, but which I hope will be pardoned in consideration of the partialities of a distinguished official, not very remotely connected with this subject. So have I seen the skillful driver of a restive team, composed of horses of different tempers and different dispositions, when he comes to the pinch of the hill, find it necessary to wield with relentless hand the whip and lash the sluggish horses into obedience. The Conestogas respond promptly to the whip, but if there should be in that team any high-mettled thorough-bred the touch of the lash rouses him to resistance and he indignantly refuses to obey the demand of his driver; he rears, plunges, and finally "kicks out of the traces." Under such circumstances what does a good driver do? Precisely what was done in the instance before us. He no longer plies the lash, but substitutes the soothing process; he coaxes him with honeyed words; he pats him on the back, calls him a "good fellow," coaxes him into good humor, and when his docility is thus restored, at the word he presses forward and the obstruction is overcome.

But let us return to the consideration of the resolution now pending. Modified as it has been from the form in which it was originally presented, it still retains substantially the same elements in its composition. I do not, for example, see the advantage of the substitute offered by the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island for the original resolution inasmuch as it differs from it only in striking out that portion which authorizes the President to continue to recognize in the State of Louisiana the existing State government. If the existing State government be the lawful government, if it be the true government of that State, if the Executive has done nothing but what is right and proper in recognizing and sustaining it, what objection can there be to pledge in advance the support of the Senate in his future recognition of that government? I repeat therefore that I cannot see a substantial difference between the amendment which has been offered and the original resolution, but I have no doubt it is perfectly right and proper; only the distinguished gentleman who moved it has not thought proper to enlighten us as to what was desired to be accomplished thereby.

It has been intimated that this resolution has not the force of law, that it is a mere placebo, which the Chief Executive of this nation is anxious to have passed that his action in this respect may be indorsed by the Senate, as it has been already approved by the House of Representatives. Well, sir, I do not regard the resolution in that light. It is true that it is no specific enactment; it is true that it is a mere expression of the opinion of the Senate, which may be well assimilated, as has been done, to the action of a popular assembly or a political convention; but, my word for it, there is somebody behind the scene who is sufficiently astute to know that such action by the Senate means something, and if it be carried out it will bear fruit and such fruit probably as many of the gentlemen who now favor it will be sorry to see ripen.

The passage of this resolution is the indorsation of an act which those of us who have been trained in a stricter rule of constitutional construction than is now fashionable cannot admit was justified by the Constitution or the law. In fact, I regard the introduction of this resolution an admission that the acts which are here alluded to were not done in consonance with the Constitution or the laws of this country. I believe this to be the legitimate and logical deduction to be drawn from the introduction of the resolutions themselves. When before was it ever thought necessary in executive session to solicit the approval of the Senate of the United States of any act of the President which was performed in strict and known accordance with the Constitution and the laws? Never, so far as my knowledge of the action of this body extends. The necessity of this indorsation then, I repeat, implies the admission that those acts need indorsation, that they are in violation of the Constitution or of the laws of this country, and consequently should never receive the approval of this body.

I know that in many of the years which have passed—sad years to some of us—violations of the Constitution have been not infrequent. I know that its most sacred provisions have been ignored and trampled under foot on more than one occasion. I know that the reasons alleged in justification of these violations were evidently potent at the time, namely, that the safety of the nation and the "life of the nation" demanded that these constitutional restrictions and inhibitions should be ignored. It boots not now to discuss or deny this. But surely no such reason exists at present; surely no one can now assert that "the life of the nation" or the public weal would be in any way imperiled by refusing to give the sanction of this Senate to these acts of the President constituting such a wanton exercise of what we believe to be usurped power on the part of the Executive. I do not see that a single interest of the country would be damaged by our refusal; I do not see that any good can be effected by their passage. On the contrary I see that the precedent, once established, may become most potent for evil, and such I conscientiously and truly believe will be the effect of the indorsation by the Senate of these acts on the part of the Executive; and gentlemen who now press them upon us with such unyielding determination may find to their cost that, "like curses and chickens, they will ultimately come home to roost."

When we look at the various steps in this direction which have been taken by the Chief Executive of this Government during his incumbency in office, if we fail to see in them a fixed determination to exert, if not to usurp—I do not like to use a harsh term—but to exert and exercise powers not delegated by the Constitution, we must be dull scholars indeed. Trace his history from the time of his first assuming the presidential chair to the present moment, and you will find that repeated acts of aggression upon the other departments of the Government have marked his executive career. We find that time and again has he exercised powers and wielded authorities which were not delegated to him by the Constitution and the laws. In Alabama, in Mississippi, in Louisiana, in Arkansas, in Tennessee, has military usurped the place of civil law under the orders of the Executive, public rights and private liberties have fallen prostrate at the feet of arbitrary power, and the most sacred provisions of the Constitution been ignored and defied. Legislative assemblies have been constituted and destroyed without regard to the voice or wishes of the people. Governors have been made and unmade by the fiat of the Executive. Property, liberty, and life, no longer confiding in the protection of the Constitution, have been held by the frail tenure of the prejudice or caprice of a military commander, and now we are asked to ratify and indorse these acts.

Still more recently we find that he has asked for powers and petitioned the Congress to grant authority which, if conferred, would sweep from existence the most cherished provisions of our laws, and leave us a Constitution that would not be worth the snap of a finger. Fortunately for the country this "force bill" failed to become a law, but the fact remains no less startling and significant that the President anxiously desired to be clothed with these powers, which would have made him master of the situation in the coming presidential election, and enabled him to control and determine the electoral vote in four of the Southern States. Pass this resolution, and the President of the United States may very well hereafter assert and exercise the same powers which have proved so potent in Louisiana in any other State in this Union, and plead in extenuation and excuse that he has the authority and indorsation of both Houses of Congress for the act. Remember that the sole pretext on which his action in Louisiana is based is that it was necessary to preserve the public peace and protect the State from domestic violence. Is there any evidence to sustain the allegation? I have listened and looked in vain for it. On the contrary, nothing had occurred in this case but what had occurred repeatedly before in the history of this country—a division of sentiment on the part of the people as to who was the legally-elected governor and Legislature of the State of Louisiana. Threats of violence and possibility of collision may have existed; but there were no scenes of actual violence, so far as I am advised, at the time the armed minions of a military President marched through the halls of the Louisiana Legislature and hurled from their seats men who claimed to be elected by the people at an election held in accordance with law, and which we have the authority of a congressional committee composed of republicans in believing were thus legally elected and entitled to their seats. The claim of a usurping governor, holding his seat by the fiat of a Federal judge, whose decision was not had in accordance with law but in direct violation thereof, constituted the sole ground for this military interference.

I ask you, Mr. President, where is the State in which the same scene cannot be repeated, especially if you give it the stamp of your approval? Assuming for the sake of the argument that there shall ever be an Executive (whether this or some future Executive) who desired to concentrate in his own hands all the powers of the legislative and executive departments, to become absolute and supreme in his authority, what would be easier than for such a person, through his myrmidons and agents who were willing to follow out his wishes and aid him in compassing his designs, to simulate a rebellion in any State, and calling upon the Executive to sustain their action, substitute military for civil authority, or inaugurate into power officials notoriously not elected by the people but such as he knew would carry out his own purposes and wishes in defiance of all constitution and all law, thereby wiping out of existence the constitution of the State itself and every right and liberty which the people of that State possess. Nay, more, sir, we may go further; we may assume that at some future period in the history of this country, when a contest has been waged for the executive chair in some future presidential election, the fiat of the people may have been pronounced for or against the incumbent of the presidential chair; and if against him he, anxious to perpetuate his power, unwilling to surrender the reins of that government which he had so long held, may seize on some pretext, however trivial, to enable him to use the same appliances that were brought to bear in the State of Louisiana and upon the national theater play the game which was successfully enacted there.

I know Senators smile in derision at these suggestions. I know they scorn any intimation of danger coming from that source and view as the fancy of a distempered brain any allegation that the laws and institutions of this country are in the slightest danger from any action of the present Executive. I do not charge it, but I do say that the indorsation of these acts would pave the way for such usurpations on the part of this or some future Executive and which would be fatal to the most cherished institutions of this country.

It is not my purpose to weary the Senate, and I have no idea therefore of going into an elaborate review of all the history of this Louisiana case. I shall not parade again before you the facts which have so often been demonstrated here as existing in the history of this Louisiana matter. I shall not go into an elaboration or presentation again of the facts which prove the illegality of the government which the President by the aid of his military power established in Louisiana. I shall not pretend to assert again and again the proofs of the usurpation which was practiced there by a governor who, under the influence of the returning board which was unauthorized by the constitution, declared his minions alone entitled to power. I shall not again review the judicial decisions upon this question. Able, learned, and distinguished lawyers have differed as to some of the points which are involved in this controversy; but none, so far as I have heard, have ever asserted on this floor that under any aspect of the question was this Kellogg legislature the true and constitutionally elected Legislature of the State of Louisiana. Why then should you indorse the action of the President recognizing as valid and legal a governor and a Legislature which have been time and again determined to have been illegally placed in power and never to have been elected, a governor who could not show a semblance of a return which would justify any board in giving him a commission?

The action of the Executive in sending down to the State of Louisiana a distinguished military officer must have in it something of peculiar significance when we recall the fact that he was selected from a large roll of officers as one specially fitted for the execution of this particular duty. One would have supposed, if it were designed simply to employ the military in aid of the civil power there to suppress rebellion or to keep the peace, that the military commandant of the particular division in which the disturbance was alleged to exist would have been selected to perform this duty, but in this case we find it far otherwise. An officer is taken from a distant post; he is notified in advance by the Secretary of War and not through the usual channel of communication, through his military superior, of the duty that was to be delegated to him. The very object and end of his mission was sought to be concealed by notifying him in advance that on this mission he had better assume that it was a mere private trip for pleasure and that it did not mean anything more. When this officer reaches the theater of his action, we find that violent scenes were at once inaugurated, that the whole military power of the Government was at once enlisted upon the side of Kellogg, and that the military has as literally and as truly driven from the halls of legislation in Louisiana men who had been duly elected by the suffrages of the people to their places in that body, as did the troops of Cromwell or Napoleon drive from the Parliament of England and from the Assembly of France the legislators assembled in deliberation in their day.

Instantly this officer seeks first from Congress and subsequently from the President that he may be invested with yet larger powers. Not content with usurping all the authority of the Legislature and of the governor by putting in only those who were committed to carry out their views, it is proposed that by the simple declaration that the people of Louisiana are banditti they may be turned over to the tender mercies of military courts-martial, with full authority to sit and try and condemn and execute any citizens between the rising and the setting of the sun. That is what was asked. Does any one suppose for a moment that there was no concert of action here, no understanding; that there was not a belief on the part of one if not both of the parties in this drama that such might be the result of this mission? I cannot know, no one can, but I think the circumstances that surround it justify the assumption that such was the course that was expected to be pursued, and that thus by this summary measure all opposition to the Kellogg government and to the administration of General Grant would be crushed out in the blood of its opponents in Louisiana. The telegrams which passed between these high officials exhibit a history which will yet be told in such words as will raise such a storm of indignation from one end of this great country to the other, from the Pacific to the Atlantic, and from the snows of Maine to the torrid clime of Texas, that those who justify and defend this action will cower and shrink from the consequences of their act. The purposes so thinly concealed in the telegrams that passed between these parties on that occasion flashed notes of warning that will yet be heard and I believe chronicled with such public reprobation of the acts proposed to be there enacted as will forever preclude a repetition, even by military gentlemen "not lawyers."

The disorders, the scenes of violence which have been here time and again recapitulated, are plead as excuses and reasons for this military interference, and this distinguished military leader with hot haste forwarded what purported to be a list of some three or four or five thousand men who have been murdered in Louisiana because of their political opinions. I have been looking over a little of the evidence in this case, for I was myself struck with horror at the alleged outrages described. I could not believe it possible that such scenes had been enacted and that so many acts of violence had been committed. I know and am ready to admit that many places throughout the South, ay, and throughout the North too, have witnessed scenes of violence; but I cannot believe one-half or one-tenth of the acts of violence alleged to have been committed in Louisiana or in any other southern State. In looking over the testimony presented with one of the official reports, my attention was directed especially to one parish—I do not recall the name at present as it is not important, and it lies on the table and can be referred to—in which it was alleged that nearly two hundred murders had been committed since 1868. I found there was the testimony of one sole witness to the fact, he averring that he had kept a record since 1868 of every murder that had been committed in that parish and that they amounted to so many; but when he was requested to produce his record, lo, it presented the names of twelve men specified, and the rest filled up in blank—no name, no place, no time indicated whatever, and he admitted that he had no knowledge on the subject except that he had been told that such was the case. The twelve names were subsequently brought before him consecutively in review, and after sifting him through the process of a rigid cross-examination it appeared that of his own knowledge he knew of two instances only in which men had been killed in that parish. The number of one hundred and eighty assassinations was reduced to two. The great dramatist of England has immortalized a scene in which certain men in buckram played a very important part; but not the genius of Shakespeare himself ever devised such a picture as that presented to that committee when they found that one hundred and eighty murdered ghosts by this process of elimination were reduced to two. Ex uno disce omnes!

I have no hesitation in asserting that most of the acts of violence which have been committed in the Southern States have been the result of private feuds, because it is demonstrated by the evidence which was taken by your own committee and by the committee of the other House that they were generally instances of murders of black men by black men or of white men by white men, in which politics played not the slightest part. They were private feuds gotten up to avenge private wrongs, or sudden quarrels, the result of accident or other cause, which led to these acts of lawless violence which I and those who act with me deprecate as much as any gentleman of the majority on the other side. But, sir, if acts of violence and of lawlessness justify an interference by the military authorities of the United States in the civil affairs of any State, why is it that we do not hear of some such interference where other States are concerned? Within the last week I have observed in the public journals the statement that a certain number of negroes have been assaulted and driven from their labor in the neighboring State of Ohio. Miners engaged in a peaceful occupation, laboring for their own subsistence, have been driven from their labor by armed and organized bands of white men, for no other reason than that they were black men and the whites did not mean that they should work in the mines. Did we hear of troops being ordered there? Has Sheridan or any military officer been ordered to assume command of the department north of the Ohio and see that the laws are faithfully executed and that violence and bloodshed are suppressed there? Do we hear of any telegram from that quarter, asking the Executive to proclaim as outlaws the people of Ohio because of these acts of violence? Yet here "the wards of the nation" themselves were the subjects of violence at the hands of white men, a distinction was drawn against them in consequence of their "race, color, or previous condition," and I have never heard that it has been prosecuted as a violation of the civil-rights bill. Now it seems to me a "bad rule that will not work both ways."

Mr. President, if I were to regard this question from a mere partisan stand-point, I should not regret the introduction and passage of these resolutions here. I do not pretend to question in any degree the astuteness and skill of the leaders of the majority on this floor. I presume they know what they are about. I know that they are fully informed, in their opinion, as to what the consequence of this action will be. But from the stand-point I occupy, I say as a partisan I cannot express regret at the action which is proposed to be taken and which I have no doubt will be taken in defiance of everything that can be said by the minority on this floor. But my opposition grows out of the fact that I am not willing to surrender for mere party advantages—for I believe this will insure to us that party advantage—a principle which I believe is so fraught with danger to the very foundation-stones of the Government on which we now stand. I believe, sir, when this question is submitted to the people themselves, when we go before them, that court of last resort to decide this question, we shall have a verdict which will satisfy both them and us.

I am glad, therefore, that this issue is to go before them in this shape. I am glad that an act in such flagrant violation of the Constitution and of the small remnant of rights that are yet reserved to the States will be brought before the whole people of this nation for decision. I am glad that the fight in the next presidential contest is to be narrowed down to so sharp an edge. I am glad to know that this nation will be called upon to decide then without complications, without side issues, without any disturbing influences, without questions of human slavery or human liberty, without tales of riot or bloodshed or murder, without any of these extraneous considerations which might tend to obscure the real question at issue; but the people will decide for themselves whether there are any rights reserved to the States which the General Government is bound to respect.

I do not fear the verdict of the people on such an issue. I know that if I were to draw my deductions from the lessons of past history

I should pause and perhaps doubt the correctness of my prediction or feel full confidence in the position which I have asserted. I know that when we look back to the history of all other great republics which have existed from time immemorial that one and all of them have traveled the same road which we are now pursuing. Each and every one of them, without a single solitary exception, has found its fate in the usurpation and consequent aggregation of political power in the hands of the executive and at the expense of the legislative and judicial departments of the government. I know therefore that if I were to draw my lessons from history I would not be warranted in making the assumptions which I do now make; but I hope better things of this Anglo-Saxon race and that they may prove an exception to this historic rule. I believe that love for the principles of constitutional liberty and republican government is so deeply embedded in the hearts of the people of this great country from one end of it to the other that they will rise in indignant reprobation at the effort to wrest these powers from them and vest them in the hands of an ambitious Executive. I look forward, therefore, with hope to the verdict of this grand jury of the nation.

When venality, when corruption, when usurpation mark the career of any President or of any Congress, of any legislative department, or of the legislative, executive, and judicial department of the Government combined, when the strong hand of military power is invoked to decide questions which should only be decided in judicial courts, when the united power of an Army and a Navy and eighty thousand office-holders can be wielded as a unit by the Executive of any country, I tell you that country is in danger and her institutions can only be rescued by a general upheaval and uprising of the people, who will assert their supremacy and their sovereignty in the premises.

Whatever may be said of State sovereignty and national sovereignty, (I do not now propose to discuss them,) none will deny that power has its origin in the hands of the people and that they alone can wield sovereign power. Their will is superior to that of States or nationalities, and when they choose, according to the principles of our own legislators, of our own forefathers, they can alter the Government or they can retain it in the form in which it best pleases them. I believe that such will be the verdict of the people at the next election. I believe that when they are again called upon to decide, the contest, narrowed down as it will be at that time to one point, whether the principles of the Constitution shall be maintained, whether republican government shall be preserved, or whether the Executive shall usurp and wield all the powers properly devolving upon both the legislative and the judicial department of the Government, the people will be true to themselves, true to the institutions of their fathers, and render such a verdict as will forever estop all further efforts at the aggrandizement of the executive at the expense of the other departments of the Government.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, if I had not thought before of addressing the Senate on the Louisiana question the fact that one of my own political party [Mr. MCCREERY] now occupies the chair, which I expect to see occupied permanently by one of my own political faith in the near future, would be an inducement to me to begin remarks which will probably not consume thirty minutes of the time of the Senate. Perhaps this information will keep the galleries from being cleared and contribute to maintain a quorum on the floor.

There is another reason why I speak on this subject to-day; I should not like to go down to history as the single member of this body holding my political views who had not entered his protest against the Federal action in Louisiana.

Sir, I desire to ask if it is competent for this body, sitting in extraordinary session, to pass a resolution of this character if even by implication it is of a legislative nature? We have during the present session decided that very question and decided it in the negative. If, then, we are not competent to pass upon questions of a legislative character at this session, and if this resolution has no other force or effect than the expression of the opinion of individuals aggregated, why should my friend the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] have introduced a resolution that has detained the Senate these many days, the object of which perhaps could have been as well attained if he had attached the signatures of the members who are in political accord with him to a copy of the resolution under consideration?

If the resolution has more of force and effect than that to which I have alluded, if it has something more of effect than the mere expression of individual opinion aggregated, from whence is the authority derived? The House of Representatives at its recent session passed a resolution similar in character to the resolution now pending. That was not a joint resolution; it was not even a concurrent resolution; it was, as this purports to be, a mere expression of opinion of a certain number of members of a legislative body. Is the present resolution when passed to be attached to the resolution which passed the House of Representatives and both to have effect as the joint action of Congress? Are the two resolutions to be lovingly laid side by side, and when indorsed by the executive act and christened by the executive hand are they to be known to us hereafter as "law and authority?" Is that the object of these disjointed resolutions?

Why pass upon any resolution of approval? If the President of the United States has performed his duty, then his own conscience, like that of any executive officer, is the best approval he can obtain, and no number of resolutions passed by this or any other body will avail to help him if the public conscience be against him.

Does not the introduction of this resolution raise a question, does it not arouse a suspicion, that the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber are not sure themselves about the propriety and legality of the President's action in Louisiana? We of the opposition have presented no formal resolution of condemnation. By no formal resolution of condemnation have we aroused this discussion. They who support the Executive have begged the question. They and not we have made the President an object of vindication and under the circumstances necessarily of attack? It is true that in speeches the gentlemen who are in accord with me in political opinion have entered their protest against the wrong, the usurpation, and what we believe to be the outrages inflicted upon the people of Louisiana; but, sir, we have been willing to let the whole question go to the American people and receive their condemnation, as our own, upon the Executive acts in Louisiana.

Does the approval of the President's acts include those of his agents? Is there any escape from the answer to this question? The retention of Durell in power; the use of the military force in removing members of the Legislature; the appointment and retention of Casey and Packard; the appointment of Sheridan as military commander, are presidential acts that we are called upon by the terms of this resolution to indorse and approve.

Sir, do I understand that a majority of the members of this body are ready to indorse and approve all the President's acts in Louisiana? If not, which are to be approved and which omitted? The resolution makes no distinction, has no reservations. Do I understand that the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber who have objected, as we know some of them have, to the acts of usurpation, of wrong, of illegality in Louisiana, are now willing to give their sanction to this resolution, covering as it does all these acts and others no less objectionable? It has been said that there is no instance upon record of the Senate approving in advance the executive desires. You propose to "advise and consent" to what? Substantially we are to "advise and consent" to consummate acts; nay more, by the very terms of the resolution not only do we practically advise and consent to all that has been done in Louisiana, but if we pass this resolution we are to sanction all which may hereafter be done by the President in Louisiana matters. Sir, can subserviency go further than this?

Nor does the dangerous precedent halt in its effects within the limits of ascertained and defined power. These approving resolutions of the House of Representatives and of the Senate of the United States giving to the present Executive all the color of authority have none of the restraints which a decent respect for public opinion has ever thrown about even the worst of laws.

I am forced, by every process of reasoning that I am capable of, to believe what I certainly dislike to believe, that there lies behind the effort to pass this resolution some hidden reason, some concealed motive, the full effect of which we cannot now perceive, but which when fully revealed to us it may discover purposes too late to control.

Can we as Senators, holding as we do peculiar relations to the executive department of the Government, appropriately commit ourselves to resolutions either of full approval or even of condemnation of the President's acts in Louisiana? Have we the right to commit ourselves at this stage of the proceedings?

Let me suppose a case, one that I am free to say I do not think is likely to occur, and one I hope that will not occur, and yet a case that is entirely within the bounds of possibility. Should the next House of Representatives when it convenes in December next, acting upon its well known authority, prefer charges against the President of the United States and impeach him for misconduct in office, I should like to know what position we, who would then be his lawful and only judges in a court of impeachment, would occupy on those charges coming from the House of Representatives? Is it expedient, is it dignified, and do we maintain our self-respect and our proper position as members of a co-ordinate branch of the Government in committing ourselves in advance to an approval of conduct upon which we may hereafter have to sit in judgment? I do not say that I desire any such result to come. I am one of those who would rather trust to the good sense, to the patriotism, and to the certain and unerring judgment of the great majority of the American people than to resort except in extreme cases to the power of impeachment. But, sir, of the expediency of that primary action we are not to be the judges, and what the House of Representatives may do at its next session is not for us to discuss at this time. Our duty will be best fulfilled if, as judges, we hold ourselves ready to perform it when the occasion arises.

Mr. President, the resolution under consideration, like the resolution that was offered by my colleague, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] if liberally interpreted, might read about in this way: "That the people of the State of New Jersey and of all the other States save Louisiana agree to bear with Christian fortitude and humble resignation the wrongs and the sufferings that have been or may hereafter be inflicted upon the State of Louisiana." If my colleague and myself should upon returning to the capital of the State we love so well, a State that has honored us both so frequently, find in the executive chair a person from the State of Illinois, a stranger unknown to us and most unfavorably known to those who knew him best, and if we should find in the chair of the president of our State senate a Chinaman or a Malay, and if we found in our legislative halls, where we had been accustomed to see our reputable citizens, men who had been picked up among the scavengers in the cities of New York and Philadelphia, would he and I deem it a matter of praise and of thanksgiving? And if we found our Federal judges and our United States marshals not only strangers to us but men whose deeds by day rendered justice a mockery and whose acts by nights blackened infamy itself, would we thank God that we lived under such a government? If, turning to our local officers, we found our county, our city, and our township offices filled with men not only strangers to ourselves, but hard, cruel, thieving, rapacious rulers, would we deem it a cause of personal congratulation, or would we deem it necessary that the American Senate should go out of its way to render pious thanks for such a monstrous condition of affairs in our old Commonwealth?

Mr. President, I do not believe the power of the Federal Government has been rightfully or righteously exercised in Louisiana for two years past; I do not believe that her rulers are those of her choice, that her representatives are those of her selection, that her laws are those of her making. I do believe that fraud and oppression have naturally wrought out wrong and cruelty. And now, sir, we are asked to give peace to Louisiana by commending her despoiler; we are asked to give her protection by placing manacles upon her limbs and laying her prostrate before her enemies. As a Jerseyman, loving the liberties which are mine, and which I wish all human kind to enjoy with me, I shall not indorse acts which I believe to have been foul wrongs upon the people of a State, generous, hospitable, warm-hearted, and patriotic, and I enter my protest against the approval about to be given by this resolution.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from New Jersey that no resolution of the character now under consideration ought to be adopted by this body; but as it seems to be the determination of the majority to pass such a resolution, I deem it proper to place before the country the specific acts of the President of the United States which the ambiguous language of the resolution offered by the Senator from Rhode Island seems to approve. I therefore propose the following amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island: Strike out all after the word "President," in the first line of the amendment, and insert:

In the use of the Army of the United States to enforce the unwarrantable, ex parte, and private order of Judge Durell, issued on the 5th of December, 1872, directing the marshal to seize the building occupied as a State-house for the assembling of the Legislature of Louisiana; in installing and upholding as the executive of the government of that State William P. Kellogg, who was not elected to that office by the people of Louisiana; in forcibly reinstating the said Kellogg in the said office of governor after he had surrendered possession of the same; in permitting without censure or rebuke United States soldiers to invade the hall of the house of representatives of Louisiana and to eject therefrom persons claiming to be members thereof, and thus destroying the organization of that body, is contrary to the spirit of republican institutions, and cannot be approved by the Senate of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MCCREERY in the chair.) Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. THURMAN. If no one is prepared to speak this afternoon I have a suggestion to make. Is the Senator from Maryland disposed to speak?

Mr. WHYTE. No, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, rose.

Mr. THURMAN. Does the Senator from Florida rise to speak?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President——

Mr. THURMAN. Would the Senator from Florida prefer to speak this evening or in the morning?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I should prefer to speak to-morrow.

Mr. THURMAN. I think every one must perceive that we shall soon come to a vote on this matter, and I believe we shall come to it sooner by pursuing the ordinary course of business in the Senate. I hope, therefore, it will be agreeable to Senators to adjourn now; and unless there is serious objection to that, I hope a motion to adjourn will be made from the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have consulted with our friends on this side of the Chamber and our friends on the other side, nos amis les ennemis, and I understand that there is no probability that there will be more than about two speeches on the other side. Whether the Senators on this side will deem it necessary to make any reply to the very extraordinary speeches which we have heard upon the other side I am not advised; but I have an expectation, and I may say more than an expectation, founded upon representations made to me, that if we adjourn now we shall have the vote at a reasonable hour to-morrow; and so far as I am concerned I will assent to an adjournment, but with the understanding and giving notice that to-morrow I shall ask the friends of this resolution to remain here until it is disposed of. From all I learn on both sides of the Chamber I have no reason to doubt that it can be disposed of at an early hour; but at all events I wish to give notice that to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to remain until the question is finally disposed of. With that notice, I have no objection to an adjournment if Senators desire one.

Mr. SARGENT. We had better have an executive session.

Mr. ANTHONY. As you please.

Mr. WHYTE. Before the question is put, I would ask to have the amendment offered by me printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made, if there be no objection.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and forty minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 23, 1875.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PAY OF PAGES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution offered by me yesterday morning in relation to the pay of pages.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay to the pages of the Senate at the rate of $2.50 per diem pay to the 15th day of April, 1875.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand this is usual. Therefore I do not object to it, but I think it is in the wrong direction.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am aware that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] had an amendment which he proposed to offer.

Mr. MITCHELL. If it is thought best to let the resolution lie over until he comes in, very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be laid over.

CLERK OF COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to submit a resolution to the Senate, if consistent with their views:

Resolved, That the clerk of the Committee on Military Affairs be continued on duty during the adjournment of Congress for the purpose of preparing and revising articles of war to be presented to Congress in December next.

I will state to the Senate, so that they may understand it, that this last winter I reported a bill providing for new articles of war, making several changes; and during the recess I thought of getting an Army officer to go over it and leave the clerk, if we should agree to continue him here, to make a perfect revision, so that the articles of war might be presented to the next Congress. If the Senate do not think it is proper to do that, very well; I only say I think it well enough to do it.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN subsequently said: I have learned since the resolution passed in reference to continuing the clerk of the Military Committee that by a provision of law passed at the last session committee clerks can receive no pay whatever during the recess. If that be the case, I move to reconsider the resolution and I will withdraw it.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I withdraw the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is withdrawn.

PRESIDENT'S ACTION IN LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN on the 16th instant, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. WHYTE to the amendment of Mr. ANTHONY.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President——

Mr. ANTHONY. With the assent of the Senator from Florida, I would like to state that yesterday I said that after having conferred with Senators on both sides of the Chamber I arrived at the opinion that this debate was nearly exhausted, and that I had an expectation and something more than an expectation, from what I have learned, that it might be readily concluded to-day; and the few Senators who desired to speak preferred to speak in the hours usually devoted to the daily sessions of the Senate. Some Senators have been detained here, at great inconvenience on account of personal and domestic reasons which they readily subordinated to the public interest but which are entitled to our consideration; and it seemed that it would be fair to both sides and conformable to the courtesy that has always prevailed in this Chamber, and that I trust always will prevail, that we should allow those Senators to speak at the time most agreeable to themselves. Therefore we adjourned at the usual hour yesterday, with the understanding that this debate should close to-day. I repeat, therefore, that I shall ask the Senate to-day to remain in continuous session, without adjournment and without recess, until we reach a vote upon this question.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not expect, Mr. President, to be able to throw any additional light on this subject which has been so extensively discussed by the many able gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate. The few observations that I propose to make in regard to this resolution will be simply explanatory of my views and of the reasons why I cannot support the resolution. It declares:

That the action of the President in protecting the government in Louisiana, of which William P. Kellogg is the executive, and the people of that State against domestic violence, and in enforcing the laws of the United States in that State, is approved.

Something has already been said in regard to the right of this body sitting as a separate body to entertain this resolution, and I propose to give my views in the outset upon that subject. I do not think that the Senate sitting as it is under the call of the Chief Executive of the nation has any right to adopt this resolution. Looking at the question in any view, it is beyond the power of this body, in my opinion, to consider it. If it be intended to approve something which has been done by the Executive that was not entirely legal, (which is sometimes done by legislative bodies,) then surely it is objectionable. The language of the resolution is that the action of the President is approved. The very terms, the language employed, would seem to indicate that there was something in the action of the Chief Executive of the nation that this body is called upon to cure by legislative power. It has been not altogether uncommon in the Legislatures of the several States to pass what are known as indemnity bills, and I think that the legislative history of Congress will show that many acts have been passed curing or attempting to cure the illegal action of executive and ministerial officers. If therefore this resolution is intended to impart validity to something which the President has done, which without it would not be regarded as valid, then I contend that it is legislation, because with Congress alone rests the power of passing acts or resolutions of that description.

If, upon the other hand, the resolution is not intended to cure or render valid the action of the President, then it is equally objectionable in my view of the case, because the proceedings of the President in relation to the transactions in Louisiana are such as not, in my opinion, to command the favor or approval of the Senate.

It will not be denied by any Senator on this floor that under the Constitution of the United States all legislative power is vested in the Congress of the United States—"all legislative power;" not a part of it but the whole. This word "all" has received judicial construction when found in statutes of the United States conferring jurisdiction, and has been held to exclude jurisdiction in any other body than the one in which the power is conferred.

All legislative powers herein granted—

Says the Constitution—

shall be vested in a Congress of the United States—

And that Congress is defined by the Constitution itself in clear and unmistakable terms—which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

I say therefore if this resolution is intended to cure some defect growing out of the irregularity of any proceedings on the part of the President in Louisiana, it is the exercise of legislative power on the part of the Senate acting separately from the House of Representatives. It may be well in this connection to refer to the Constitution in order to see what it provides in regard to the Senate when it acts in executive session. Section 2 of article 2 of the Constitution declares that the President—

Shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law.

Section 3 of the same article declares—

He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in case of disagreement between them, with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper.

Now, sir, in my opinion the only authority that the President has for calling this body together is derived from section 3 of the article of the Constitution that I have just read. There must exist an extraordinary occasion for calling either this or the other House together. I am not sufficiently informed of the usages of this body to be able to state what the practice is here; but it has been the practice in the several States when an extra session of the Legislature was called under provisions of the State constitution, for the chief magistrate to disclose distinctly in his message the purpose for which the body is convened. Up to this time we have had no distinct information upon that subject; and unless it can be claimed that the transaction of ordinary executive business constitutes an "extraordinary occasion" within the meaning of the clause that I have just read, then the call has not been made properly and we ought to confine ourselves strictly to executive business.

In this connection I am informed that the Chief Executive of the nation has already advised the Senate that he has no further business than what he has heretofore communicated. Then, sir, is the "extraordinary occasion" for which we are now assembled the adoption of this resolution? It is in my opinion a most extraordinary resolution indeed.

Another objection which occurs to my mind against the adoption of this resolution arises out of section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution, which has been very extensively commented upon by various Senators on this floor.

The United States—

Says this section—

shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence.

It will not be pretended, I think, by any legal gentleman who may occupy the position of Senator on this floor that this section of the Constitution can execute itself. I take it for granted that this section required legislation to give it effect, and that seems to have been the view of Congress upon the subject. Congress has legislated by virtue of this particular provision in the Constitution and has vested in the President of the United States authority to make it, or at least part of it, effective. Congress by the act of 1795 has clothed the President of the United States with the power in certain emergencies to employ the land and naval forces of the United States to suppress insurrection in the States of this Union. The only authority that the Executive of the nation had for what he did in Louisiana was under that law. Congress gave him power in clear and unmistakable terms to interfere if the facts existed there that required his interference.

Well, sir, he acted under that law; his proclamation shows it; and he derives his authority from the Congress of the United States to act. Is it competent then for the Senate alone to express any opinion in regard to his action? I am not a great parliamentarian; but it occurs to me that when the President of the United States exercises a given power under a law of Congress, it would be highly improper and unwise for either House of Congress alone to express any opinion in regard to the manner in which he discharged his duty under that law.

We know very well from the record in this case that there was no authority but the act of 1795 under which the President could have acted, and that act in conformity with section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution vested him with certain powers. If he has not acted in conformity with that law he is responsible alone to the authority that gave him the power. It is not for the Senate to approve or commend what he may have done under an authority conferred upon him by both Houses of Congress. That, in my opinion, would be arrogating to the Senate more than it has a right to arrogate to itself, to sit in judgment upon the action of an officer of the Government clothed with power under an act of Congress.

But, sir, there is a still further objection arising under this very law and the decision of the Supreme Court in 7 Howard, to which reference has frequently been made. I admit that the President under the act of 1795 is clothed with authority to determine for himself when the exigency exists that will justify him in employing the land or naval forces of the United States, and I agree that the Supreme Court of the United States in Luther vs. Borden decided that he is the sole judge of that exigency above and beyond every other department of the Government. The Constitution declares that the United States shall guarantee to each State in the Union a republican form of government, and Congress by the act of 1795 has delegated to the President the authority to interfere in certain cases; not the Senate, not the House of Representatives, but the Congress of the United States; and, as the court declared in that case, it would have been competent for Congress to have created a court and have invested it with power to determine this question. Congress therefore invested the President with authority to determine for himself when he shall interfere, and it has done it in the following language:

In case of an insurrection in any State against the government thereof it shall be lawful for the President, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the executive when the Legislature cannot be convened, to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States, which may be applied for, as he deems sufficient to suppress such insurrection; or, on like application, to employ for the same purposes such part of the land or naval forces of the United States as he deems necessary.

That is all that the Congress of the United States has done under this provision of the Constitution authorizing the United States to protect the States of this Union against domestic violence. There is no law on the statute-book with which I am acquainted which invests any authority or any officer with the power to see that the guarantee of the Constitution with respect to a republican form of government is carried out. That is a dormant authority still residing in the Congress of the United States, and which may be exercised whenever the emergency calls for it. Congress may provide by legislation for securing to a State a republican form of government; but up to this time it has not legislated upon the subject, and all it has done is embodied in the act of 1795, which confers upon the President the authority which I have just stated. The nature of that authority has been under discussion in this body for some time, and the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States has been read here repeatedly to show what the true nature of it is. While it has been referred to for another purpose, I will now refer to it for the purpose of showing that this Senate has no jurisdiction or authority to adopt the present resolution. Speaking of the act of Congress of which I have spoken, the Supreme Court in the case of Luther vs. Borden say:

By this act, the power of deciding whether the exigency had arisen upon which the Government of the United States is bound to interfere is given to the President. He is to act upon the application of the Legislature or of the executive, and consequently he must determine what body of men constitute the Legislature, and who is the governor, before he can act. The fact that both parties claim the right to the government cannot alter the case, for both cannot be entitled to it. If there is an armed conflict, like the one of which we are speaking, it is a case of domestic violence, and one of the parties must be in insurrection against the lawful government. And the President must, of necessity, decide which is the government, and which party is unlawfully arrayed against it, before he can perform the duty imposed upon him by the act of Congress. (Luther vs. Borden, 7 Howard, 43.)

Now, sir, if the President is the sole judge of the emergency, as the court say he is under this law, what authority has this body to express any opinion in regard to his action in that respect? The right to pass a resolution approving his course implies the right to pass one disapproving it. The moment you yield the question of jurisdiction, you must yield it for all purposes. By introducing a resolution in this body saying that you approve the action of the President under an act of Congress conferring upon him the sole authority in the case, you must necessarily admit that there exists authority here to disapprove of it if the body thinks proper to word the resolution in that way. How would a resolution disapproving the action of the President stand beside the decision of the Supreme Court under this law? If he is the sole judge and must take the responsibility upon himself, it is a matter resting upon his own conscience, with which the Senate has nothing whatever to do unless it undertakes to exercise another and more extraordinary power given by another provision of the Constitution.

This only shows that there is no jurisdiction in this body to pass upon the action of the President, first upon the ground stated that it is exercising legislative functions; and secondly that under the law conferring upon him this power he is made the sole judge of the emergency requiring his action, and he is responsible for that exercise of his judgment not to the Senate alone. In this connection I will read a portion of the speech delivered by the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] in the Pinchback case, when that question was before the Senate on a former day:

The President says the Kellogg government is the lawful government in Louisiana. He recognizes it by virtue of this authority. Now the proposition is this: Until that decision of his by virtue of this act of Congress is reversed by Congress itself, not by the Senate alone, it is binding upon the courts of the United States, as it is on the Senate and every branch of this Government, because otherwise we would have anarchy. We would have the President by virtue of the act of Congress recognizing one government and protecting it, the Senate of the United States, acting separately, recognizing another, and the House, if there were three, recognizing a third. That would be absurd on its face. Therefore, to carry out the theory and the harmony of the law, when the President, acting by our authority, says that the Kellogg government is the lawful government, it must be so received until by congressional authority, not senatorial alone, it has been reversed.

Read that in connection with the resolution now before the Senate and how can you reconcile them?

That the Senate approve the action heretofore taken by the President of the United States in protecting Louisiana from domestic violence.

The word "approve" implies the exercise of judgment and discretion; implies the exercise of free untrammeled will on the part of this body, while the argument of the Senator from Indiana in the case alluded to undertakes to show that this body has no option whatever but to follow the decision of the Executive. If the decision of the Executive, under this argument, is the law, if it is absolutely binding on this body, what warrant is there, I ask, for proceeding to give an expression of approval by the Senate? Your judgment is gone, you have none to render. The Senate has no opinion of its own. The authority which the law has vested with the power to decide has decided it, and according to this argument it is binding on every other department of the Government, not only upon the judiciary but upon the Senate and the House acting separately, and the decision of the President cannot be reversed, as the distinguished Senator argued, until it is done by an act of Congress. I only refer to this to show how difficult it is to reconcile the two arguments, the one that must go to support this resolution, and that made a few days ago by the Senator from Indiana.

When Pinchback's case was here the argument was that we were bound to admit him upon his credentials because the government from which he derived them had been recognized by the Executive of the Union. In this resolution we are called upon to approve that action. Look into the dictionary and ascertain the meaning of the word "approve." To approve, as I said awhile ago, implies the right to disapprove, and if you have jurisdiction over the question to do the one, you have to do the other. I am free to say that the decision of the Supreme Court in regard to the President being the sole judge of the emergency, when acting under the law of 1795, is the law of the land; but when I say that, I am not willing to admit that the Senate as now convened has any authority to express an opinion upon the subject.

This, sir, is my first objection to the resolution. The second objection is that it proposes to approve of everything which the President has thought proper to do in relation to Louisiana. It is most remarkable for its uncertainty, because it is couched in such language as to embrace everything which the Chief Executive of the nation has caused to be done in that unhappy State. It is most remarkable that this body should be called upon to "indorse the action of the President" "in enforcing the laws of the United States" when it is made his duty under his solemn oath of office "to see that the laws are faithfully executed," and if he did not do that he would be liable to impeachment. It is most unusual and uncommon, I think, for either House of Congress or either house of a State Legislature to pass a resolution approving or indorsing or commending the execution of the laws on the part of the Chief Magistrate. There is something more than that meant by this resolution.

I object to it under this head of my argument because the government indorsed and upheld by the President in Louisiana was not the legal government of that State. As I said before, while he is responsible to himself and to his own conscience for what he has done, it is asking too much of me to approve and indorse him in a matter in which he erred very greatly in my judgment. It is not necessary for me, after the discussions which have taken place here, to enter into the history of the Kellogg government, for goodness knows we have had enough of discussion on this subject and it would be arrogance in me to undertake to explain to the Senate the facts connected with the establishment of that government. We have the record here to show that the Kellogg government was a usurpation and the chief business of the Executive appears to have been confined to the support of that government, commencing at the first day of its existence and extending down to the present time. The resolution relates to his action "in protecting the government of which William P. Kellogg is the executive." That means every branch of the government, as is shown by the argument of the distinguished Senator from Indiana in speaking of that subject when he used this language:

In three messages sent to Congress since that time the President of the United States has formally recognized the Kellogg government, not simply Kellogg himself but what is known as the Kellogg government.

There is a good deal of uncertainty, as I said before, in the language of this resolution, but I wish to show what it means according to the interpretation given by the distinguished Senator from Indiana. "What is known as the Kellogg government" embraces, said he, "all its departments;" that is, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial departments. That is the Kellogg government in Louisiana which we are called upon by this resolution indirectly to indorse; not the executive department alone, not the judicial department alone, but the legislative included. That constitutes the Kellogg government.

Now, sir, can we as a Senate, after all that we have heard, after the learned arguments that have been delivered here by the distinguished jurists on this floor showing the illegality of the Kellogg Legislature, at this day vote to indorse it? Enough has been said on that subject, not on this side of the House alone but on the other side, to show that the Legislature of Louisiana known as the Kellogg legislature never had the least claim to validity. And if, as I contend, that Legislature is included in the general designation here of "the government of which William P. Kellogg is the chief executive," then whoever votes for this resolution votes to indorse that Legislature in Louisiana as the legitimate law-making body of that State. Whatever doubts, if there were any, that there may have been in regard to the proceedings of Durell touching the case of Kellogg vs. Warmoth, there cannot be any doubt in regard to the illegality of his action in the case of Antoine. I ask the Clerk to read what the distinguished Senator from Indiana said in regard to his action in that case.

The Chief Clerk read from Mr. MORTON'S report made in 1873:

The conduct of Judge Durell, sitting in the circuit court of the United States, cannot be justified or defended. He grosaly exceeded his jurisdiction, and assumed the exercise of powers to which he could lay no claim. The only authority he had in the matter grew out of the act of Congress of 1870 to enforce the fifteenth amendment, and the act amendatory of that, passed in 1871, which gave to the courts of the United States jurisdiction in all cases in law and equity arising under the former act. Under the first act two classes of cases might arise: first, actions to enforce the rights of those who had been illegally denied the right to vote upon the ground of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and second, actions to enforce the rights of those who had been deprived of office by reason of the denial to persons of the right to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and suits in equity ancillary or in aid of these rights of action would come within the jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States, among which would be a suit to perpetuate testimony. But the pretense that in a suit to perpetuate testimony the court could go beyond the natural and reasonable jurisdiction to decide who constituted the legal returning board under the laws of Louisiana, and to enforce the rights of such as it might determine to be members of that board and to enjoin others who were not, is without any foundation in law or logic.

In the Antoine case, Judge Durell not only assumed to determine who constituted the legal returning board, but to prescribe who should be permitted to take part in the organization of the Legislature and to enjoin all persons from taking part in such organization who were not returned by the Lynch board as elected; and this assumption of jurisdiction was made in the face of the express provision in the act of 1870 that its benefits should not extend to candidates for electors for Congress, or for the State Legislature. His order issued in the Kellogg case to the United States marshal to take possession of the State-house for the purpose of preventing unlawful assemblages, under which the marshal called to his aid a portion of the Army of the United States as a posse comitatus, can only be characterized as a gross usurpation.

It was not for the United States marshal or for the President to review the decisions and order of Judge Durell, and determine whether he had exceeded his jurisdiction. By the tenth section of the act of 1870, under which Judge Durell had assumed jurisdiction in the case, it is declared to "be the duty of all marshals and deputy marshals to aid and execute all warrants and precepts issued under the provisions of this act when to them directed;" and that they "shall have authority to summon and call to their aid the bystanders or posse comitatus of the proper county, or such portion of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia, as may be necessary to the performance of the duty with which they are charged."

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That is the opinion of very high authority in regard to the power of Durell by whose order it is admitted this government in Louisiana was established. But a very nice distinction has been attempted in the argument hitherto had by some of the learned Senators who have spoken. It is this: that no matter how illegal the action of Durell was, the question turned upon the right of the men who assembled in that Legislature to meet there and form themselves into a legislative body to govern the people of Louisiana. An illustration was resorted to of this kind: It was asked if a legal officer was assisted by a mob in the execution of legal process, could anybody say that the execution of the writ or the action of the officer was thereby rendered illegal? The action of Durell in this matter has been compared to the assistance which a mob might give to a legal officer in discharging his ordinary duty. Sir, I can see no resemblance in the cases. It may be owing to my dullness or want of comprehension, but I cannot see any resemblance between the case supposed and the case of Durell's action in Louisiana. Why, sir, he created the whole thing. He not only aided the intruders in getting possession of the State-house, but he actually decided that the Lynch board was the only legal board, and by his process of injunction he restrained and prevented the only legitimate board in Louisiana from making a legal canvass of the votes. He almost commanded the Lynch board to count in certain gentlemen as members of the Legislature and absolutely prohibited the De Feriet board from exercising any jurisdiction.

Then it is said that this action was only incidental, casual, and unimportant, and could not vitiate the right of those men to sit in that body. From whence, I ask you, sir, did they get their authority to go into the State-house? From whom did they procure their certificates of election? They procured them from the board that Durell had constituted by his order. At that door stood a file of soldiery, with crossed bayonets and an officer to receive the checks of the men designated by the judge who should enter to organize that body, and the men thus designated in that extraordinary judgment were the only men who who were permitted to take seats in that body. This was more than ordinary assistance. You may trace that government to its very foundation, and you will find that it has nothing to stand upon outside the arbitrary and illegal action of Judge Durell, supported by the executive authority of the United States. There were two boards. We know the history of them.

In this connection I wish to say a word in regard to the decisions of the supreme court of Louisiana in reference to which so much has been said. I have great respect for the judicial tribunals of my country. The habits of my mind and my profession naturally lead me to respect the judicial judgments of the courts of the land. I am not in the habit of speaking in unbecoming language of any constituted authorities. But I can hardly restrain myself when I am called upon to speak in reference to this Louisiana court. What has been the argument put forth here in regard to this government? It is that we are bound to regard it as the legal government of the State because the courts of Louisiana decided that it was the legal government. Sir, that is a very peculiar question for a court to decide, and I see no way in which it could have decided that question but one, in view of the lights which it had before it in regard to the fate of Warmoth. The manner in which Warmoth had been deposed in five hours by an impeachment was enough to satisfy that tribunal that no decision adverse to the Kellogg institution would be permitted, and I have very little doubt in my mind that if the court had attempted to decide otherwise than they did they would have been swept from that bench in the same way that Warmoth was swept from the executive office in the course of five hours after they got control of the State.

But look, sir, to the contradiction in their decisions. Bovee was the first secretary of state, elected in 1868, and when Warmoth removed him and appointed Herron the supreme court decided that the governor did possess that power. Afterward, when Herron deserted his friend and went over to Lynch, they decided just the reverse. It will be remembered Herron was removed and Wharton put in his place. Herron deserted Warmoth and went over to Lynch. Warmoth attempted to remove him, but he would not be removed, and the question came before the supreme court, and though they had decided in the first case that the governor could not remove Bovee they decided the reverse in Herron's case. Now, sir, to bring up the authority of a court like that for this body to be governed by does not strike me as very proper.

But, sir, the question whether there was a governor in Louisiana or not was not a judicial question; it was a political question. It was not a question for the courts of that State to determine; and in this I am sustained in a measure by the adjudication of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of The State of Georgia vs. Stanton. The Supreme Court of the United States, in speaking of the jurisdiction of courts on political questions, used the following language:

> We are called upon to restrain the defendants, who represent the executive power of the Government, from carrying into execution certain acts of Congress, inasmuch as such execution would annul and totally abolish the existing State government of Georgia, and establish another and a different one in its place; in other words, would overthrow and destroy the corporate existence of the State, by depriving it of all means and instrumentalities whereby its existence might, and otherwise would, be maintained.
> That these matters call for the judgment of the court upon political questions and upon rights, not of persons or property, but of a political character, will hardly be denied. For the rights, for the protection of which our authority is invoked, are the rights of sovereignty, of political jurisdiction, of government, of corporate existence as a State, with all its constitutional powers and privileges. No case of private rights or private property infringed, or in danger of actual or threatened infringement, is presented by the bill, in a judicial form, for the judgment of the court. (6 Wallace, 50.)

That was a case in which political questions were presented by a bill in chancery, just as they were presented in the cases in Louisiana for the determination of the supreme court of that State. Every question presented in every case there was a political question, involving the legality of the Kellogg government. It was questions of that kind that the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Georgia vs. Stanton said no court can undertake to decide. It has also been stated that the decisions of the courts of Louisiana are binding upon this body and upon every department of the Government of the United States, and the authority of the case of Luther vs. Borden has been relied upon in support of this argument. It has been admitted on all hands that unless the existing government of Louisiana derives validity in consequence of the judgments rendered by the local courts upholding and affirming it, or by the recognition of the President under the act of 1795, it has nothing to support it before this or any other body. Every argument that has been brought forth here for the purpose of sustaining this government as a legal institution is founded either upon one or the other of those propositions: First, that the government has been recognized by the courts of the State; and secondly, that it has been recognized by the Executive of the nation. This leaves out of view all the frauds that have been perpetrated, all the illegal means through which it has been established, and brings it down simply to a recognition by those tribunals. The position has been firmly taken that when the courts of the State decided that the Kellogg government was the legal government of Louisiana this body was bound, and the case of Luther vs. Borden was cited as an authority. I do not think that that case is any authority whatever for that proposition. The Rhode Island case was founded on a peculiar state of facts well known to every gentleman on this floor. The question presented for the decision of the court in that case from Rhode Island was a political question; it was not a judicial question. That was one of the propositions decided by the Supreme Court. Secondly, they decided that a circuit court of the United States sitting in a particular State was bound by the decisions of the State tribunals expounding the laws and the constitution of such State. Why is that so? Where does the rule find authority? In an express act of Congress, which relates only to the courts of the United States and indeed only to a peculiar class of cases. That rule does not apply to cases in equity; it does not apply to cases in admiralty; it does not apply to criminal cases; it applies only to civil cases at common law. The case before the circuit court in Rhode Island was a civil case at common law, and hence the Supreme Court of the United States held, and held properly, that the decisions of the Rhode Island court were bound to govern the circuit court in that case.

What does the Supreme Court of the United States in The United States vs. Reid et al., 12 Howard, say on this subject in explaining this rule which has been relied upon? Speaking of the thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act of 1789, the court say:

> The language of this section cannot, upon any fair construction, be extended beyond civil cases at common law, as contradistinguished from suits in equity. So far as concerns rights of property, it is the only rule that could be adopted by the courts of the United States, and the only one that Congress had the power to establish. And the section above quoted was merely intended to confer on the courts of the United States the jurisdiction necessary to enable them to administer the laws of the States. (12 Howard, 363.)

But what application can that argument have to the Senate of the United States? We know that that ruling does not bind all the courts of the United States in a cause in equity; that the rule is, that the circuit court of the United States sitting in a particular State in equity or in chancery is not governed by the laws of the State. The rule is uniform throughout the entire Union. The same rule governs in New York that governs in Florida, and the same rule governs in Wisconsin that governs in Delaware. The local laws of the State have nothing to do with that jurisdiction, but the rule is confined strictly to civil cases at common law for the purpose stated in this decision.

How, therefore, can this Senate be bound by a decision of the supreme court of Louisiana upholding and maintaining that State government under that rule, for it was under that rule that the decision in Luther vs. Borden was made? But what say the committee of the Senate in their report in regard to those very decisions of the State court of Louisiana? The committee say:

> But it has been claimed before your committee that a decision of the supreme court of Louisiana, rendered since this investigation commenced, has determined that the Lynch board was the legal returning board at the time it pretended to canvass the votes; and it is urged that a wholesome regard for the rights of the State precludes the Senate from investigating this subject back of that decision. That the canvassers were a board of officers created by the State law, and that the decision of the supreme court having determined that the Lynch board was the legal board, the United States is estopped by that decision and the canvass made by that board. To this there are three answers:
> First. The supreme court in the case referred to is understood not to have had any testimony before it showing the character of the proceedings by the Lynch board, which testimony is before your committee very fully. Fraud vitiates everything, and it is certain that no court upon the testimony before your committee could hold the canvass by that board to be valid.

Again, speaking of the different boards, the committee uses the following language:

> In the opinion of your committee there can be no doubt—conceding the validity of the act of November 20—that it transferred the duty of canvassing the returns of the last election to the board to be elected under the provisions of the act. The act provided for such election by the senate, and, taking effect in the vacation of the Legislature, created offices to be filled thereafter by the senate. This is what is styled in that State an original vacancy, which, happening in the vacation of the Legislature, the governor is authorized to fill by appointment; and it is said that the courts of that State have repeatedly recognized the right of the governor to make such appointments.

And then the committee says, speaking of the Lynch board:

There is nothing in all the comedy of blunders and frauds under consideration more indefensible than the pretended canvass of this board.

The following are some of the objections to the validity of their proceedings:

1. The board had been abolished by the act of November 20.

2. The board was under valid and existing injunctions restraining it from acting at all, and an injunction in the Armstead case restraining it from making any canvass not based upon the official returns of the election.

This is the board that created the Legislature which we are called upon to recognize by this resolution.

I have but one additional document to read in connection with this case (and then I will close my remarks) to show the character of this government and the motives that prompt me in not supporting this resolution. I read from a letter addressed by William P. Kellogg to the Attorney-General dated New Orleans, November 27, 1872. I think that this letter sufficiently explains the dispatch of the Attorney-General of December 3, 1872, about which so much has been already said in this discussion, but in regard to which no explanation has been yet vouched. That letter is as follows:

I can readily understand the delicacy of the President's position in this matter; but it must not be forgotten that this is a systematic and organized attempt to destroy the republican party in this State, to outrage every principle of justice, to override all constitutional and legal restraints, and to inaugurate a condition of things that will jeopardize the peace of the community and the security, hereafter, of the black as well as the white republicans of the city and State.

I say to you frankly that this fight is extremely distasteful to me, and I would be glad to get rid of the whole matter, but I feel bound, in the position in which I find myself, to do all I can to avert a condition of things such as will inevitably follow the accession of the democratic party to power in this State.

I therefore respectfully suggest that General Emory, who, I think, appreciates the necessity and sympathizes with the republican party here, be instructed to comply with any requisition that the United States courts may make upon him in support of its mandates and to preserve the peace. As at present advised, I think General Emory understands that he is to use the troops in no contingency without instructions from Washington.

I have dictated this communication very hurriedly, but although disconnected it may give you, together with the exhibits I inclose herewith, a tolerably correct idea of the situation of affairs here.

Should Mr. William E. Chandler or our members of the lower house call upon you regarding these matters, I wish you would confer with them as fully as you conveniently can.

In conclusion, let me say that should the United States courts hold with us, and if I count upon the co-operation and sympathy of the Federal Government, as far as it can be consistently given in aid of its firm and devoted friends in this State, who have done all they could to carry the State, and have really carried it by a large majority against organized fraud, the State may be saved to the republican party for the future, and I believe that under its auspices the State will become peaceful and prosperous, and no longer be a standing disgrace to the party and the people at large.

Very truly, yours,

WM. P. KELLOGG.

Hon. GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General United States.

This letter preceded in date the dispatch of the Attorney-General, about which so much has been said, dated December 3, the letter being dated November 27. The dispatch is:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 3, 1872

S. B. PACKARD,
United States Marshal, New Orleans, Louisiana:

You are to enforce the decrees and mandates of the United States courts no matter by whom resisted, and General Emory will furnish you with all necessary troops for that purpose.

GEORGE H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

There is the call; there is the reply. Who will say that that call was in conformity with the Constitution of the United States or with the act of 1795, authorizing the Federal Government to interfere in the affairs of a State? No, Mr. President, this government of Kellogg's has never been established by the voice of the people of Louisiana. It reminds me of an anecdote, which I remember grew out of a case from one of the local courts of my State. There was an illiterate judge on the bench who knew very little about law, and on one occasion he was called upon to try an action of ejectment, which the legal profession well know requires that the plaintiff shall always recover on the strength of his own title and never on the weakness of his adversary's. In that case the learned judge was called upon to instruct the jury. He had a confusion of ideas in regard to the law, and when he came to charge them, he coolly turned around and said: "Gentlemen, the defendant is entitled to your verdict upon the strength of the evidence that he did not produce." [Laughter.] In this case William P. Kellogg claims to be governor by the votes that he did not receive!

Having said much more than I anticipated in the outset, because I rose simply to give the reasons why I shall vote against the resolution, I shall no longer detain the Senate.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, the resolution of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] which was introduced into this body on the 16th of March, and which is in these words—

Resolved, That the Senate approve the action heretofore taken by the President of the United States in protecting Louisiana from domestic violence, and are of opinion that he should continue to recognize in that State the existing State government—seems to mean a condonation of the past and a carte blanche for the future. This resolution was sent to a tribunal of this body composed of the members upon the other side of the Chamber, and it remained there until the 20th of March following, four days, submitted, as we must suppose, to the crucible and test of caucus heated by party discussion. When it returns to this Chamber, it returns under the auspices of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] and from it is eliminated immunity for the future. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island is in these words:

That the action of the President in protecting the government in Louisiana, of which W. P. Kellogg is the executive, and the people of that State against domestic violence, and in enforcing laws of the United States in that State, is approved.

What happened in the tribunal to which this resolution was originally submitted, as a matter of course, we are unable to determine; but in my brief experience I have learned to ascertain from those things that are omitted in documents discussed and that are not stated much that I cannot learn from those things that are stated. When we seek to contrast the resolution of the 16th of March with the resolution of the 20th of March we find that they differ in terms, differ in substance, differ in effect. Let us see. The resolution of the 16th of March approved the action of the President "in protecting Louisiana;" the resolution of the 20th of March approves the action of the President in "protecting the government in Louisiana of which W. P. Kellogg is the executive!" "Louisiana" is the State. The proposition in the former is general, is vague; the proposition in the latter, however, is distinct, emphatic, pointed—"in protecting the government in Louisiana of which W. P. Kellogg is the executive." Why this is, it is not for me to say. We may have our opinions and our views on this subject; the distinction is there. Is it that the latter is distinct and special because it is the source of wrongs in the past and the hope of things in the future? Is it that there is a hereafter in which "the State" is to be different from "the government of which William P. Kellogg is executive," or is it a mere difference in the way of stating the proposition?

Again, we find that in the one the term "to recognize" is used, "recognize in that State the existing State government;" in the other "to protect the government." The recognition of a State government implies pre-existence. It implies that there was a day and an hour in which there was a State government to recognize. The statement of protection implies tutelage, parentage, and care. The one indicates that there is a sovereign State, the other that there is a creature of paternal government. The one suggests that there is a State knocking at the doors of the Senate Chamber for admission here to her constitutional representation; the other suggests that Kellogg is simply the representative of a State government that is not the State. The whole question is begged in the difference between the resolutions. The one is recognition, the other paternal government and tutelage. Is this the doctrine of the majority in this Chamber? Is it the avowal of their doctrine that we are to tend toward paternal government in this country? If this be so, it is for us to meet that issue upon the threshold. We want no paternal government, but solely and simply the Government that the Constitution created; maintained and enforced, as it ought to be, by those who are placed in the places of power and trust under that Constitution.

If the power to recognize the State government or the State itself resides somewhere else than in the President, then the term "protect" is a very proper term. If it shall be found on a close analysis of the law, on an examination of the theory of our Government, that it resides not in the President but in Congress, then the term "protect" is a very proper and safe term. "Recognize" could not well be used by those who introduced this resolution if they hold the view I suggest. In the shadowy future that dawns upon us this distinction may be a difference important and vital, for there may be a State, there may be a government there that Louisiana and her people recognize that will differ from the government now controlled by William P. Kellogg, the present executive of the State of Louisiana. It may be that Mr. Kellogg, the executive of the State at the present time, who is to be protected and recognized under this resolution, may conduct this government beyond and through another election, and it may become important that William P. Kellogg thus being recognized and protected may maintain in the future some government that shall send here electoral votes, that shall send here Senators. Hence there seems to be a distinction with a difference.

In the first resolution the future is cared for; the President "should continue to recognize in that State the existing State government;" in the second resolution the future is abandoned, and it is not found within it. Why is this? What is the hidden purpose of this difference? To what ends and in what forum is this resolution to be pleaded? Are there possible dangers in the future? Does this condone the past, or is indemnity for the past regarded as immunity for the future; or does a ratification of the exercise of illegal power insure its repetition by the same mailed hand? Or is the logical result of its passage the admission of Pinchback as Senator from Louisiana who comes here representing the Kellogg government? If the latter be the reason, then we can understand and well understand why the admission of Pinchback has been postponed until December and why the resolution that is before us is submitted now for action. Why urge this resolution now if it be not to commit Senators to the logical sequence of that which the passage of this resolution necessarily implies? Can there be any answer?

In the first resolution there is no word as to the enforcement of the laws of the United States. The second resolution approves the enforcement of the laws of the United States in Louisiana. What laws of the United States have been infringed? Is it the midnight order of a Federal judge, or is it the effort of a Legislature to organize itself? Or is this, too, to be indemnity for the past, immunity for the future, or a plea in bar in behalf of the subordinates of the man who is indorsed by the resolution itself?

In the substitute, special pleading and astuteness appear; but what is it? It is brief, and terse, and distinct, and in its closing phrase it rings like an army order: the action of the Executive "is approved!" When before in this body were resolutions of this character proposed? "Is approved"—this closing phrase implies our power to approve it. Whence comes our power to do this? Treaties under the Constitution are required to be approved by two-thirds of this body; officials must be confirmed by this body; but where within the lines of the Constitution are found any words under which, by any construction expressed or implied, this resolution can be indorsed and sustained? Is it necessary under section 4 of article 4, which provides that—

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence?

There seems to be no necessity here for this resolution. I do not find any hidden meaning there that can be tortured to require such an approval. If it be really necessary, then there should be added to the close of this section: "and when this power shall be exercised by the President it shall be approved by the Senate." No such words are there.

What is the purpose of this resolution? We hear no answer from our friends on the other side. Those who introduce it give us no sign or token as to what the purpose of this resolution is. What is its breadth and scope? No gentleman rises in his seat and says what the purpose is or what its breadth is or what its scope is; all our friends are silent. Is it the resolution of a town meeting, as the Senator from Tennessee asked yesterday, or is it the resolution of a party convention, or is it of graver moment and deeper purpose? If of a party convention, if it be a resolution of the majority in this body, which is intended to cohere and crystallize their organization and to make the issue upon this question itself, I can understand its purpose, its scope, and its breadth. Is that the determined purpose of the majority in this body, to force the issue upon the indorsement of the acts of the President? If this be so, I can understand what the resolution means and appreciate the party necessity that prompts it.

Is it possible to vote that the President is right in supporting the Kellogg government and the Senate right in rejecting Pinchback? I commend this question to the Senators on the other side who have had some qualms of conscience in regard to the seating of the would-be Senator from Louisiana. Is the resolution a recognition of a de jure government, as contended for by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] or is it the recognition of a de facto government, as contended for by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] or does it cure the vice pointed out by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY,] or is it intended to cure the legal defects named by the Senator from Vermont, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, [Mr. EDMUNDS?] Is not the attitude of the President now material on this matter? These are questions for the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber. I simply propound them. We have no answer. We are allowed to grope in the dark as to what the purpose of the resolution is, for Senators decline to enlighten us.

But what propriety is there in the Senate of the United States prejudging any case? No judge upon the bench will discuss with you the merits of a case that may even possibly come before him. Are we not in the attitude of judges in this body upon the acts of those who administer the laws? And yet by this action we will approve, in the teeth of the provisions of the Constitution, the acts of an official which acts we may be required to pass upon as judges and which by the Constitution itself we are not required to approve. Our action will be mere outside indorsement and have nothing whatever to do with the case, but it does serve to prejudge the case from our standpoint as Senators and possible judges.

Mr. President, I cannot hope to present anything new upon the issue involved in this resolution. I should much have preferred to remain a silent listener of the debates that have occurred in this Chamber since I came here and took my place upon this floor. But it has seemed when all others representing States upon this floor who came to this body on the 4th of March had spoken in behalf of their constituents that I, who represent the second State in point of population in the Union, would have failed in my duty to its people if I had not endeavored to present this question from their standpoint, if possible in a new form; and while I cannot hope to add anything new to what has been said on a subject so often and so ably discussed in the Senate, yet if I shall be able in what I say to arouse the attention of a single mind within the Commonwealth I have the honor in part to represent or anywhere else within the broad expanse of this Republic to the grievous departures from the great doctrines of civil liberty that lie at the very base of our institutions which are now almost daily made; if I shall cause but a single mind to hesitate and pause to investigate the real importance of those questions, I shall have accomplished all that I can hope to accomplish.

What is it that this brief, terse, and ringing army order asks the American Senate and the American people to approve? What is it?

First, the recognition by the President of the United States of one of two State governments in Louisiana when the power to do so resides solely in Congress.

Second, the use of troops in Louisiana without authority of law.

Third, blind obedience to or complicity with a void order made at midnight by a Federal judge.

Fourth, denial of the right of petition.

Fifth, armed interference by the Federal power with the right of a State Legislature to judge of the elections of its own members and to perfect its own organization.

Sixth, the maintenance of a government of force and fraud and a continuance of the rule of the sword over a people competent and anxious to govern themselves.

First, the recognition by the President of one of two State governments in Louisiana when the power so to do resides solely in Congress. On the 12th of December, 1872, there were two governments in Louisiana, each claiming to be the rightful one. The one was represented by John McEnery; the other by P. B. S. Pinchback. Of the one, it has been again and again said upon this floor and declared by every committee that has made a report to this body or to the House of Representatives that it was a government of force and fraud. Of the other it has been said by a committee of the House of Representatives as well as by a Senate committee that it was the rightful government of the State of Louisiana. There was no violence, no insurrection in the State of Louisiana on the 12th of December, 1872, and yet the President recognized and protected the government at the head of which was P. B. S. Pinchback without authority of law, without authority of the Constitution.

Under the provisions of section 4, article 4, of the Constitution it has been expressly ruled that "Congress alone can decide what government is the established one in a State;" and for this I refer to the case of Luther vs. Borden, 7 Howard. While this is true, I concede that under the act of 1795 it is equally the duty of the President, when there is insurrection within a State or domestic violence there, to recognize one or the other of the existing governments, as such, in order that he may efficiently aid the State under a call made under the provisions of the Constitution. Yet, as I shall prove in a few moments, I trust, on the 12th of December, 1872, there being neither insurrection nor domestic violence in the State of Louisiana, the President authorized this telegram to be sent:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 12, 1872.

Acting Governor PINCHBACK,
New Orleans, Louisiana:

Let it be understood that you are recognized by the President as the lawful executive of Louisiana, and that the body assembled at Mechanics' Institute is the lawful Legislature of the State, and it is suggested that you make proclamation to that effect, and also that all necessary assistance will be given to you and the Legislature herein recognized to protect the State from disorder and violence.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

Enough of this. My second proposition is that troops were used in Louisiana without authority of law; the President used them when there was neither domestic violence nor insurrection. The resolutions of the Lousiana Pinchback legislature are under date of 9th of December, 1872, and are in these words:

[Telegram.]

NEW ORLEANS, December 9, 1872.

We have the honor to transmit to your excellency the following concurrent resolution of both houses of the General Assembly and to request an early reply:

"Whereas the General Assembly is now convened, in compliance with the call of the governor, and certain evil-disposed persons are reported to be forming combinations to disturb the public peace, defy the lawful authority, and the State is threatened with violence: Therefore,

"Be it resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Louisiana in General Assembly convened, That the President of the United States be requested to afford the protection guaranteed each State by the Constitution of the United States when threatened with domestic violence, and that the presiding officers of the General Assembly transmit this resolution immediately, by telegraph or otherwise, to the President of the United States.

"Adopted in General Assembly convened this 9th day of December, A. D. 1872."

P. B. S. PINCHBACK,
Lieutenant-Governor, and President of the Senate.
CHAS. W. LOWELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

"When threatened with domestic violence." There is no such word within the lids of the book. Its language is, "Shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature, or the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence;" not "against threatened domestic violence." First there is the civil power, the great power of the law; next the posse comitatus of the State, under the control of the governor and the magistracy and those whose sworn duty it is to administer the law; and all of these must be exhausted before an application can legally be made to the President of the United States for troops. But here the resolution of the State Legislature itself declares that there is "threatened" violence and "reported" insurrection! We find also on looking back to the condition of affairs in New Orleans on that very day what the actual condition of things was. S. B. Packard,

United States marshal, in a dispatch dated the 9th of December, says:

NEW ORLEANS, December 9, 1872.

Hon. GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General United States:

General Assembly returned by legal board is now organized at State-house. Senate has present twenty republicans, eight democrats; house fifty republicans, and fourteen democrats; about half Warmoth's members participating. State supreme court has sent Elmore, Warmoth's usurping judge of the eighth district court, to jail ten days for contempt, and his clerk five days, and fifty dollars each. All quiet.

S. B. PACKARD,
United States Marshal.

Bear in mind that is under date of the 9th of December. Then too on the same day, December 9, "P. B. S. Pinchback, lieutenant-governor, acting governor of Louisiana," telegraphs the President as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, December 9, 1872.

President GRANT:

Having taken the oath of office and being in the possession of the gubernatorial office, it devolves upon me to urge the necessity of a favorable consideration of the request of the General Assembly as conveyed in the concurrent resolution of this day telegraphed to you requesting the protection of the United States Government. Be pleased to send the necessary orders to General Emory. This seems to me a necessary measure of precaution although all is quiet here.

P. B. S. PINCHBACK,
Lieutenant-Governor, Acting Governor of Louisiana.

Here we have Packard, the marshal, and Pinchback, the acting governor, who on that day demands troops, both of them telegraphing the President "all is quiet here." Then on the 11th, two days following, Casey, the collector, telegraphs the President and gives the situation. Does he say that there is domestic violence or armed insurrection? No, but the contrary; let me read his dispatch:

NEW ORLEANS, December 11, 1872.

President GRANT:

Parties interested in the success of democratic party, particularly the New Orleans Times, are making desperate efforts to array the people against us. Old citizens are dragooned into an opposition they do not feel, and pressure is hourly growing; our members are poor and adversaries are rich, and offers are made that are difficult for them to withstand. There is danger that they will break our quorum. The delay in placing troops at disposal of Governor Pinchback, in accordance with joint resolution of Monday, is disheartening our friends and cheering our enemies. If requisition of Legislature is complied with, all difficulty will be dissipated, the party saved, and everything go on smoothly. If this is done, the tide will be turned at once in our favor. The real underlying sentiment is with us, if it can but be encouraged. Governor Pinchback acting with great discretion, as is the Legislature, and they will so continue.

JAS. F. CASEY,
Collector.

On the following day, the 12th of December, Pinchback telegraphs to the President:

NEW ORLEANS, December 12, 1872.

President U. S. GRANT:

In view of the fact that H. C. Warmo th, assuming to act as governor after having been impeached and suspended from his office of governor in strict compliance with the constitution and laws of this State, has issued a proclamation declaring himself as still governor of the State, and has assumed to convene an illegal body of men styling themselves a Legislature, thus endangering the public peace and tranquillity and threatening domestic violence, I respectfully request that the commanding officer of this department be instructed, in compliance with the requisition of the Legislature, to aid and assist me in maintaining the public peace and protecting and sustaining the legal State government.

P. B. S. PINCHBACK,
Acting Governor of Louisiana.

That is on the 12th, three days after the demand of the Legislature, and still it is but a threat, still it is but a proclamation, still it is but the effort of Warmoth. Where are the armed troops? Where is the armed insurrection or the domestic violence against which the mailed hand of the President is to be raised? It is not to be found in these dispatches; and yet upon that very day the President telegraphs a recognition of the executive, Pinchback, and of the Legislature under his control, and guarantees to him troops.

Now, sir, as bearing on this question let us contrast the action of a President of the United States thirty-six years ago with the action of the President of to-day, and let us see, if we can, whither we are tending and how this question of protecting the rights of the people of this country according to the doctrines of civil liberty, is being turned to their injury and the deprivation of their most valued privileges. Let us see whether this is the normal or abnormal condition of this people. Let us learn, if we can, whether precedents are not being piled upon precedents that are sui generis but ought not to be used against this people, to take from them the great rights that are guaranteed to them under the Constitution of the United States and that came to them from the country from which they draw their laws and their liberties. Hear now what in the State that I have the honor to represent was said by the governor thereof at a memorable crisis in that State in regard to the condition of things there. This is under date of December 7, 1838:

SIR: It is my exceedingly unpleasant duty officially to inform you that such a state of domestic violence exists at this place as has put an end for the present to all the exercise of the regular functions of the State government. The senate of the State has been compelled by intimidation to break up in confusion. The duly appointed presiding officer of the house of representatives was prevented from calling the house to order at the hour to which it stood adjourned and was ejected from the hall by violence. The State department is closed, and I have not deemed it safe or prudent to proceed to the executive chamber since the first disturbance, which took place on the 4th instant.

* * * * * * *

JOS. RITNER.

To his Excellency MARTIN VAN BUREN,
President of the United States.

And under date of the 4th of December previous to that we find this proclamation of the governor of Pennsylvania:

Whereas a lawless, infuriated, armed mob from the counties of Philadelphia, Lancaster, Adams, and other places, have assembled at the seat of government, with the avowed object of disturbing, interrupting, and overawing the Legislature of this Commonwealth, and of preventing its proper organization and the peaceable and free discharge of its duties; and whereas the said mob have already on this day entered the senate chamber and in an outrageous and violent manner by clamoring, shouting, and threatening violence and death to some of the members of that body and other officers of the government, and finally by rushing within the bar of the senate chamber in defiance of every effort to restrain them, compelled the Senate to suspend business.

Here is the proclamation and the demand on the Federal Executive. Now I will ask the Clerk to read the answer authorized by the President of the United States, as marked in the book which I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 11, 1838.

SIR: The letter addressed by your excellency to the President of the United States, under date of the 7th instant, was received yesterday and referred to this Department, where it has received that respectful and earnest consideration to which the high source whence it emanates and the importance of the subject entitle it.

In this communication your excellency informs the President that such a state of domestic violence exists at Harrisburgh as to put an end, for the present, to all the exercise of the regular functions of the State government, and renders it your duty to request the President, in accordance with the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States, to take measures to protect the State of Pennsylvania against the effects of the domestic violence which your excellency affirms to be then in existence.

The clause of the Constitution to which your excellency refers, and the act passed in pursuance thereof, authorize the President to call out the militia only on the application of the Legislature of a State, or of the executive of a State, when the Legislature cannot be convened. The nature of the President's duty being, therefore, discretionary, it is incumbent upon him to exercise the utmost care in examining into all the circumstances of the case, as well as to determine whether the occasion contemplated by the law has occurred.

The commotion which now threatens the peace of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania does not appear to arise from any opposition to the laws; but grows out of a political contest between different members of the government, most, if not all of them, admitted to be the legal representatives of the people constitutionally elected, about their relative rights; and especially in reference to the organization of the popular branch of the Legislature. To interfere in any commotion growing out of a controversy of so grave and delicate a character, by the Federal authority, armed with the military power of the Government, would be attended with the most dangerous consequences to our republican institutions. In the opinion of the President, his interference in any political commotion in a State could only be justified by the application for it being clearly within the meaning of the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution, and of the act of Congress passed in pursuance thereof, and where the domestic violence brought to his notice is of such a character that the State authorities, civil and military, after having been duly called upon, have proved inadequate to suppress it.

* * * * * * *

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

J. R. POINSETT.

His Excellency JOSEPH RITNER,
Governor of Pennsylvania, Harrisburgh, Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, it will be noted that in the one case, that which occurred in 1838, armed violence had ejected the officers of the senate and of the house of a State Legislature from the halls of legislation. They were absolutely driven from the halls. The governor had issued a proclamation that domestic violence of the gravest character existed and that he could not suppress the insurrection there, and hence he made application to the President of the United States for assistance; who after consideration of the whole subject declined to furnish to him the troops of the United States because the power of the Commonwealth had not been exhausted, because the strong arm of the civil power that can command at will the assistance of the militia had not been invoked, and had not been used to its utmost extent. But in Louisiana in 1872, when there was no insurrection, when all was quiet, as both Packard and Pinchback telegraphed, when the whole question was one of "threatened" or "reported" insurrection, the President immediately telegraphs orders recognizing the control of the government of Louisiana in P. B. S. Pinchback and the Legislature assembled at Mechanics' Institute to be the rightful one.

The point I make here is, that, if there was neither domestic violence nor insurrection, then Congress alone can recognize the existing government in a State, and the President's recognition is without authority of law. It is only in the cases named in the act of 1795, the existence of domestic violence or of a condition of insurrection, in which his hand is to be intruded and he from the very necessity of the case is authorized to recognize the one or the other. Here in the law-making power, here among the representatives of the States and the people, this question of whether a State government is in existence or is not in existence is to be settled and determined. Determined how? Under the Constitution and the laws, by the precedents that the wisdom of the past has established and that are maintained and affirmed by all who believe in the form of government under which we live. The Constitution and the laws and the precedents that they warrant and sustain are our charts and guides, and not those that are sui generis and abnormal.

Third. Blind obedience to or complicity with a void order made at midnight by a Federal judge. It is not denied that this decree was an infamous decree. No Senator raises his voice in behalf of the order that this Federal judge made—made at midnight in a case in which he had no jurisdiction. It cannot be defended. The infamy of this order has not been excelled since the star chamber made its infamous decrees or Jeffreys took liberty and life from the people of England. It was a void order made in a case in which there was no jurisdiction, at midnight, and to support and enforce it came the whole power of the Government of the United States, civil and military. And yet there has been no infringement of the Constitution, no breaking down of the laws of the Republic, no destruction of precedents! And we are asked here to blindly vote to indorse the action of the President in permitting—I will not say creating but in permitting—the destruction of the very essence of the doctrines that lie at the base of the institutions under which we live, the essential, the vital doctrines of a government of law and of civil liberty.

This decree was made on the 5th day of December, 1872. On the 3d day of December, 1872, the following telegram was sent by the Attorney-General to S. B. Packard, United States marshal:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 3, 1872.

S. B. PACKARD, Esq.,
United States Marshal, New Orleans, Louisiana:

You are to enforce the decrees and mandates of the United States courts no matter by whom resisted, and General Emory will furnish you with all necessary troops for that purpose.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

Forty-eight hours before the midnight decree was made the Department of Justice directs the enforcement of the decrees and mandates of the United States courts, which are to make a decree, as is shown by the subsequent action there. Forty-eight hours in advance power is given to use the whole of the military force of the United States in the State of Louisiana to enforce the mandates and decrees of the United States court there. On the 5th of December, at midnight, or about eleven o'clock, as the testimony is, the order was made by Durell for the seizure of the State-house. On the 6th of December, at two o'clock in the morning, or within three hours after the making of this void decree, the State-house was garrisoned by United States troops—the troops of the United States, not the civil power of Louisiana and the posse comitatus that accompanied it, but the troops of the United States—under the order that was made but three hours before; and for six weeks they garrisoned and held the State-house of Louisiana. On the 6th of December from the same infamous court comes the injunction and the mandamus to organize the Legislature. This injunction and this decree, void and infamous as it was, subverted the real government of Louisiana. Up to this hour there were two governments there, the one the government of the people, not the government of force and fraud, but the government of McEnery, the rightful government of the State of Louisiana. Up to that hour, in which the void decree of a Federal judge was promulgated and enforced by Federal bayonets, there were two governments in the State of Louisiana, one a rightful one and the other a government of fraud, but after the promulgation of that decree the rightful one was subverted and there comes into power the government of both force and fraud. Born of a midnight decree of a Federal judge, its natal place surrounded by Federal bayonets placed there by the orders of the Attorney-General, we have its necessary results. As a matter of course the Attorney-General did not alone perform this strange work, for the Department of Justice does not generally order troops of the United States to act as it pleases without other authority. This decree subverted the government of Louisiana. Upon this subject I read briefly from the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of this body, made by the late Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. Carpenter) and his colleagues, the majority of the committee:

Third. But for the interference of Judge Durell in the matter of this State election, a matter wholly beyond his jurisdiction, the McEnery government would to-day have been the de facto government of the State. Judge Durell interposed the Army of the United States between the people of Louisiana and the only government which has the semblance of regularity, and the result of this has been to establish the Kellogg government, so far as that State now has any government. For the United States to interfere in a State election, and, by the employment of troops, set up a governor and Legislature without a shadow of right, and then to refuse redress of the wrong upon the ground that to grant relief would be interfering with the rights of the State, is a proposition difficult to utter with a grave countenance.

And then the committee, on page 44, say:

It is the opinion of your committee that but for the unjustifiable interference of Judge Durell, whose orders were executed by United States troops, the canvass made by the De Feriet board, and promulgated by the governor, declaring McEnery to have been elected governor, &c., and also declaring who had been elected to the Legislature, would have been acquiesced in by the people, and that government would have entered quietly upon the exercise of the sovereign power of the State. But the proceedings of Judge Durell, and the support given to him by United States troops, resulted in establishing the authority de facto of Kellogg and his associates in State offices, and of the persons declared by the Lynch board to be elected to the Legislature. We have already seen that the proceedings of that board cannot be sustained without disregarding all the principles of law applicable to the subject, and ignoring the distinction between good faith and fraud.

So, too, the minority of that committee, of which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] was a part, reported in these words:

The conduct of Judge Durell, sitting in the circuit court of the United States, cannot be justified or defended. He grossly exceeded his jurisdiction, and assumed the exercise of powers to which he could lay no claim. * * * His order issued in the Kellogg case to the United States marshal to take possession of the State-house for the purpose of preventing unlawful assemblages, under which the marshal called to his aid a portion of the Army of the United States as a posse comitatus, can only be characterized as a gross usurpation.

Thus am I sustained by the majority of the committee and the minority of the committee, all representatives of the other side of this Chamber, in my accusation that this was a void order and that the McEnery government was the rightful government and was supplanted by the void order of Judge Durell, enforced by Federal bayonets. Durell has been condemned and driven from office; he is no longer there in control of the administration of the law; and yet the Senate of the United States and the American people are asked to indorse the power that invited, sustained, and enforced this breach of the law. Am I not justified, am I not warranted in the proposition I make, that this is an indorsement of blind obedience to or complicity with a void order made at midnight by a Federal judge?

Fourth, denial of the right of petition. This may seem to be a trifling matter. Trifling though it is, it is one of those essential matters which were put into the amendments to the Constitution of the United States as a vital and important right, and it is found in the first article of the amendments:

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Who is "the government" that is to be petitioned? Congress, when the subject-matter relates to the action of Congress; the judiciary, when the subject-matter relates to the control of the judiciary; the President of the United States, when the matter relates to a subject upon which he is authorized to act. This is "the government" for by this construction only can we find what "the government" means. When the subject is to be acted upon by Congress, we petition Congress for redress of grievances. If it is controlled by the judiciary, we petition the judiciary. When it is the President that has the right to act or assumes to act, we petition the President. In this case the Executive claimed the right to act and did act. On the 12th of December, 1872, Thomas A. Adams, chairman of a committee of citizens upon the authority of a mass meeting then recently held in New Orleans, telegraphed to the President:

NEW ORLEANS, December 12, 1872.

SIR: As chairman of a committee of citizens appointed under authority of a mass meeting recently held in this city, I am instructed to inform you that said committee is about leaving here for Washington to lay before you and the Congress of the United States the facts of the political difficulties at present existing in this State, and further earnestly to request you to delay executive action in the premises until after the arrival and hearing of said committee, which is composed of business and professional men without regard to past political affiliations.

THOMAS A. ADAMS,
Chairman.

His Excellency U. S. GRANT,
President of the United States.

John McEnery on the same day telegraphed:

NEW ORLEANS, December 12, 1872.

His Excellency U. S. GRANT,
President United States:

Claiming to be governor-elect of this State, I beg you, in the name of all justice, to suspend recognition of either of the dual governments now in operation here until there can be laid before you all facts, and both sides, touching legitimacy of either government. The people denying the legitimacy of Pinchback government and its Legislature simply ask to be heard through committee of many of our best citizens on eve of departure for Washington, before you recognize the one or the other of said governments. I do not believe we will be condemned before we are fully heard.

JNO. McENERY.

And the memorial of one hundred citizens of the State of Louisiana was forwarded and is found in the report of these proceedings, dated the 13th of December. Here was a petition, a prayer to be heard; and yet on that very day, the 13th of December, the Department of Justice telegraphed to John McEnery as follows:

Hon. JOHN McENERY,
New Orleans, Louisiana:

Your visit with a hundred citizens will be unavailing so far as the President is concerned. His decision is made and will not be changed, and the sooner it is acquiesced in the sooner good order and peace will be restored.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

Here was a refusal to hear. Here was a telegram from the petitioners couched in decorous language; here was a condition of things in that State in which the right of petition was one of the dearest rights to that people. They come with decorous language and lay their petition at the feet of him who has power to act and who does act, and yet superciliousness and absolute denial come to this petition of these citizens almost immediately upon the announcement that they ask a hearing of their petition, and they are denied the right to be heard; and they are turned away. No government under heaven, not even the most despotic government that exists either in Europe or in Asia, has ever denied the right of petition. It is a constitutional right; it is a primitive, a natural right. It is a right which is the result of free speech and deliberation. It belongs to us as freemen and citizens who live in a government of civil liberty and of law. The creature may petition the Creator and it is the medium of advancing Christianity. It gives information of rights and of wrongs; and it is a safety-valve that in a government of law may very frequently, while the petition be not granted, be made to be a means of escape for manifold evils. And yet, sir, he who occupies the place that John Quincy Adams occupied, who in his day was almost a martyr to his demand for the right of petition in the other branch of Congress, directs his subordinates to reply with supercilious denial. He refuses to hear their prayer, the modest petition of one hundred citizens headed by an executive. The rightful governor of the Commonwealth of Louisiana, who lowly bends his neck and asks to be heard, is denied the right the Constitution gives us all and a supercilious subordinate tells him his petition will be unavailing and the sooner he bows to the inevitable the better!

Fifth. Armed interference by the Federal power with the right of a State Legislature to judge of the qualifications of its own members and to perfect its own organization. This right is one scarcely to be denied. It has never been successfully controverted in any place, and I think it will be scarcely denied by any one on this floor. The Senator from Indiana in his report on this subject to the Senate of the United States holds the language which I will read. This report was made on the 20th of February, 1873. It is found on page 71 of the report:

This principle that each house has the exclusive jurisdiction over all questions touching the election and qualification of its members, and is to determine for itself whether a lawful quorum is present to do business, is so well established that it has been holden by the courts in all the States in which the question has arisen, as well as by the Supreme Court of the United States, that the validity of a statute cannot be impeached by a plea that members took part in its enactment who were not lawfully elected, or that it was passed in the absence of a lawful quorum, or that its enactment was procured by bribery, or attended by other gross irregularity

It is a vital and essential right. It is not denied by any one. It enters into the constitution of every State in the Republic. It comes to us from the parliamentary law of Great Britain. It is in the Constitution of the United States. It is essential to the independence of the legislative branch of each of these governments that this right should exist; that it should exist sole, independent, and sovereign, and that it should not be interfered with by the judiciary, or by the Executive, or by any branch of the Federal Government. If the President can interfere at all, he is able to interfere with and control this right at any time, in any place, and under any circumstances.

On this subject I read from the report of the House committee, as follows:

We hold, therefore, that in November, 1874, the people of the State of Louisiana did fairly have a free, peaceable, and full registration and election, in which a clear conservative majority was elected to the lower house of the Legislature, of which majority the conservatives were deprived by the unjust, illegal, and arbitrary action of the returning board.

To the resolution reported to the House from the committee, as to the action of the returning board, we are all agreed.

We understand the committee to be unanimous in finding the fact that the action of the returning board has defeated the will of the people as expressed by them at the polls on the 3d of November, 1874. The people then elected to the lower house of their Legislature a majority of conservative members; a portion of the conservative members thus elected were refused their certificates. This is an act of great injustice to the individuals, of gravest danger to the State and free government, and ought to be immediately corrected by any power competent to correct it.

Yet the Legislature being organized, with this clear right and plain duty, going on with its business, armed soldiers intervened on the 4th of January, 1875, and dispersed them. The President says he knew nothing of it prior to this occurrence. Let us see. In the message of the President to this body on the 13th of January, 1875, he says:

Respecting the alleged interference by the military with the organization of the Legislature of Louisiana on the 4th instant, I have no knowledge or information which has not been received by me since that time and published. My first information was from the papers of the morning of the 5th of January. I did not know that any such thing was anticipated, and no orders nor suggestions were ever given to any military officer in that State upon that subject prior to the occurrence.

But under date of the 15th of December, 1874, we find this dispatch:

[Cipher telegram.]

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, December 15, 1874.
(Received December 16.)

TO ADJUTANT-GENERAL UNITED STATES ARMY:

The returning board and people representing opposing party differ on vital questions. Each avers against the other crime of such enormity that in the present excited state of the public mind violence is imminent. On the occasion of the 14th of September I was informed, in a dispatch dated 15th September, that the President directed you to say previous orders are not to be observed; in consequence of which my order to Colonel Brooke to recognize Governor Kellogg was revoked, and an interregnum intervened. To avoid future misunderstanding in the impending disturbance, which may happen at any moment or may not occur until after the meeting of the Legislature in January, I ask to be informed if the instructions contained in your dispatch of September 18 are to be considered in force, or if I am to await the result of another application from Governor Kellogg to the President?

W. H. EMORY,
Colonel and Brevet Major-General, Commanding.

On the day on which that was received we find this dispatch:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, December 16, 1874.

Colonel W. H. EMORY,
Commanding Department Gulf, New Orleans, La.:

The President directs that you make arrangements to be in readiness to suppress violence, and have it understood that you will do it.

Please acknowledge receipt.

By order of the Secretary of War.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

Now, either on the 15th of December, 1874, the President did know of the existence of anticipated trouble in regard to the meeting of the Legislature and that orders had been sent to the troops to hold themselves in readiness in view of such difficulty, or the subordinates of the President kept him willfully and falsely in the dark. But again the President says:

I repeat that the task assumed by the troops is not a pleasant one to them; that the Army is not composed of lawyers capable of judging at a moment's notice of just how far they can go in the maintenance of law and order, and that it was impossible to give specific instructions providing for all possible contingencies that might arise.

"Ignorance of the law excuse thno one." Subaltern and Lieutenant-General, soldier and President, are alike bound by the fiat of the law that controls, regulates, and governs this country, and when they, whether in the highest or lowest place in this Republic, shall deny the order and command of the law; when they, whether they have epaulets upon them or have simply the warrant of a magistrate in their hands, shall not be amenable to the power and the control of the law, it will be a sorry day for this country. In a government of law no man can take the liberty or the life of his fellow-citizen in his hand; and, so long as it can be, the civil power must be held to be superior to the military power. In the exercise of these grave rights, technicalities become substance, forms become grave reality. The military are the mere agents of the civil power and cannot act, and dare not act, save under the order and control of the civil power. When they do, they act at their peril. When they do, they put themselves in jeopardy. When they do, they are liable to punishment, and the individual who is aggrieved can recover his damages from them. These are part of the liberties that came to us with the form of government we have. All who are vested with military power who assume original authority become offenders liable to the laws and liable to the citizen injured. More than two centures ago the Count de Lancaster, taken in open insurrection, was condemned to death by martial law. When it came to be determined in the courts what this was, the courts held that it was murder, for the courts were open; and although he was in open insurrection he was amenable to the law and could have been made liable there and punished for his crime. So, too, Senators will remember the case of Governor Wall in one of the West India islands, who under the authority of a military commission caused a soldier to be flogged until he died and twenty years afterward, having returned to England, he was arrested and tried for murder, and the single question tried there was, had the military control of the question or had they no jurisdiction, and this single point being determined in the negative, that the military power had no control over the question, Governor Wall was convicted of murder and executed.

Can the laws go further? Yet these are our laws. We may fail to find these in the written forms of government we have, but that branch of the Government that sits in another portion of this building, in Ex parte Milligan, ruled that these rights do not rest on written constitution, but have come to us as part of the liberties of the people, have descended to us as our rights, our inherent rights, and all the people are entitled to them, and whether the armed hand or the warrant of the officer attempts to take them away from us he is liable to the punishment that the law metes to the crime of which he has been guilty.

The Constitution provides that the President "shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed;" yet here is a palliation, an attempted palliation, of the act of the soldiery, an attempted excuse of the destruction of one of the gravest rights of the citizen. I need not refer to the trip of the Lieutenant-General South. I need not refer to what has occurred there since. It seems unnecessary that I should. It seems to me the proposition that I started out with is abundantly proved by the facts in the case, and I do affirm that since the days of Cromwell and his twelve major-generals, when he parceled the kingdom to each of them as a province, and there under alleged form of laws gave to each of those major-generals the power of life and death, of judgment and execution, no graver offense against civil liberty or law has ever occurred.

Sixth. The maintenance of a government of force and fraud and the continuance of the rule of the sword over a people competent and anxious to govern themselves. This proposition covers and embraces all the rest. For well-nigh a decade the foot of no armed foe has pressed upon the soil of the Republic; for nearly ten years no hostile drum-beat has been heard within all our borders; and yet the Federal bayonet in a large portion of the Republic suppresses the arts of peace and the people are prevented from attending to their domestic affairs. Ten years have passed. The Constitution and the laws ought to be in full force over every portion of the Republic; and yet the Federal bayonet controls and regulates as much of the Republic as was embraced within the original thirteen States. The industries of that portion of the Republic are paralyzed, taxation is doubled, productions are decreasing, their taxable values are lessened, their levees are unrepaired, and their lands are untilled. The breaking down of a levee permits the waters of the great Mississippi to pour upon the fertile soil that there lies and threatens ruin to the people, and there is no repairing it. The right of the people to take care of their own interests is denied them by the character of the government that exists there. The business of the people North is prostrated by the condition of the country South, and this is the vital and essential point to my constituents and from my stand-point as their representative in this whole question.

Sir, forms of law and written guarantees and reserved rights become vitalized, they become mighty, mighty agencies when they are infringed, and their infringement brings to the whole people financial distress. In one section of the Republic you may find the laws violated and a condition of wrong and outrage pervading, and yet this does not sweep over the whole Republic and bring the whole of the people within the influence of the wrong; but when you deprive the whole people of rights, when the infringement of grave constitutional rights brings into actual jeopardy, nay, into almost utter destruction, the financial interests of the people in other sections of the Republic, you find them looming up, you find these great rights and guarantees confronting you and the people proclaiming, "Let the law be obeyed; the Constitution is supreme; give us a condition of affairs under the laws and the Constitution, as well North as South, that will bring back to us peace and prosperity and financial success." The loss of a market has destroyed the business of the North. You are building a wall around the southern portion of this Republic; you are decreasing its capacity; its soil is untilled; its crops are lessened; its productions are decreased; taxation is increased; the people are in a condition of uncertainty; change and the fear of change is upon them; they cannot apply themselves to the production of the great staples of the Republic. They cannot go on as you and I in our section of the Republic may go on to give attention to our private affairs.

Sir, go to my own great State, the State that I have the honor to represent on this floor, and there you will find our coal, our iron, our oil, and our lumber lying in piles at the furnace, at the pit's mouth, or the oil at the tank, or the lumber at the mill. Artisans are unemployed; their families are starving; they seek employment; they ask to have from the men that have capital invested, support, daily support, daily toil, means to keep their children from starving. It is denied to them because the business interests and the business men of that portion of the Republic are prostrated. Prostrated why? Because their market is lost, because they can no longer sell their productions in the country in which they have been wont heretofore to sell them. Stimulated industries on the one hand in the North and a contracted market in the other section have brought this condition of affairs to the North. The pick and the drill of the miner lie idle at the mouth of the drift, the fire of the puddler is quenched, and the ax of the lumberman lies still at the foot of the tree. The hum of busy industry by the Lehigh and Schuylkill is no longer heard, and the spindle and the loom and the shuttle are no longer producing to make taxable values and wealth for the people. Artisans are thrown out of employment; the business interests of the people are suffering; there is no longer the market we had in the past; and they come to you by me and they assert to you that there is an abiding conviction there that this is largely due to the prostration of the business interests and the productions of the South; they come to you with the declaration that their interests are prostrated because you have deprived them of their market. The business interests of every section of the country are interwoven; strike one and you strike all; relieve one and you relieve all.

Financial difficulties and troubles that come from different sources are made to bear their share in this great and grave result; but the abiding conviction is settling down upon the people, at least in the section I represent, that the use of the Federal bayonet and the deprivation of the right to govern themselves to the people of the South is the grave and leading cause for this condition of things. They come to you and ask you to take away the Federal bayonet and allow the people to govern themselves, cease the effort to rule from above and replace it with the rule from beneath. Let the people do as they do with us in the North. We govern ourselves in our townships, control our road affairs, regulate our school matters, see that the man who is most competent is allowed to control the domestic concerns in the township—that form of Saxon civilization that came to us from those from whom we got our laws. Give them in the South the rule from beneath and not from above, and you will find that the men who can take care of their individual affairs and of their affairs in the township can control and regulate the affairs that grow out of those and that are the ruling and the controlling powers of the State. Cease the effort to rule from above and let us rule from beneath. Give these people the power and the opportunity to grow rich. In doing this you grow your great staple, you increase your resources and you reinvigorate the whole. Take away the Federal bayonet, replace it with the government of the people themselves; enforce the laws that you have; let all the rights of all the people in the South be protected under the guarantees of the laws that you have, but take away the Federal bayonet from the throat of the people of the South, and in restoring their industries, in making them wealthy, you bring back taxable values, you bring back property and business and prosperity to all the people of the North.

Is this the issue made up by this resolution? Is it the President and the bayonet against self-government and the law? Is it the President and the bayonet against local government and the law? Is this the issue that this resolution makes up; or is it simply that the logical result of its adoption shall be that Mr. Pinchback shall have his seat when we meet next December? If this resolution, however, means anything, it is an indorsement of a fatal policy, a policy that is destructive of civil liberty, that reverses our traditions, violates the organic law, perpetuates a government of fraud, decreases our revenues, and prostrates the business interests of the people. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, on the 5th instant the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] introduced a resolution in these words:

Resolved by the Senate, That the State government now existing in the State of Louisiana, and represented by William P. Kellogg as governor, is the lawful government of said State; that it is republican in form; and that every assistance necessary to sustain its proper and lawful authority in said State should be given by the United States, when properly called upon for that purpose, to the end that the laws may be faithfully and promptly executed, life and property protected and defended, and all violators of law, State or national, brought to speedy punishment for their crimes.

However erroneous this resolution may be in its propositions, it has at least these merits: that it is courageous, clear, unambiguous, and apparently offered for a wise and proper purpose. There is nothing of flattery in it. There is nothing of sycophancy in it. There is no allusion in it to the action of any official, high or low. But the reasons for offering it are stated to be "to the end that the laws may be faithfully and promptly executed, life and property protected and defended, and all violators of law, State or national, brought to speedy punishment for their crimes."

Grave and excellent reasons are here given, if such necessity exists, for action on our part, if we have the power to act; and therefore I say that this resolution of the Senator from Indiana, clear, distinct, precise, unambiguous, founded upon an assumption of reasons that commend themselves to every man's mind and heart, was entitled to the gravest consideration of the Senate.

What has been its fate? Why has it not been considered? It is not given to us on this side of the Chamber to know. We only know that it has slept the sleep of death upon the table of our clerk. We only know that never in this Chamber has it been called up for a moment's consideration. We only know that if it has received consideration at all, it has been by an assemblage of men unknown to the Constitution, sitting not in the Senate Chamber of the country, but in the secret recesses of a party caucus. There may have been reasons given there why this resolution should not be even considered. There may have been reasons given there sufficient to the members of that assemblage why this resolution should not be even taken from the table for a moment; but, so far as the people know, so far as the Senators who were not admitted into that secret caucus are informed, they are wholly ignorant of the reasons that prevented the consideration of this resolution.

But, sir, we get a little light upon it, notwithstanding this secret consideration, by what subsequently took place. On the 16th instant, eleven days after the resolution of the Senator from Indiana was offered, the Senator from New Jersey on the other side of the Chamber [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] offered this resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate approve the action heretofore taken by the President of the United States in protecting Louisiana from domestic violence, and are of opinion that he should continue to recognize in that State the existing State government.

Mark what a change this is. The chief object of this resolution seems to be to approve the conduct of the President. It seems to assume that the President needs vindication. It seems to assume that the President is under a cloud and that cloud must be removed. It seems to assume that there is some reason for finding fault with the Executive, that the country is not satisfied with his action on the Louisiana question, and that therefore the Senate must come to his aid, dispel this cloud, wipe away this discontent, remove it from the minds of the people, and give the President a full, a free, and a perfect absolution. That looks like the animus and spirit of the resolution offered by the Senator from New Jersey. Contrast it with the sturdy language of the resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana. What does the Senator from Indiana say about this Kellogg government in Louisiana? He says:

That the State government now existing in the State of Louisiana, and represented by William P. Kellogg as governor, is the lawful—the lawful government of said State.

No quibbling, no hesitating, no dodging, no talk about de facto in any sense of the term, nothing of that kind, but marching fairly and squarely up to the question the Senator from Indiana declares that the government of which William P. Kellogg is the executive is "the lawful government of the State of Louisiana." There is nothing of that in this smooth resolution of the Senator from New Jersey. On the contrary, he says simply that the Senate are of the opinion that the President "should continue to recognize in that State the existing State government." It may be a government de jure or only a government de facto. You can read the resolution one way or you can read it the other. It may be defended upon one ground or defended upon another. It may be defended upon the ground asserted by the late Attorney-General, Judge Black, that the President can deal only with the de facto government, whether it be de jure or not; or it may be defended on the ground that Kellogg is the de jure governor. It is neither one thing nor the other. The only thing in the resolution that is clear, precise, and unmistakable is that it whitewashes the President of the United States. There is nothing else in it but a good coat of whitewash for the occupant of the White House.

But, sir, even that appears to have been too strong; and hence, after much more labor, according to common report, in the caucus, the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] who is said to be, and I believe is admitted to be, the chairman of that august body, brings in a substitute for the resolution of the Senator from New Jersey, and it is presumable that when the chairman of the caucus brings forth a substitute to this resolution he does it by authority of the caucus.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it also presumable when the chairman of some other caucus opposes it, that he does it by the authority of the other caucus?

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator must appeal to the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. STEVENSON,] not to me. I am chairman of no caucus.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not know about that.

Mr. THURMAN. No, sir; I am not. I can say, however, to the Senator from Vermont that the democratic Senators have held no caucus upon either of these resolutions and therefore there has been no caucus decision in respect to them.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then they have not dealt with us in good faith, for last Saturday we adjourned for one hour for the express purpose, as was stated, of allowing them to hold a caucus.

Mr. THURMAN. That was simply to confer upon the question of when the vote should be taken; that was all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. O!

Mr. THURMAN. But the question of what our vote should be on this resolution has never been considered for one moment.

We have then this caucus resolution, as I should have called it, and I do not suppose it is offensive so to call it. This seems to boil the matter down—no, not to boil it down, for a thing gets stronger by being boiled down, but to dilute it more and more, more water and less spirit—it preserves the absolution, if I may say that without offense, of the President. It uses the whitewash brush with great liberality. It assumes, just as the resolution of the Senator from New Jersey did, that the President needs some kind of absolution, and it proceeds to administer it; but it gets even further away from anything like certainty than was the resolution of the Senator from New Jersey. Let us see what it is:

That the action of the President in protecting the government in Louisiana, of which William P. Kellogg is the executive, and the people of that State against domestic violence, and in enforcing the laws of the United States in that State, is approved.

In the first place, I crave to know what action of the President is here alluded to. I would like to have a bill of particulars, to use a homely phrase. What action of the President is it that is alluded to? Is it his action in supporting the unlawful order of Durell by the troops of the United States? Is that part of his action that is alluded to? Is it his action in permitting, without censure or rebuke, troops of the United States to interfere on the 4th day of last January in the organization of the Legislature of that State? Is that his action? Pray tell us what is the action to which allusion is here made and which this Senate is called upon to approve? But again let us see:

That the action of the President in protecting the government in Louisiana, of which William P. Kellogg is the executive.

What is meant by the word "government?" It means something more, I suppose, than protecting Kellogg in the exercise of the office of governor, because it speaks of "the government of which" he is "the executive," as though he were only a part of that government. It is to be presumed that if gentlemen who know so well the use of their own language had intended simply to indorse the action of the President in recognizing Kellogg as governor they would have said so in plain and unambiguous words. What then is meant by this approval of the action of the President in protecting "the government in Louisiana of which William P. Kellogg is the executive?" Does it mean protection of the Legislature? Does it mean protection of the courts? What does it mean? I would like to know; and when you have stated what it means I would like to know the acts which are to be approved by it. But it does not stop there:

And the people of that State against domestic violence.

What is meant by that? The only violence that has occurred there has been created by executive interference instead of being prevented by it. That is the truth of it. I may with propriety read, although it has been read so often before, what your committee found on this very subject:

It is the opinion of your committee—

I read from Carpenter's report, page 44—

that but for the unjustifiable interference of Judge Durell, whose orders were executed by United States troops, the canvass made by the De Feriet board and promulgated by the governor, declaring McEnery to have been elected governor, &c., and also declaring who had been elected to the Legislature, would have been acquiesced in by the people, and that government would have entered quietly upon the exercise of the sovereign power of the State.

That is what your own committee found. There would have been no disorder if the law had been permitted to take its course. There would have been no disorder if there had been no unlawful orders of Durell and no unlawful interference by the troops of the United States. And now to say that there has been protection of the people of Louisiana against domestic violence by the President, and that his action is to be approved, when the whole violence that has occurred there has grown out of his unlawful action, is to my mind the most unfounded proposition that ever I heard in the course of my life.

But, furthermore, his action "in enforcing the laws of the United States in that State" is "approved." What action is here meant, I would like to know? What are your specifications? What has he done to enforce the laws of the United States in Louisiana which should be the subject of special approbation by the Senate? I thought it was part of his sworn duty to enforce the laws of the United States everywhere, in Ohio as well as in Louisiana. This will be the first time, I believe, in the history of this country, that the Senate of the United States or any branch of Congress has passed a resolution thanking the President for enforcing the laws. It is a new thing in this land that we are to have a sole resolution of the Senate thanking the President in effect for, or approving of his action in, enforcing the laws of the United States. Where has there been a violation of the laws of the United States that calls for the President to act and where has his action been such as to draw forth from the Senate a special mark of its approval? I would like to have, as I said before, in the homely phrase of lawyers, a bill of particulars of such actions.

I presume it was considered by some that this is a very cunning resolution, that it can be voted for by certain gentlemen of the republican party who disapprove of the acts by which Kellogg became governor de facto and the Pinchback legislature the Legislature de facto in the State of Louisiana; I use the words "de facto" not in the legal sense in which lawyers use them, but in the common and popular sense. We know that there are certain republican as well as democratic Senators on this floor who will never approve knowingly the action which seated Kellogg in the gubernatorial chair and the so-called Pinchback legislature in the legislative halls of the State of Louisiana. Therefore, this resolution for their benefit and for all other tender consciences in the United States is to be read, I suppose, as simply an approval of the action of the President in protecting the people of Louisiana and their government de facto against domestic violence, and I suppose it will be said, "How can you democrats vote against thanking the President or approving the action of the President in suppressing domestic violence?"

Now let us see if this resolution is really so thin and attenuated as that; whether there is no Greek in arms hidden in this horse, who is to be pressed into the gates of Troy. The President has power to protect a State against domestic violence only upon one of two conditions. He must be called upon by the executive of that State, if the Legislature is not in session, or he must be called upon by the Legislature if it is in session. Therefore, when the President recognizes the call made by the body calling itself the Legislature or by a man calling himself the governor, and responds to that call, he recognizes that body as the Legislature and he recognizes that man as the governor; so that before you can approve of the action of the President in what is called suppressing domestic violence there, you must find that he was called upon to exercise his power by the lawful authority in that State, for without a call upon him by the lawful authority he had no more right to move troops than I or than any other member on this floor had. Inasmuch then as nobody ever called upon him to suppress domestic violence there but the Pinchback legislature and William P. Kellogg, his recognition of that call and his use of the Army to suppress what was called "domestic violence" was a clear and distinct recognition on his part that Kellogg was governor and that that Legislature was the Legislature of Louisiana. Therefore, whoever votes for this resolution votes that the President was lawfully called upon; for, I repeat, if he were not lawfully called upon, how can you approve his action? If he were not lawfully called upon, he had no more right to interfere there than he had to interfere in the affairs of Great Britain; and hence, I repeat it once more and for the last time, if you vote for this resolution you vote in effect that Kellogg is the governor and that the Pinchback legislature was the lawful Legislature of the State of Louisiana.

That is the thing that is in the bosom of this resolution. It is not a simple resolution that it was right and proper to suppress domestic violence. It is not that at all; and he who votes against it does not vote in favor of violence, does not approve violence, does not sanction violence in any way whatsoever. He who votes against this resolution in no wise gives countenance to any violation of the law, to any tumult, to any disorder; but under pretense of thanking the President for simply keeping the peace, this resolution in effect recognizes the governor whom the President has recognized and recognizes the Legislature that the President has recognized.

I have no fear of meeting this question fairly and squarely in the face, and if any man says to me, "Are you in favor of violence and tumult and disorder in Louisiana, and if you are not, why do you not vote for this resolution," my first answer to him is, because this resolution involves falsehood in my view. It involves a recognition of Kellogg as governor and of the Pinchback legislature as the Legislature, and therefore I cannot vote for it; and, in the second place, as a means of preserving the peace, as a means of preventing tumult and disorder, the resolution is not worth the paper on which it is printed.

This being the case, I can very well vote against this resolution; but how any man who does not believe that Kellogg was lawfully elected governor, how any man who does not believe in the validity of the Pinchback legislature, so called, can be beguiled into voting for this resolution and thereby recognizing both Kellogg and the Pinchback legislature is a little past my comprehension. "Domestic violence" forsooth! Is there a man on this floor who believes that William P. Kellogg was elected governor of Louisiana? Yes, I must say that there are two. They are the only men I ever heard say so. There are men on this floor, more than two, I do not know but ten times two, who believe that Kellogg would have been elected if there had been no intimidation at that election and no contrivance to prevent a fair and full registration and a fair and full ballot. But that he would have been elected had everything been fair is one thing, and that he was elected is quite another and a different thing. Whether he was elected or not could only be determined by the votes that were cast. If he had a majority of them, he was elected. If he had not a majority, he was not elected, but his adversary, McEnery, was elected. McEnery's election might have been voidable for the reasons that were alleged against him, on account of intimidation, on account of acts that prevented a fair and full registration or a fair and full ballot at the polls; but suppose that to be the case, by what mode could that fact be determined? Who was authorized to determine it? It is admitted on all hands that no Federal judge had a right to determine it. It could only be determined by a contest of McEnery's election according to the constitution and the laws of Louisiana. In that way it might have been shown that McEnery was not elected, that the election had not been fair, that intimidation had prevailed, or that contrivances had been resorted to which prevented a fair and a full registration and election, and that that vitiated the election. That would not have elected Kellogg, but that would have unseated McEnery. But the whole vice of the argument on the other side, from the beginning to end, is that the provisions of the constitution and laws of Louisiana are completely ignored. There was but one way known to a constitutional government by which McEnery could be deprived of that seat to which the returns of the election showed he was entitled, and that was by a contest under the laws and constitution of Louisiana. No such contest ever took place, but Kellogg became governor, and governor how? Governor by means of a void order of a Federal judge and by violence. And now this government of Kellogg, which had its origin in fraud and violence, the President is to be thanked for protecting against domestic violence! Ah, sir, this will not do. You cannot deceive the people of this country, and if I dared to have the presumption to advise my republican friends on the other side I would say to them, leave this little whitewashing business as quick as possible.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We will if you will only let us vote.

Mr. THURMAN. We will let you vote pretty soon now. Leave it just as soon as possible. Some of you may think that it will re-elect the President a second time, and may give it your support for that purpose. Others of you may think that it is such thin whitewash that it will not cover a spot, much less remove a tarnish. I do not. You may construe it the one way or the other; but construe it any way you will, it will deceive nobody. It is the thinnest gruel that ever was poured down the throat of a sick patient. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on this question I wish to state my understanding of the question. I understand the substitute offered by the Senator from Rhode Island, first, as an implied recognition of the Kellogg government merely, as one in the actual exercise of the governmental power in Louisiana, without reference to the question of its rightful origin or legal validity, and in no way involving the propriety of its establishment; second, that it approves the President's action so far only as directed merely to the protection of that government and the people of the State against domestic violence and civil war and to the enforcement of the laws of the United States, without approving any interference of the military with a legislative body or in the creation of a State government.

Such being, as it seems to me, the most natural and obvious sense of the language and the sense in which it will be most naturally understood by the people, while I adhere to the principles and conclusions which I announced here in my remarks on the 12th instant and which I here adopt by reference without retraction or qualification, and while I hold that a recognition by the Senate or by Congress of a government thus initiated can give it no greater validity than it had in its inception, still, as domestic violence and civil war which may lead to a complete dissolution of society are not the best remedy for getting rid of even an illegitimate government, I can approve the action of the President directed to the humane purposes mentioned in the amendment or substitute offered by the Senator from Rhode Island.

And believing the recognition of this government for this purpose and to this extent is justifiable under the peculiar circumstances now existing in that State, until by a fair election a more legitimate government can be instituted, I can vote for the resolution in the sense I have here attributed to it. But in the enlarged and odious sense which has been attributed to it by some of the speakers on the other side I could not vote for it; and I must deliberately avow my conviction that in such enlarged sense or in any sense which would assert the validity of the action by which that government was originally set up and put in power it could not secure the votes of a majority of this body.

Mr. WHYTE. I offered an amendment yesterday to the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island of my own motion, and it expresses the views which I entertain upon this subject; but suggestions have been made to me by other Senators that if that amendment were modified it would be more agreeable to them, and therefore, with that view, I ask the consent of the Senate to withdraw my amendment that I may offer a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island embodying views which I now desire to express.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has that right. He withdraws his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WHYTE. Then I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island by substituting for it the following:

That the use of the Army of the United States to enforce the unwarrantable and void order of Judge Durell, issued on the 5th of December, 1872, and directing the United States marshal to seize the building occupied as a State-house for the assembling of the Legislature of Louisiana, and the employment of the soldiers of the United States on the 4th of January, 1875, to invade the hall of the house of representatives of Louisiana, and to eject therefrom persons claiming to be members thereof, are contrary to the spirit of republican institutions and cannot be approved by the Senate of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon this amendment to the amendment.

Mr. STEVENSON and Mr. THURMAN called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON;] and unless he is in the Hall I shall not vote.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, (when Mr. HAMLIN'S name was called.) On the question of the passage of this resolution and kindred questions my colleague [Mr. HAMLIN] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.]

Mr. MORTON, (when Mr. MCDONALD'S name was called.) I am authorized to state that my colleague [Mr. MCDONALD] is paired, on this question and all others growing out of this resolution, with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. OGLESBY.] On this amendment my colleague would vote "yea," and the Senator from Illinois would vote "nay."

Mr. RANSOM, (when Mr. MERRIMON'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. MERRIMON] is paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] Mr. MERRIMON would vote "yea" and Mr. HAMLIN "nay" on this amendment.

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] He would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea" on this amendment.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to state that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] is paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. CONOVER.] I make that announcement because I had previously been paired with Mr. JOHNSTON, and the pair has been transferred to Mr. CONOVER.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 33, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, Maxey, Norwood, Randolph, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Paddock, Patterson, Robertson, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Wadleigh, West, and Windom—33.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Christiancy, Clayton, Conover, Dawes, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamlin, Johnston of Virginia, McDonald, Merrimon, Oglesby, Ransom, and Wright—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. THURMAN. In order that I may find out what the resolution means, I offer the following amendment: Insert at the end of the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island this proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein contained is meant to affirm that said Kellogg is de jure governor of Louisiana.

I have only to say in regard to the amendment, that there are Senators here who support this resolution and who have declared their own opinion again and again that William P. Kellogg is not de jure governor of Louisiana. The proviso that I have offered simply says that nothing in this resolution is meant to declare or affirm that he is de jure governor. I do not see that there can be any objection to the proviso.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall vote against this proviso because it obscures the sense of the original resolution and raises a negative pregnant, as the lawyers call it, on another part of the case.

Mr. ANTHONY. If Senators have voted as the Senator from Ohio says, that is sufficient evidence that the resolution does not imply what he says by his amendment it does not. If Senators who do not believe that Mr. Kellogg is governor de jure are for the resolution, it is quite unnecessary to put into the resolution that expression of opinion. I think it is a very good resolution as it is. I hope we shall pass it as it is without amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. Now, Mr. President, I am perfectly delighted that these gentlemen have opened their mouths at last, even if it was only to say a word. I had not the good fortune to hear one word of what was said by the Senator from Vermont except something about "negative pregnant." I did not catch what he said, but I did hear what the Senator from Rhode Island said. He said, as I understood him, that it is sufficient to interpret this resolution that certain Senators who do not believe that Kellogg is de jure governor have voted for it. That is an odd proposition. If the opinion of those Senators was confessedly the opinion of the whole republican side of the House, then the position of the Senator would be quite unanswerable; but when I recollect the vote on Pinchback, I cannot quite see that the opinion of those Senators is the opinion of the republican side of the House. On the contrary, I cannot forget, nor can any of us forget, how the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] used the party lash over the shoulders of those whom he treated as recusants. I cannot forget, nor can any of us forget, how they were treated as little better than deserters from the republican fold. Remembering that, and very vividly too, I cannot quite see how the fact that they can vote for this resolution is to settle the interpretation of the resolution. Let them vote for the proviso that I have offered, and I venture to say that the resolution will be interpreted as that proviso declares.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say first to my honorable friend from Ohio that I for one do not know of any deserters from the republican fold—certainly among those to whom he refers—and to suggest to him in the second place that we think we are quite capable of taking care of ourselves.

Mr. THURMAN. Well, now, Mr. President, there was no necessity for that remark, for I am sure I did not volunteer to take care of them. [Laughter.] They are about the last people in this world that I would undertake to nurse and take care of. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. You are quite right about that.

Mr. THURMAN. We did not say they were deserters; but I fancy that the Senator from Indiana the other night even more than insinuated that they had fallen away from the true faith.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio to the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. THURMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] If he were here he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay" on this amendment.

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] He would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. If the Senate will permit me to say a word, as this amendment expresses precisely my view of the resolution as it now stands and implies that without the amendment such a construction would not be put upon it, I shall vote "nay."

Mr. BURNSIDE. I see that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] has arrived. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Gordon, Hamilton, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, Maxey, Norwood, Randolph, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson, Robertson, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Wadleigh, West, and Windom—33.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Conover, Dawes, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Johnston of Virginia, McDonald, Merrimon, Oglesby, Paddock, Ransom, and Wright—15.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. THURMAN. I will now try to remove another ambiguity in the resolution. I offer this amendment as a proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein contained is meant to affirm that the body of men who assumed to elect P. B. S. Pinchback a Senator of the United States was the Legislature of the State of Louisiana.

On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say that I shall vote against this amendment upon precisely the same grounds that I stated as to the other.

The Secretary proceeded to call the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. RANSOM, (when Mr. MERRIMON's name was called.) I will state again that my colleague [Mr. MERRIMON] is paired on all phases of this question with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] Mr. MERRIMON would vote yea and Mr. HAMLIN nay on this amendment.

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] He would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea" on this proposition.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Gordon, Hamilton, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, Maxey, Norwood, Randolph, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson, Robertson, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Wadleigh, West, and Windom—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Booth, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Christiancy, Clayton, Conover, Dawes, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Johnston of Virginia, McDonald, Merrimon, Oglesby, Paddock, Ransom, and Wright—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I will make one more effort to get at the meaning of this resolution. I offer this amendment:

Provided, That nothing herein is meant to approve the military interference by United States troops in the organization of the Legislature of Louisiana on the 4th of January last.

I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the roll-call was commenced.

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] He would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea" on this proposition.

The roll-call was concluded and the result announced—yeas 24, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Gordon, Hamilton, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, Maxey, Norwood, Randolph, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson, Robertson, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Wadleigh, West, and Windom—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Christiancy, Clayton, Conover, Dawes, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Johnston of Virginia, McDonald, Merrimon, Oglesby, Paddock, Ransom, and Wright—16.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] as a substitute for the resolution, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the more I have reflected upon this proposition, without any respect to the merit of the facts or without any regard to my opinion of the facts which I have already given to the Senate at some length, I am more clear of its impropriety. The Senate of the United States is but one portion of the legislative branch of this Government. By itself it has no legislative power whatever; and only in conjunction with the other House of Congress and the action of the President of the United States can it have legislative power at all. The great aim of the founders of this Government was to separate the three branches and to render each co-ordinate branch independent of all others and of each other. Now what is to be the effect—I submit it to the judgment of Senators—of the Senate of the United States, acting as a separate body, undertaking to criticise with approval or disapproval the action of a co-ordinate and independent branch of the Government. Certainly to do so is stepping over the line of our true powers. To do so is intimating opinion in regard to that for which we have no responsibility and upon which we have no lawful power to express our opinion. What would be thought if the Senate, sitting to-day in executive session, should undertake to pass their opinion upon a judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States? The Supreme Court have passed opinions very distasteful to the present majority of this Senate. What would be thought of the action of the Senate in undertaking to express their opinion as a body in respect of the independent action of that co-ordinate branch of our Government? It would be thought impertinent. It would not only be thought a solecism in practice, but simply impertinent and totally without authority. The Senate, in former days, once undertook to pass upon the action of the Federal Executive, and resolutions of censure found themselves upon the Journal of the Senate, but staid there only a short time. They were expunged subsequently. When passions had somewhat cooled, when reason had regained her sway, they were expunged from the Journal for want of authority in the Senate to intermeddle with the action of a co-ordinate and distinct branch of the Government.

But, Mr. President, Senators in thus undertaking to pass upon the action of a co-ordinate branch of this Government, the Executive, in respect of high matters with which he has undertaken upon his own responsibility and at his own risk to deal, seem to have forgotten that there is a high judicial duty which may become incumbent upon them and in regard to which they are now hastily, improperly, without authority, undertaking to anticipate what may come hereafter. The Constitution of the United States provides that this body, sitting on oath or affirmation, shall be a tribunal to try all cases of impeachment, the other House of Congress having the power in their discretion, for any reason which in their opinion is satisfied by the language of the Constitution, to present here any officer of the Government for impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors, including the Executive and every subordinate. Now, I ask what is the effect of a resolution like this? I say nothing of the facts connected with the present case; I intimate nothing connected with the facts of the present case; but I do mean to say that it is unbecoming, improper, in a body that may be convened as a court, to be undertaking to pass their opinion upon a broad case running over a period of nearly three years and involving the most grave questions connected with the administration and the lines of demarcation between our State and Federal Governments.

I am perfectly aware that after the votes we have seen, and after this one-sided debate which we have heard, in which no reason has been urged but that against the resolution, and not one word or half a reason in its favor, it is simply talking to the ears of adders to raise a voice in favor of a constitutional or a rational restriction upon the action proposed by the Senate to-day. It is perfectly clear that we may be called upon in the high discretion of another branch of Congress, over whom we have no control, to pass upon these very acts which we are condoning and approving in advance. It is a dangerous thing to prophesy, and, therefore, I shall not assume that dangerous function; but here, believing that but few years will pass before this body will find itself controlled by a majority differing in political sentiment from those who now control it, I now state that I believe this resolution, which may be found upon your journals after this adjournment, will be stricken out and rescinded by the action of a Senate to come hereafter. The principle involved is too dangerous; it leads too distinctly to confusion between the departments of the Government. We have no right to express our mere opinions of the propriety or impropriety of the action of other branches of the Government. They are responsible to the people; they are responsible to the Constitution; they are responsible to their official oaths for what they may do within the limits of the powers assigned to them under our charter of government; and if we keep within our own limits and do our own duty, I think our powers will be fully taxed.

Therefore it is, sir, that I should prefer upon this question not to vote at all, neither to express approval nor disapproval; and here let me say that the last three roll-calls of the Senate have disclosed the fact that there is not a quorum present and voting to-day of the majority; and it has been and is at this moment in the power of the minority of this body to prevent the resolution from receiving the vote required by the Constitution to pass a law. We have known that for several days, and it was a question whether or not members who hold the views I do in regard to this resolution should not decline to vote upon it, totally irrespective of the right or the wrong of the actions which it proposes to approve, upon the ground that we are assuming functions of interference with another branch of the Government improper and not delegated to us.

I have thought it fit to make this statement and to put it on record, in order that the reason for my vote pro or con upon this resolution might be explained. I do not hold it proper for the Senate to censure or approve the acts of other branches of the Government. I think it is out of their power, and I think it is simply impertinent for them to do so. For that reason I would rather not vote at all, but I believe I can signify that by voting in opposition to this resolution without regard to the question of whether I would vote for it in case it expressed disapproval instead of approval. Frankly I say that I think we should express neither.

Mr. THURMAN. I have a word to say on this question. It might seem at first that the distinction between the resolution offered by the Senator from New Jersey and that offered by the Senator from Rhode Island is a distinction without a difference, or only the difference "'twixt tweedledum and tweedledee." It is not so, however, for the resolution offered by the Senator from New Jersey declares the opinion of the Senate that the President should continue to recognize in Louisiana the existing State government, by which is meant the Kellogg government, and I do not know but that would include the bogus Legislature that was organized there on the 4th of January last. I suppose it would, if that can be called any government at all or any part of that government. There is no such expression in the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island. I am therefore very frank to say that as between these two I think the resolution offered by the Senator from Rhode Island is the least objectionable. But as I know, as we all know, that this resolution offered by the Senator from Rhode Island is to pass this body, that that has been decreed, I think we may as well vote against it from first to last, and therefore I shall vote against substituting it for the resolution offered by the Senator from New Jersey, I was going to say in the faint hope that it might not be substituted, and that if it were not substituted then the resolution offered by the Senator from New Jersey might be killed; but I have no such hope, even the faintest. The real question, therefore, is not the question on the substitution of one for the other, but the question is shall the resolution offered by the Senator from Rhode Island pass; and upon that, as I believe that is the question first and last, I think we might as well vote "no" all the time.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I shall vote for this resolution, because it approves of the action of the President in protecting the people of Louisiana from domestic violence, without committing myself as to the legality of the State government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the yeas and nays have not been ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They were ordered a day or two ago, the Chair is advised.

Mr. ANTHONY. By unanimous consent we can give up the calling of the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the call cannot be revoked without unanimous consent.

Mr. THURMAN. There is no objection to withdrawing the call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir; I object.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WINDOM, (when Mr. CONOVER'S name was called.) I desire to announce again that the Senator from Florida [Mr. CONOVER] is paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] and I make the announcement now for all the votes on this question.

Mr. MORTON, (when Mr. MCDONALD'S name was called.) On this vote I again state the pair between my colleague [Mr. MCDONALD] and the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. OGLESBY.] My colleague would vote "nay" and the Senator from Illinois would vote "yea" on this question.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 33, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Paddock, Patterson, Robertson, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Wadleigh, West, and Windom—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Gordon, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, Maxey, Norwood, Randolph, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Conover, Dawes, Eaton, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Hamlin, Johnston of Virginia, McDonald, Merrimon, Oglesby, Ransom, and Wright—16.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the resolution as amended, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution as amended, as follows:

Resolved, That the action of the President in protecting the government in Louisiana, of which W. P. Kellogg is the executive, and the people of that State against domestic violence and in enforcing laws of the United States in that State, is approved.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RANSOM, (when Mr. MERRIMON'S name was called.) On this question my colleague [Mr. MERRIMON] is paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] My colleagne would vote "nay" and the Senator from Maine would vote "yea" on this question.

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] If he were present he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay" on this resolution.

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Paddock, Patterson, Robertson, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Wadleigh, West, and Windom—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Gordon, Hamilton, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, Maxey, Norwood, Randolph, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Conover, Dawes, Eaton, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Johnston of Virginia, McDonald, Merrimon, Oglesby, Ransom, and Wright—15.

So the resolution was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. SAULSBURY, it was Ordered, That L. J. Draper have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. BOUTWELL, it was Ordered, That Sallie E. Herrick have leave to withdraw her petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

CONTINUANCE OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have heretofore omitted to ask that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have leave to sit during the recess. That is always accorded to them because by law they are required to make a disposition of the rooms in this wing of the Capitol to the various committees, and it has to be done after the session closes or before the next session begins, and there are various other things to be done. This is a very difficult duty, because, as President Lincoln said, there are more pegs than there are holes. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Vermont? The Chair hears none; and the order is made for the continuance during the recess of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I desire to call up a resolution I offered a few days ago in regard to the Committee on Contingent Expenses having leave to sit during the recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate be continued and authorized to sit during the recess of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to know the necessity of that. I do not know that I have any objection, but I wish to know the reason for it.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Because the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, in order to pay the employés of the Senate it is necessary to have the Committee on Expenses sit to audit accounts.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand it is usual, and therefore I make no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senate imposes certain duties upon the Committee on Printing which must be discharged in the recess, relative to the superintendence of certain matters. There are also certain duties committed to the Joint Committee on Printing which must be discharged in the recess, but there is now no Joint Committee on Printing. At the close of the first session of the last Congress the Joint Committee on Printing had leave to sit during the recess. It subjects the Government to no expense whatever.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think these motions are not necessary either in the case of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds or the Committee on Printing, because the law itself provides for certain duties to be performed by them during the recess, and to that extent modifies the rule. However, if the Senator desires——

Mr. ANTHONY. Is there any Committee on Printing in the recess?

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand so, because the law itself requires them to perform certain duties during the recess; and so with the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, which is expressly required by law to do certain things and the law provides for its continuance. I will not interpose any objection, however.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the Committee on Public Buildings have asked leave to sit during the recess sometimes.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Always.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not make objection if the Senator thinks a motion necessary.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to state in making the motion that although leave has been granted several times the Government has not been subjected to a dollar of expense in connection with it. The Congressional Printer constantly writes to the Committee on Printing asking instructions, and we hardly know whether we have a right to give them or not.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is any desire to have a formal order, let the Senator move that leave be given to the committee to sit during the recess. I think there is no necessity for it while the law imposes duty during the recess. It seems to me that is sufficient authority.

Mr. SARGENT. The clerk of that committee is a permanent clerk with an annual salary, so that it can be no expense.

Mr. ANTHONY. It involves no expense. I move that the Committee on Printing have leave to sit during the recess.

The motion was agreed to.

PAY OF COMMITTEE CLERKS AND PAGES.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the clerks of the several standing committees of the Senate and to the pages of the Senate their usual per diem compensation from the 1st to the 15th of April, inclusive.

Mr. SARGENT. A clause was put in the legislative and executive appropriation bill at the last session that the pay of committee clerks should last only during the session. It is beyond our control. Neither House now has a right to expend money in the direction stated by this resolution. We cannot pay it out of the contingent fund. It is expressly provided that the pay of committee clerks shall be six dollars per diem, and during the session only. We have consequently no power to extend it.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. This is an exact copy of the resolution passed two years ago, and was laid on my desk as a proper one to be introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Contingent Expenses. I paid no particular attention to it. I now desire to withdraw it on the statement made by the Senator from California.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is withdrawn.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 24, 1875.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. CONOVER, it was Ordered, That David L. Palmer have leave to withdraw his papers from the files of the Senate.

Ordered, That J. W. Childs have leave to withdraw his papers from the files of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After four hours and thirty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

THANKS TO THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. COOPER submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate are due, and hereby are tendered, to Hon. THOMAS W. FERRY, President pro tempore of the Senate, for the courtesy and impartiality with which he has presided over their deliberations.

The resolution was agreed to unanimously.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. HOWE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of two Senators, be appointed by the Chair to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that unless he may have some further communication to make the Senate is ready to adjourn without day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. HOWE and Mr. BAYARD as the committee.

THANKS TO THE VICE-PRESIDENT.

Mr. RANSOM submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate are due to Hon. HENRY WILSON for the courtesy and impartiality with which he has presided over its deliberations.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HOWE, from the committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that unless he has further communication to make the Senate is ready to adjourn without day, reported that they had performed the duty assigned them, and that the President had replied that he had no further communication to make.

On motion of Mr. BOUTWELL, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution submitted by him on the 22d instant:

Resolved, That the Presiding Officer of the Senate be, and hereby is, directed to adjourn the Senate without day on the —— day of ——, A. D. 1875, at —— o'clock.

On motion of Mr. BOUTWELL, the resolution was amended by filling the blanks with the words "24th March" and "five forty-five p. m." respectively.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (at five o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) Senators, in declaring the order of the Senate, permit me to thank you for the kind terms in which you have formally tendered me approval. Grateful for your uniform support and courtesy, and hoping that you may reach your several homes in safety and all be permitted to return again in December next with reinvigorated health and strength, I now declare the special session of the Senate of the Forty-fourth Congress adjourned sine die.

APPENDIX

SPECIAL SESSION OF THE SENATE.

The Hawaiian Reciprocity Treaty.

SPEECH OF HON. J. H. MITCHELL,

OF OREGON,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

[In executive session, the injunction of secrecy having been removed by a vote of the Senate, March 23, 1875.]

March 17, 1875.

The Senate, in executive session, having under consideration the treaty of reciprocity in trade with the Sandwich Islands—

Mr. MITCHELL said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: One of the principal objections urged against the ratification of the pending treaty by the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] who has just addressed the Senate is, that in his opinion it is, to use his own language, "a put-up job, in the interest of the sugar-planters of the Sandwich Islands, and at the expense of the Government of the United States." Whatever weight should rightfully attach to this objection, I shall leave to the Senate to determine on a full consideration of the whole case. For the purpose, however, of showing that for one I am not a recent convert to the support of this measure, either from the consideration suggested by the honorable Senator or from any other, but that on the contrary I commenced very many years ago, long before I was a member of this body, to aid in my feeble way in "putting up this job," if job it is, as stated by the honorable Senator, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to this fact: Eleven years ago I had the honor of holding a seat in the senate of the State of Oregon. On the 17th day of October of that year, 1864, I introduced into that body a certain resolution having direct reference to a treaty of reciprocity in trade between the United States and the Hawaiian governments, and on the same day this resolution received the unanimous vote of both branches of the Oregon Legislature. It was in these words:

Whereas a treaty of reciprocity in trade between the United States and Hawaiian governments, by which the leading articles of export and the staple productions of the two countries, except the articles of wool and live stock, shall be admitted to the ports of either government free of duty, is highly desirable, not only in the interest of the Pacific States and Territories, but also as a measure strongly tending to promote the political and commercial interests of our nation, and which must add strength and vigor to those ligaments of interest, trade, and friendly feeling which now unite these gems of the ocean with the Government of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved by the senate, (the house concurring,) That our present Senators and Representative in Congress, and the Senator and Representative elect, be, and they are hereby, instructed to represent to the proper authorities at Washington the importance and necessity of such a treaty, and to use their influence to secure its negotiation at an early day by the two governments.

Mr. President, since this action was had in the Legislature of the State I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor nearly eleven years have passed away, and what with me then was little more than crude opinion, based upon comparatively superficial knowledge of the subject, has to-day become, through a more enlarged experience and a more thorough knowledge of the question, settled conviction; and I congratulate myself upon the fact that I have lived to see the treaty now under consideration presented to the Senate of the United States for its advice and consent; and especially is it a source of gratification to me that in the course of human events I am accorded the high privilege of casting one vote in its favor.

Were it not for the apparent apathy and indifference of many Senators in reference to the fate of a measure which to my mind is not only of peculiar and special interest to the Pacific coast but of incalculable national importance, and the open and earnest opposition of others, I should content myself with giving my vote, as I have done in most instances since I have been a member of the Senate, unaccompanied by any reasons or argument; but, sir, when I contemplate the loss that must in my judgment fall upon our Government in its political and commercial relations by a failure to ratify this treaty, I feel that as a member of this body, representing in part that portion of our Republic more directly interested than any other in the measure under consideration, I ought in justice to my constituents, and in the full performance of duty, to submit the reasons that shall influence my vote.

On account of the manifold and perhaps more important interests which affect this side of the continent, and which are constantly being pressed upon the attention of the Senate, it is so seldom that we hear anything urged in the interest of the commerce of the Pacific coast, that it is really encouraging to a representative from that portion of our Republic to listen, as we had the pleasure a few days since, to the able and statesman-like speech of the honored Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] while it is, I regretfully confess, equally discouraging to be compelled to listen to an argument such as has to-day fallen from the lips of the experienced and distinguished Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] wherein the growing and ever-increasing commerce of the Pacific coast, and especially of the Pacific Ocean, has, to my utter astonishment, been belittled and disparaged.

But what is the nature of the treaty under consideration? What benefits, commercially and politically, if any, may we reasonably expect to derive, presently or in the future, from its ratification; and what are the objections urged against it? With its character we are all perfectly familiar—it is ostensibly and in fact a treaty of commercial reciprocity, intended by the two governments to consolidate their commercial intercourse, and to strengthen and perpetuate the friendly relations which have heretofore uniformly existed between them; in other words, an ordinary treaty of reciprocity in trade whereby the principal productions of each country are admitted free of duty to the ports of the other. A reference to the articles specified in the two schedules will show at a glance how very far they fall short of coming into competition, respectively, with the productions of the countries into which they are admitted free of duty; and it is equally apparent from these schedules, as was stated by the honorable Senator from Maine, that our Government, if we regard it simply in its most limited commercial point of view, has much the best of the bargain.

This being then an ordinary treaty of reciprocity in trade between the United States of America and the King of the Hawaiian Islands, upon the face of which, considered solely with reference to a free interchange of commodities, our Government would seem to have a most decided advantage, we come to consider the inquiry as to the probable advantages and disadvantages, both commercially and politically, viewed in the most enlarged and comprehensive signification of these terms, which we may reasonably hope or fear from its final adoption, if I may so speak, by the two governments. And the consideration of this question necessarily compels us to look far beyond the mere specification of articles in the schedules of the pending treaty, and to consider something more, questions of higher interest, of graver importance, of more far-reaching significance than those which relate simply to those reciprocal advantages likely to result to the people from a free exchange of commodities. In the presence of such an inquiry by the Senate of the United States mere partisan feeling and private interest become, in the very nature of the case, subordinated to national interest and commercial security and advancement.

The geographical position of the Hawaiian Islands, their relation not only to our country but to the other nations of the world, their history, area, capabilities of production, the number and character of their population, the desires and sympathies of their people, the character of their harbors and their commerce, but, above all, the present and future commerce of the ocean that surrounds them, together with the probabilities that the day is not far distant when, no longer able to maintain their autonomy or hold their place as a separate nation, they must become absorbed by some other power—all these, and many others, are to my mind important items of consideration in determining the question as to the propriety of advising and consenting to this treaty.

And while I should favor the proposed treaty were it limited in its importance to those reciprocal commercial advantages which must result from a free interchange of the articles specified in the respective schedules, I regard these as a mere bagatelle in comparison with those national advantages of a political and commercial character that our Government and our people will, in my judgment, ultimately attain through its operation.

CONSTITUTIONAL OBJECTION AS TO THE RIGHTS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES TO PARTICIPATE IN MAKING TREATIES THAT AFFECT THE REVENUE CONSIDERED.

Before passing to a consideration of the benefits, commercial and political, which I believe to be in store for our Government in the event of the ratification of the pending treaty, I desire to notice certain constitutional objections which to my great surprise have been urged with apparent candor and earnestness by the honorable Senator [Mr. MORRILL] who has just taken his seat, and which I find are having an influence on the minds of some Senators.

The first of these, as urged by the honorable Senator, is that no power exists under the Constitution that enables the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to give vitality to a treaty of reciprocity in trade without the sanction of the House of Representatives. If I understand the honorable Senator correctly, the objection is based upon the fact that such treaties affect the revenue of the Government, and that under the Constitution of the United States, article 1, section 7, "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives."

While it is true, Mr. President, that all bills for raising revenue must originate in the House of Representatives, it is equally clear that the treaty-making power of the Government, although it may incidentally affect the revenue of the Government, is in the very nature of the case under the Constitution supreme in the Executive and Senate, extending to every possible subject in reference to which they may be disposed to treat, save that of a change in or destruction of the Government itself.

Section 2 of article 2 of the Constitution of the United States provides that the President—

Shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

This grant of power, as I have said, is absolute, and not limited by any condition whatever; it is a power supreme in the Executive and Senate, extending to all subjects in reference to which it may be their pleasure to treat, subject only to the limitation I have just stated, and so long as a treaty does not effect any change in the Government itself, although it may incidentally affect its revenue and call for legislation to adjust to its requirements the tariff laws of the country, the House of Representatives has no constitutional right to complain. And although under section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States the right to regulate commerce belongs not to the President and Senate but to the Congress of the United States, still the treaty-making power, although in its legitimate exercise it may incidentally, or I may say even directly, affect commerce and in some sense regulate it with foreign nations, is, under the Constitution, clearly vested exclusively in the Executive and Senate; it is a power complete in itself, plenary in its character, and may be exercised to its utmost extent, and it acknowledges no constitutional or international limitation save that which would preserve intact the form and essence of our Government; therefore, when the Constitution of the United States declares that "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations," and that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives," it creates certain powers and prescribes certain rules that must be construed in connection with and held subordinate to the treaty-making power, which is in itself supreme and created by that same Constitution, and vested exclusively in the President and Senate.

Commercial treaties are as old almost as the recognition of international comity among civilized nations.

Chancellor Kent in speaking of their utility uses this language:

Treaties of commerce defining and establishing the rights and extent of commercial intercourse have been found to be of great utility, and they occupy a very important title in the code of national law.

He says further:

They were considered even two centuries ago to be so conducive to the public welfare as to overcome the bigotry of the times.

Lord Coke admitted them "to be one of the four kinds of national compacts that might lawfully be made with infidels."

The power to make treaties, it is true, in reference to commerce was under the Confederation restricted by a superior power reserved to the States respectively, whereby the right of their Legislatures to impose such imposts and duties on foreigners as their own people were subjected to, and the right to prohibit the exportation or importation of any species of goods or commodities whatsoever, should be preserved. In fact, under the Confederation, Congress and not the Executive and Senate possessed the sole and exclusive power of "entering into treaties and alliances," but it was these restrictions and limitations, together with many others in the articles of that government, which, in the language of Judge Story, "contributed to the prostration and utter imbecility of the Confederation."

Although the clause conferring power "to make treaties," as will be seen by a reference to the Federalist, was not in the original draught of the Constitution of the United States, but was subsequently to the draught of that instrument reported by a committee, it was nevertheless finally made a part of it, and that power is not restricted but general.

In speaking of this subject, and in defining the scope of this constitutional grant of power, Mr. Story says:

The power to make treaties is by the Constitution general; and of course it embraces all sorts of treaties, for peace or war; for commerce or territory; for alliance or success; for indemnity for injuries or payment of debts; for the recognition and enforcement of principles of public law; and for any other purposes which the policy or interests of independent sovereigns may dictate in their intercourse with each other.

He then states the only limitation or restriction upon this power in these words:

But though the power is thus general and unrestricted, it is not to be so construed as to destroy the fundamental laws of the state.

And again:

A treaty to change the organization of the government or annihilate its sovereignty, to overturn its republican form or to deprive it of its constitutional powers, would be void.

Rawle, in his work on the Constitution, declares that—

The power to make treaties is an essential attribute of a nation.

And, further, that under the Constitution of the United States—

It extends to all those matters which are generally the subjects of compact between independent nations. Such subjects are peace, alliance, commerce, neutrality, and others of a similar nature.

While then, Mr. President, the treaty-making power was, under the Articles of Confederation, vested in a restricted manner in Congress, and while in England the power is vested exclusively in the Crown, under the Constitution of the United States it is reposed solely and exclusively, not in the President alone, not in Congress, but in the Executive and Senate, and is general and plenary in its character.

I desire to attract the attention of the Senate to an extract from a message of President Washington, transmitted by him to the House of Representatives on the 30th of March, 1796, for the purpose of showing the views of the first President of the United States on this subject:

The course which the debate has taken on the resolution of the House leads to some observations on the mode of making treaties under the Constitution of the United States.

Having been a member of the general convention, and knowing the principles on which the Constitution was formed, I have ever entertained but one opinion on this subject, and from the first establishment of the Government to this moment my conduct has exemplified that opinion, that the power of making treaties is exclusively with the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and that every treaty so made and promulgated thenceforward becomes the law of the land. It is thus that the treaty-making power has been understood by foreign nations, and in all the treaties made with them we have declared and they have believed that when ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, they become obligatory. In this construction of the Constitution every House of Representatives has heretofore acquiesced, and until the present time not a doubt or suspicion has appeared to my knowledge that this construction was not the true one. Nay, they have more than acquiesced; for until now, without controverting the obligation of such treaties, they have made all the requisite provisions for carrying them into effect.

There is also reason to believe that this construction agrees with the opinions entertained by the State conventions, when they were deliberating on the Constitution, especially by those who objected to it, because there was not required in commercial treaties the consent of two-thirds of the whole number of the members of the Senate instead of two-thirds of the Senators present, and because, in treaties respecting territorial and certain other rights and claims, the concurrence of three-fourths of the whole number of the members of both Houses respectively was not made necessary.

It is a fact, declared by the general convention and universally understood, that the Constitution of the United States was the result of a spirit of amity and mutual concession. And it is well known that, under this influence, the smaller States were admitted to an equal representation in the Senate with the larger States, and that this branch of the Government was invested with great powers; for on the equal participation of those powers the sovereignty and political safety of the smaller States were deemed essentially to depend.

If other proofs than these and the plain letter of the Constitution itself be necessary to ascertain the point under consideration, they may be found in the journals of the general convention, which I have deposited in the office of the Department of State. In those journals it will appear that a proposition was made "that no treaty should be binding on the United States which was not ratified by a law," and that the proposition was explicitly rejected.

As, therefore, it is perfectly clear to my understanding that the assent of the House of Representatives is not necessary to the validity of a treaty; as the treaty with Great Britain exhibits in itself all the objects requiring legislative provision, and on these the papers called for can throw no light; and as it is essential to the due administration of the Government that the boundaries fixed by the Constitution between the different departments should be preserved, a just regard to the Constitution and to the duty of my office, under all the circumstances of this case, forbid a compliance with your request.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, March 30, 1796.

The treaty-making power—

Says Chancellor Kent—

forms a distinct department of government, and belongs properly neither to the legislative nor the executive, though it may be said to partake of the qualities common to each. The President from his unity, promptitude, and facility of action is peculiarly well adapted to carry on the initiative processes; while the Senate, representing all the States, and engaged in legislating for the interests of the whole country, is equally well fitted to be intrusted with the power of ultimate ratification.

The House of Representatives, therefore, has no right or power whatever either to participate in the making of treaties, or to protest that the power of the President and Senate does not extend under the Constitution to treaties of reciprocity, because such treaties may in some sense affect the revenue, or "regulate commerce with foreign nations," &c.

As I have said, in England the king is the sole and absolute representative of the nation in reference to all treaty-making powers, just as the President and Senate are in this country; and although in England the same question has been raised that is urged to-day by the Senator from Vermont, the writer of the Federalist disposes of it in these words:

It has been insinuated that his authority in this respect is not conclusive, and that his (referring to the King of England) conventions with foreign powers are subject to the revision and stand in need of the ratification of Parliament; but I believe this doctrine was never heard of until recently. Every jurist of that kingdom, and every other man acquainted with its constitution, knows as an established fact that the prerogative of making treaties exists in the Crown in its utmost plenitude. * * * The Parliament, it is true, is sometimes seen employing itself in altering the existing laws to conform them to the stipulations in a new treaty, and this may possibly have given birth to the imagination that its co-operation was necessary to the obligatory efficacy of the treaty.

And concluding he says just what is true with reference to the right and duty of the House of Representatives in this country:

But this parliamentary interposition proceeds from a different cause: from the necessity of adjusting a most artificial and intricate system of revenue and commercial laws to the changes made in them by the operation of the treaty, and of adapting new provisions and precautions to the new state of things to keep the machinery from running into disorder

In the case of the British treaty of 1794 President Washington refused peremptorily to lay the papers before the House of Representatives when requested by them to do so.

Mr. Wheaton, in his work on international law, refers in the following strong language to the question growing out of the Zollverein treaty and as to the right of the treaty-making powers to affect duties on imports and to the opinion of Mr. Calhoun upon that subject:

A question as to the right of the treaty-making power to affect duties on imports was raised in the case of the convention negotiated by Mr. Wheaton with the Zollverein. Though recommended by the President in two successive annual messages and in submitting the treaty to the Senate, the Committee on Foreign Relations of that body reported that it was "an innovation on the ancient and uniform practice of the Government to change by treaty duties laid by law;" that "the Constitution in express terms delegates the power to Congress to regulate commerce and to impose duties, and to no other; and that the control of trade and the function of taxing belong without abridgment or participation to Congress." The Senate having omitted to give their assent to the treaty before the adjournment, the Secretary of State, Mr. Calhoun, in communicating to Mr. Wheaton the result of their proceedings, with a view to the extension of time for the exchange of ratifications, states that the objections of the committee were opposed to the uniform practice of the Government, and he refers to numerous treaties which contain stipulations changing the existing laws regulating commerce and navigation and duties laid by law. "So well," says he, "is the practice settled, that it is believed it has never before been questioned. The only question, it is believed, that was ever made was whether an act of Congress was not necessary to sanction and carry the stipulations making the change into effect."

This, Mr. President, was the opinion of John C. Calhoun, when Secretary of State, in reference to this question. And although the Senate of the United States at that time hesitated, the subsequent history of its proceedings, in the years that have elapsed since then, shows that the views then expressed by Mr. Calhoun have become the settled rule of action of this body. The objection then made to the Zollverein treaty, growing out of the treaty-making power of the Federal Government, soon passed away and was abandoned by the Senate as untenable; and accordingly, in 1854, the reciprocity treaty between the United States and the British Provinces, though it materially affected and changed the existing tariff, was promptly ratified by the Senate; and the Congress of the United States, recognizing the plenary and exclusive power of the President and Senate in the premises, passed a law, as of course, to conform the revenue laws of the Government to the various changes made in the tariff by the treaty.

THE "MOST FAVORED NATION CLAUSE" OBJECTION CONSIDERED.

Another objection urged to-day by the honorable Senator from Vermont is in reference to the clause known as the "most-favored-nation clause," which exists in our treaties with certain foreign powers. This clause it is claimed will enable those powers to demand of our Government the same or some of the same or similar privileges accorded to the Hawaiian government under the provisions of the pending treaty.

The answer to this objection is found in the fact that it is held by the highest authority in this and other countries that this "most-favored-nation clause" as used in treaties has no reference whatever, as its very terms would seem to indicate, to purchased privileges; or, if I may correctly speak, to purchased favors. In other words, that it cannot be construed as referring to or including within its scope privileges accorded to a nation by reason of reciprocal advantages given in return by such nation, and all of which are secured, not by the sole action of one government, but through the means of solemn treaty compact, including various articles of reciprocal pact and stipulation. The advantages which one nation obtains in respect of its commerce and navigation through treaty stipulations are, as a rule, not favors granted but advantages purchased, the consideration being the concession to such other nation of certain other privileges supposed to constitute a valuable and sufficient consideration.

The opinion of Hon. Caleb Cushing, as Attorney-General of the United States, in the case of the application of Denmark for the surrender of deserting seamen, (volume 6 Opinions of Attorneys-General,) states the rule of construction applicable to this character of treaty stipulations, and sustains it by cogent reasoning and unanswerable argument. In that case the question was whether the stipulation as to deserting seamen contained in treaties between the United States and sundry other governments, especially in that with Sweden and Norway, could in virtue of the "most-favored-nation clause" in our treaty with Denmark of April 26, 1826, be held to apply to Danish seamen? Mr. Cushing held that it could not, and President Pierce and his whole Cabinet concurred in that decision.

In that opinion Mr. Cushing uses this language:

The expressions in the first and eighth articles of the treaty with Denmark and similar expressions in other treaties as "favor" or "freely if the concessions were freely made," or "if the concessions were conditional on allowing the same compensation" are not applicable to advantages growing out of treaties containing various articles of reciprocal pact and stipulation; for such advantages are purchased upon consideration, upon mutual and correlative engagements, positively binding the good faith of the contracting parties with perfect reciprocal obligation in terms and manner as to the things to be done or suffered. Such treaty benefits are not favors, boons, or concessions. These expressions apply only to things proceeding from the mere will and pleasure of the state granting them in matters within its own sole jurisdiction, and which the other party, to whom they are proffered, may or may not in its own good pleasure accept.

And in further illustration of the correctness of the rule for which he was contending this eminent jurist said:

For example, if the United States should by their own law grant that iron in bars, bolts, or rolled, and iron prepared for railways, of the product and manufacture of Sweden, may be imported into the United States directly from Sweden, upon condition of paying a duty of 10 per cent. ad valorem, and that Swedish vessels laden solely with Swedish iron may enter the ports of the United States free of duty on tonnage, then Denmark might perhaps rightfully claim under its treaty with the United States that iron of like kind, of the product and manufacture of Denmark, imported into the United States directly from Denmark, should pay no other or higher duty than 10 per cent. ad valorem, and that Danish vessels laden solely with Danish iron should be permitted to enter the ports of the United States free from the duty on tonnage; because the grant to Sweden and Norway was of favors, upon condition as to the merchandise and freely as to the tonnage, and the same compensation could be paid by Denmark as was conditionally granted to Sweden. If, however, in a treaty between the United States and Sweden, the like terms as to Swedish iron and vessels to be admitted in the ports of the United States should be stipulated, and that cotton and manufactures of cotton and tobacco and manufactures of tobacco, of the growth and product of the soil or industry of the United States, should be admitted into the ports of Sweden and Norway and of the island of Saint Bartholomew, paying thereon no higher duties than at the rate of 15 per cent. ad valorem, with various other articles of mutual and reciprocal stipulations, in such case Denmark could not claim that the iron and iron manufactures of the product and industry of Denmark, and the vessels of Denmark, should be admitted into the ports of the United States upon the same terms as Swedish iron and Swedish vessels.

And Mr. Cushing, proceeding further, gives the reasons for this distinction in these words:

Because in the case supposed there would not be favors conceded by the United States to Sweden, but advantages purchased by Sweden of the United States, in consideration of the admission of cotton and tobacco and the manufactures thereof, of the product of the soil and industry of the United States, upon the terms mentioned in the treaty and of the other stipulations on the part of Sweden to be performed toward the United States; and because the advantages to the United States arising from the stipulations by Sweden and Norway could not be affirmed to be equally compensated by the like terms performed by Denmark toward the United States; and the difference of compensation due to the United States from Denmark for such like terms of commerce and navigation could not be determined by any certain standard, but could be adjusted only by a convention between the United States and Denmark.

In concluding this able opinion Mr. Cushing uses this language:

In fine, the assumed theory (referring to the claim of the Danish minister) proceeds on a series of fallacies, namely, that there is equality of political and commercial relations between all nations; and that every article of reciprocal treaty between any two nations is of equal weight and consideration, having an established, invariable value, so that it may be exchanged between any two nations at that fixed value; all which assumptions are contrary to the nature and truth of things.

From this, then, Mr. President, it follows, that whatever effect may be given to the "most-favored-nation clause," as generally in use in existing treaties between the United States and certain foreign powers, it cannot by any legitimate construction be held to draw in virtue of its office any benefit whatever to any such foreign power, or work any disadvantage whatever to the United States, by reason of any privileges, I care not how important or of how much value they are, that may be extended by the United States to some other power through the instrumentality of a treaty containing various articles of reciprocal pact and stipulation.

While then, Mr. President, in case the Congress of the United States should by law and in the absence of any reciprocity compact with the King of the Hawaiian Islands enact that such government should be favored with certain special privileges in our ports, superior in character and value to those possessed by any other power with which we stand in treaty relations, and which treaty contains the "most-favored-nation clause"—while, I say, in such case the office and legitimate effect of such clause would be to entitle such other power to all the special favors thus voluntarily conferred on the Hawaiian government by the sole action of the United States, yet, when these same or even greater privileges are conferred, not by the sole act of our Government, but by means of a treaty of reciprocity in trade, containing divers articles, in either schedule, of reciprocal pact and stipulation, no power on earth can rightfully question the validity of the compact or claim to itself any favor or privilege whatever by reason of any stipulation in its treaty to the effect that such government shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of the most favored nation.

While then the United States must not, cannot, concede favors to any power superior in character to those possessed by other powers with which they stand in treaty relation and with which they have stipulated that they shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of the most favored nation, without conceding ipso facto to such other powers the same or similar favors, yet, notwithstanding this, the right still remains to our Government, as one of the constitutional attributes of its sovereignty resulting from the treaty-making power which no nation can question, to purchase to its own use and benefit from any foreign power commercial privileges and advantages, granting in consideration thereof, through the instrumentality of treaty stipulation, special and superior commercial advantages to such foreign power. The treaty therefore to which we are asked to advise and consent being one of reciprocity in trade, containing various articles of reciprocal pact and stipulation, it follows as a necessary conclusion that no power in Christendom outside of the parties to the treaty has any right to claim any of its privileges or any similar or equivalent privileges, because, forsooth, such power may in virtue of its treaty, either with the United States or the Hawaiian government, be entitled to all the rights and privileges of the most favored nation.

I dismiss, then, this objection of the distinguished Senator as wholly untenable; as one that cannot be sustained by either constitutional or international law, reason, or argument; and in dismissing it I feel constrained to say that if the honorable Senator had been as diligent in investigating the principles of law involved in the constitutional objections urged as his labors in the Senate usually show him to be, he would not, I think, have pressed them with the zeal and apparent confidence that he has.

THE COMMERCIAL IMPORTANCE OF THE TREATY.

I now come to consider the proposed treaty with reference to its commercial and political importance, and to notice the further objections urged against it based solely on considerations of public policy. And in this connection I fear that the spirit of hostility to free trade and the twin idea of protection to American industry and home production, which constitute as a rule a portion of the political creed of one of the great political parties of the country, and to which as a rule I freely subscribe, stand to-day to some extent in the minds of some Senators as an objection to the ratification of this treaty. However this may be, it occurs to me that there are exceptions to all general rules, even in matters of great national policy; and whenever reason and argument and national interest and the present and future commercial and political security and prosperity of our nation unite in pointing to the exception rather than the rule as the true line of policy to be pursued, that then any party, and especially that party in whose hands are for the time being the destinies of this great nation, should not hesitate through any pride of opinion to adopt such course in the particular instance, although it may be opposed to the general policy of such party

This treaty, Mr. President, is exceptional in its character, whether considered with reference to its commercial or political bearings. The Sandwich Islands are, in one sense to-day, not a foreign power, but rather an American colony, whose interests and sympathies and desires and hopes and destiny all tend toward our Government. As the native population year after year has melted away through causes well understood and inevitable in their blighting results, its place has been to a certain extent supplied by earnest, enterprising, worthy, intelligent, daring Americans, who have planted the standard of civilization and progress upon these islands of the sea, surrounded their shores with a busy commerce, until they to-day, I concede, excite the cupidity and provoke the active rivalry of the maritime nations of the world. Their productions are not our productions, and yet they are to us not merely luxuries but the common necessaries of life; their sugars, sirups, melada, molasses, rice, and pulu are needed to assist in supplying the constantly-increasing wants of the farmer, the mechanic, the professional man, and the miner of the Pacific States and Territories. These, except in very limited quantities, cannot be produced on the Pacific coast; while, upon the contrary, those articles which the islanders have not but must have are produced in abundance on the Pacific coast—such as beef, bacon, pork, grain, flour, meal, bran, bricks, lime and cement, butter, cheese, bullion, coal, cordage, tar, pitch, fish, oysters, fruit, furs, skins, lumber, timber, shooks, staves, headings, and numerous other articles specified in the schedule of the pending treaty. Why then, Mr. President, not permit a free interchange of these productions, thus purchasing a small proportion of the actual necessaries of life consumed each year by the people of Oregon and California and of the whole Pacific coast, and paying for them not in coin as we do most other nations, but in the surplus productions of our own people? Why, I would inquire, should there be any objection to this? I have heard three objections stated and urged. I will give them in their order, and endeavor to answer each of them.

First. It is objected that to permit the importation of sugar free from these islands would be to affect injuriously the sugar interests of our own country in the Southern States;

Second. That it will injuriously affect the interests of sugar refiners on the Pacific coast; and Third. The annual loss to the Treasury of about $500,000 in the shape of duties on the importations from these islands under existing revenue laws.

Now then in reference to the first objection, namely, that it will injuriously affect the interests of southern planters; and it requires little more than a statement of a few facts to show the fallacy of this objection.

In the first place the consumption of sugar on the Pacific coast in 1873, or rather on that part of the Pacific coast supplied from San Francisco, California, and Portland, Oregon, was 75,005,005 pounds, while of this amount but a little in excess of one-fifth, or 15,743,146 pounds, came from the Sandwich Islands, although this constituted two-thirds of the whole sugar production of the islands for that year, the whole amount being little in excess of 23,000,000 pounds. So that, even should the amount of sugar consumed on the Pacific coast annually not increase from year to year, which is far wide of the actual fact, it would be necessary that the annual production of the islands should be increased over fourfold, and, in addition to this, that instead of our coast getting but two-thirds it should get every pound of that production in order that the demand of the Pacific coast alone should be met; and until this is done, and a surplus remains to force its way into the free ports of the Atlantic or the Gulf, how, I would inquire, could the sugar interests of this country be affected?

But, Mr. President, this is not all. It is a fact that must be borne in mind that the annual increase in the consumption of sugar on the Pacific coast each year above the preceding is in itself almost equal in amount to the present importations to the ports of that coast from the Sandwich Islands. In the year 1862 the amount consumed was, or rather the total amount of importations was, 62,861,460 pounds; while in 1873, the year following, it was 75,007,005 pounds, or an excess of 12,145,545 pounds; while during the past year the importations were still greater in proportion. The Secretary of the Treasury, in speaking of this large annual increase and of the probable effect of this treaty on the interests and revenues of the Government, says:

> This increasing importation and consumption, therefore, causes the question to stand, not so much as one of diminution of present revenues, but rather as a check to their increase to the extent of the importation of sugar and other dutiable articles made free. The lack of natural facilities for developing the production of sugar in the islands embraced in the treaty would keep down the future proportions of this check.

"But," says the southern planter who has not informed himself properly on this subject, and who is perhaps somewhat befogged by interested and wild statements of the sugar refiners, "throw your American ports open to the producers of the islands and the annual productions will soon increase to 150,000,000 pounds, an amount more than necessary to supply the demands of the people of the Pacific States and Territories." This, Mr. President, I deny, and one principal reason why I deny it is because it is a physical impossibility; besides there are many other reasons of minor importance abundantly forcible to sustain my position. I will proceed to show why it is a physical impossibility.

According to the uniform statement of historians, supported by the census tables of the Hawaiian government, the whole area of tillable and grazing lands on all the islands does not exceed 500,000 acres, and of this amount not over 100,000 acres at the very most are susceptible of sugar cultivation, while a portion of this area is so destitute of water and means of irrigation as to render its profitable cultivation extremely problematical. To-day the whole number of acres in sugar cultivation is only about 23,000, producing on an average about 1,000,000 pounds to every 1,000 acres. It therefore follows that if every foot of soil on the islands capable of producing sugar was put in cultivation the production would fall far short of the estimate made by the refiners, and would not exceed even then the amount in pounds that will be consumed the present year on the Pacific coast alone.

But how improbable is the statement that the annual production of the islands will be doubled even during the next seven years, the limit of the proposed treaty. Where is the labor to come from sufficient to work such a revolution in the productions of these islands? It has been said from China, but is this within the range of probabilities, when the price of labor there is but little in excess of that in China, and not more than one-fourth that paid on the Pacific coast for Chinese labor? Will Chinese immigrants, who leave their own land in order to secure greater remuneration for their toil, be likely to stop at the half-way house, however much we of the Pacific coast might desire they should, when by proceeding to our own shores they can realize from three to four times the amount per month they could in the Sandwich Islands? Or will the simple release from the payment of an annual duty of less than $400,000 be sufficient to work such a revolution in the industry and material prosperity of these islands, so as to increase its productions to any very appreciable amount? The idea is preposterous, and cannot be sustained by either facts or argument; for with a population diminishing in numbers at the rate of over 2 per cent. per annum, and with wages much lower than California and Oregon, there is but little prospect of a large immigration, or of a greatly increased production. The total native population, which in 1832, when the first official census was taken, numbered 130,313, has dwindled down to 49,044 in 1872, the total population now being about 56,000, and made up in this wise:

Natives	49,044
Half-castes	2,487
Chinese	1,938
Americans	889
Hawaiians born of foreign parents	849
Britons	619
Portuguese	395
Germans	224
French	88
Other foreigners	364
Total in 1872	56,897

Is there then anything, I would inquire, to be righfully deduced either from the number and character of the population, the productive area of the island territory, the present annual production, or the benefits that will inure to them from a release of duties now imposed, or from all these considerations together, that would for a moment justify the conclusion that the effect of the proposed treaty would be to affect injuriously the sugar-producing interests of this country in even the remotest degree? Most certainly not; and yet we are urged by certain private interests to oppose this treaty for this reason.

Why, the total importation of sugar into the United States in 1873 was 1,454,124,259 pounds, while of this amount but 15,743,146 pounds, or only about one-hundredth part of the whole, came from the Sandwich Islands; while the entire annual production of the Hawaiian Islands is less than 1½ per cent. of the sugar imported into the United States in one year, and less than one-third of the imports into San Francisco alone. When the sugar refiners, therefore, of San Francisco appeal to Senators from the South to oppose this treaty because its effect will be to bring Hawaiian sugars in competition with the sugar interests of this country, they are either wofully ignorant of or otherwise willfully misrepresent the facts. These interests are not jeopardized by this treaty; no, not to the extent even of the one-millionth part of a dollar.

But why should the refiners be so solicitous of southern interests? Is it not a fact that this opposition is made by those engaged in this particular industry not by reason of any fear to the general sugar-producing interests of this country, but rather from a belief that the adoption of the proposed treaty will in some way affect their individual interests as refiners of sugar? If the latter is the case, and if it is true that this branch of industry is to be stricken down or paralyzed, then they have, I concede, a right to be heard; a right to protest against any action upon the part of this Government the effect of which would be to strike down or seriously impair any legitimate industry, whether it be the refining of sugar or any other; and I take it the Senate of the United States would be slow to give its sanction to any measure if it were apparent that such would be the effect; but while this is so, no mere indirect and inconsiderable effect—falling far below any serious interference with private industrial enterprises—ought for a single moment to stand in the way of a measure of great national importance, as I conceive this to be.

And why, I would inquire, should the sugar refiners of San Francisco object to this treaty? How are their interests to be seriously prejudiced by its operation? The treaty does not empower the islands to import refined sugar. The language of the provision is "muscovado, brown, and all other unrefined sugar, meaning thereby the grades of sugar heretofore commonly imported from the Hawaiian Islands, and now known in the markets of San Francisco and Portland as 'Sandwich Island sugar.'"

Suppose the planters on the islands should erect refineries, they could not under the provisions of this treaty import their refined article into our ports free of duty. So that in this direction they have nothing to fear. Neither am I able to perceive anything in the probable workings of this treaty that will tend to the establishment of new refineries on our coast, and even were such to be the effect, I should regard it not as an objection to, but rather an argument in favor of its ratification.

I suppose the real ground of complaint, then, upon the part of the refiners is to be found, not from any fear of injury to or competition with their refined article, but rather through fear of a reduction of their profits on the residuum of their refineries, which at most cannot be very great; for it must be borne in mind that the refiners of San Francisco will have this advantage over those of the Atlantic coast; that they will under the provisions of the pending treaty obtain their raw material free of duty, while eastern refiners, in so far as they use the imported article, are compelled to pay duty. And while in respect to the sales of the residuum of their refineries their profits may to some extent be lessened, it cannot amount to any serious injury to this branch of industry, which to-day is perhaps something of a monopoly on the Pacific coast; it certainly will not either prostrate or paralyze it. And should this treaty have the effect of dividing to some extent the present immense profits of the refiners with the consumers of sugar in the Pacific States and Territories, I cannot see that there will exist any very great cause for complaint.

The farmer who tills the soil and earns his bread and other necessaries of life by "the sweat of his face;" the mechanic who from early morn to setting sun plies his vocation with axe and adze and plane and saw and plummet and line; the laborer with his hours and days of continuous toil with shovel and spade and hoe and hod; the merchant at his desk, the professional man in his office, the honest miner in his adventurous search for gold, the herder on the mountain side and in the green valley, and the fisherman by the golden waters of the distant sea—all these, scattered as they are up and down the shores of the Pacific, each in his proper and appropriate sphere, aiding, amid all the dangers and trials of pioneer life, in bearing onward into every nook and corner of this vast continent the sublime banner of American civilization and human progress—all these, with their wives and little children, have a right to be heard in reference to the questions involved in the treaty under consideration, equally with the refiner of sugar, whose coffers glitter with gold wrung in the shape of enormous profits on their productions from the daily consumers of sugar. I would not, Mr. President, as I have said, strike down or seriously impair this important branch of industry. I would, however, by the ratification of the pending treaty, divide the enormous profits of the refiner with the farmer, the laborer, the mechanic, the herder, the fisherman, the miner, the merchant, and the professional man, the consumers of sugar and molasses in Oregon and California and throughout the Pacific coast.

If the effect of the proposed treaty, as it unquestionably will be, is to give the people I have the honor in part to represent a free market and a better market than they now have for their surplus productions, and at the same time reduce to them the price on the sugar and molasses and rice and pulu and tropical fruits they consume; if it shall tend to build up, strengthen, and maintain a trade and commerce with our State and people, as I have no doubt it will, then, Mr. President, although these were the only considerations, I should feel indeed false to my duty, false to those implied pledges that always rest upon the people's representative in the councils of the nation, were I to sit idly in my seat pending the consideration of this question, or listen to or be influenced in my vote by the sordid voice of monopoly. I would not willingly deprive any corporation, however rich or great or powerful, of a single right; nor do I deem it necessary to do so; nor do I believe such will be the effect of the pending treaty. Should, however, the issue be presented, as it would seem to be in this instance, were their demands to be followed of promoting and advancing their pecuniary interests at the expense of and to the detriment of the masses of the people, then, sooner than bow to their dictation, I would see them sitting upon the wreck of ruined hopes, "childless and crownless," weeping over the desolation that surrounds them.

THE LOSS TO OUR REVENUE—ARE WE RECEIVING AN EQUIVALENT?

But it is said by the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and others that the loss to our Treasury of some $500,000 per annum is something we cannot afford, and that this fact of itself presents a sufficient reason for the rejection of this treaty. To my mind this objection vanishes into thin air when viewed in the light of the great advantages, commercial and political, that must follow the ratification of this treaty. It is true the loss to our revenue of a half million annually is an item worthy of serious consideration, especially in the cramped condition of the nation's purse; but, sir, what security, I would inquire, have we that in the event of our rejection of this treaty we will be able to retain the trade of these islands? They desire reciprocity of trade; they must have it. They desire this reciprocity with the United States. For this they have been struggling with unceasing energy for the past twenty years. This in my judgment is the final effort to secure it, and to become identified in a closer bond of unity, of interest, of commercial intercourse with our country. Should they fail now, have we not every reason to believe that they will reluctantly turn from us in disgust, and seek alliances of trade with some of the other great powers, who to-day stand ready to give them better terms? And then in that event what becomes of your revenue?

Leaving out of sight for the moment all political considerations, and viewing the proposed treaty solely in a commercial point of view, it seems to me we can well afford to remit the revenues we are now receiving from these islands in consideration of the commercial privileges accorded us in lieu thereof. Why, it is a fact, that the Hawaiian Islands, with their population of less than sixty thousand souls, are to-day larger consumers (with their tariff of 10 per cent. ad valorem) of the products and manufactures of America than the British West Indies and the Dutch East Indies and the Spanish possessions in the East all combined, though our imports annually from these countries amount to over $30,000,000, while we import from the Sandwich Islands only about $1,017,000; while China, with her 400,000,000 people and whose trade the United States are struggling to obtain, purchases from us only four times as much as do the Hawaiian Islands, and I doubt not but little more than twice as much as the islands will purchase of us should this treaty be ratified by the two governments; while Cuba, from whom we purchase annually to the amount of $77,469,826, or over seventy-five times as much as we do from Hawaii, is our consumer for only $1,397,729, or less than twice as much as we sell annually to the Sandwich Islands. These islands import now from the United States, under the existing revenue laws of the two governments, over 75 per cent. of the amount of her exports to this country, while our exports to Cuba do not amount to 2 per cent. of our imports from Cuba. Our exports to the British East Indies do not reach 1 per cent. of our imports; to the Dutch East Indies they are less than 4 per cent.; to China 7½ per cent; and other Spanish possessions, aside from those mentioned, less than ¼ of 1 per cent.

Under these circumstances, Mr. President, our commerce with the Sandwich Islands stands out exceptionally favorably in comparison with that with the other sugar-growing countries in respect of its value to the American manufacturer and American producer.

What the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury is, ever watchful as he is of the revenues of the Government, in reference to the remitting of present duties as provided in the pending treaty, is fully disclosed in his letter to Secretary Fish, and a copy of which is on our table. The facts and statistics stated in that communication constitute a complete answer to any objection to advising and consenting to the pending treaty by reason of present loss of duties. I commend its careful perusal to every Senator.

THE POLITICAL IMPORTANCE OF THE TREATY PARAMOUNT TO ALL OTHERS.

I pass, Mr. President, to a consideration paramount to all others, and which to my mind undermines and utterly dethrones every objection that ever has been urged, or that ever can be suggested, however plausible, against this treaty—a consideration in the presence and light of which the mere temporary loss of a few hundred thousand dollars of revenue pales into insignificance and becomes dwarfed in point of importance.

The geographical position of these islands with reference to our country and surrounding nations, in view of future military operations and naval conflicts along our Pacific shores, is one of incalculable importance, and of this fact England and France have not been nor are they now unmindful. Great Britain to-day through her colonies commands the South Pacific, and now, ever true to her history, she seeks to extend her empire, her influence, and her power by establishing a line of naval stations between those in the South Pacific and her possessions north of the strait of Fuca. Already she has possession of the Feejees, and now the only remaining station between this group and British Columbia are the Sandwich Islands. With them in her possession she would command the North Pacific as she already does the South.

A line run from the Feejee Islands, lately taken by the British, to British Columbia, on our northwest coast, runs through the Hawaiian Islands, and these once under British control they would complete a perfect chain of naval stations from Australia in the south, across the Golden Gate of San Francisco, the mouth of the Columbia River, and of Puget Sound—would command the harbor of San Diego, the termini of both the Northern and Southern Pacific Railroads, and would constitute a most formidable and standing menace to the future peace and commercial prosperity of the whole Pacific coast.

The commerce of the Pacific in the past decade, notwithstanding the statements of the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] in reference to the decline of the whale fisheries, has grown from what was then here and there a wandering ship into grand fleets, whose vessels are numbered by scores and hundreds. The Bay of San Francisco, the waters of the Columbia, and the harbors of the strait of Fuca and of Puget Sound, are the daily receptacles of ships of commerce from China, Japan, the eastern Indies, Liverpool, Mexico, Chili, Peru, and Australasia. Our merchant marine, our coasters, and our whaling fleets are constantly disturbing the waters of the northern Pacific. New York and China and Japan have been connected by one transcontinental railroad and steamship line, and soon will be, we hope, by at least one if not two more, connecting with lines of steamers across the Pacific; directly opposite the very harbors of this commerce of the Pacific coast, and directly in the track of that with China and Japan are the Sandwich Islands; midway in old ocean, between Asia and America, they stand as sentinels over what in my judgment will at no distant day be the highway of a commerce that will outstrip in value, importance, and grandeur that of the most renowned of ancient or modern times. Permit an enemy of that commerce to be planted there, with his fortifications and the protections of her harbors, even though he be the most insignificant of the maritime powers, and you permit that which will, if necessary to his purposes, seriously injure if not entirely annihilate it.

But if, instead of permitting this, we bend our energies and direct our policy toward converting these islands, in the legitimate and peaceful manner suggested by the pending treaty, into an outpost of American unity, a friendly and not a hostile sentinel over the destiny of American commerce in the North Pacific, we do much indeed toward insuring the present and future safety and security of that commerce, while the advantages of such a policy could only be exhibited in their real character, in their incalculable value to the Government of the United States and to the safety and security of the commerce of the Pacific States and Territories, in case of a foreign war; for in that event, with the islands under our control, where, I inquire, would a hostile power find a base of operations, save in barren British Columbia or among the sickly archipelagoes of the burning and distant tropics? The Pacific States and Territories have an interest in this question, it seems to me, that entitles them to be heard; an interest commensurate with the future peace and security of their people and their commercial and political welfare; but the interests of the Pacific coast are not alone involved in this question; the honor and influence of the United States as a nation, the safety of its commerce generally, and its political standing as a great maritime power among the nations of the world, are all involved in its consideration, and are to be affected by its decision.

How all-important Great Britain regards the control of these islands, in order to secure her undisputed supremacy in the waters of the Pacific, is disclosed in the fact that even now, while the Senate of the United States is considering and hesitating in reference to the propriety of advising and consenting to this proffered treaty, wherein, as if to escape the clutches of British power, we are offered all and even more that we could have reasonably asked, she through her New Zealand emissaries is engaged in pushing forward a scheme, the purpose of which is to confederate the Hawaiian Islands with others of the thousand islands of Polynesia, thus forming a grand colony under British rule. The American minister, Mr. Pierce, resident at Honolulu, in referring to this matter uses this pointed and startling language:

> Refuse the offered treaty, necessity will drive the islanders to seek for more intimate political and commercial relations with the British colonies of Columbia, New Zealand, Feejee, and Australia; and to eventuate in the Hawaiian Islands becoming also a colony of the British crown. * * * The danger— > of our thus losing all control over the Hawaiian group is imminent.

Says he—

And again he says:

> Hitherto the Hawaiin archipelago has maintained its independence, but there are strong indications that it may not much longer retain its present status, for already a scheme has been set on foot and powerfully supported by the chief officials of New Zealand, by which the Hawaiian Islands may be confederated with the groups of the South Pacific under British rule; these and other considerations indicate that the present time is most opportune for the United States Government to enter into more intimate commercial and political treaty relations with those islands.

Can we then as Senators, regarding as we all do the future well-being of our country, desiring as we do to see it stand in the future as now pre-eminent and invincible among the nations of the earth, equal with if not superior in position and prowess to the most exalted, and subservient to none—can we, inspired with these sentiments of good-will for the future destiny of our common country, view with any other feelings than those of intense alarm the probability of this great naval station, the future base of naval operations and supplies in marine conflicts such perhaps as the world has never seen, and in which may be involved the very existence of our Government, passing into the control of such a formidable rival as Great Britain?

Shall we in the presence of such a danger, a danger which our own minister declares to us is imminent, a danger that threatens to disturb the peace, the security, the commercial and political prosperity of the whole Pacific coast, and in the event of a war with Great Britain that will place the commerce of that coast, her ships and her navies, virtually in her power—shall we, I inquire, in the presence of such a danger, which I believe to be imminent, and the evil and sad consequences of which have not been exaggerated or overdrawn, sit with folded arms and composed minds, and hesitate, and conjure objections, and finally fail to do that which may now be done rightfully to avert this great national calamity?

We may refuse to act; but if we do, the time in my judgment will surely come when millions of treasure, a prostrate commerce, and the blood of the slain will be offered up as the penalty of our mistake. The day is rapidly approaching when the people of these islands can no longer maintain their autonomy, and when they must come under the control of some foreign power; this is inevitable; they admit it themselves; their past history decrees it, and the glimmering, waning light of their star of destiny confirms the decree. I believe it to be equally true that by the ratification of the pending treaty by which we strengthen our ties of interest, of commerce, of trade, we not only take it out of the power of other nations to secure their control, but we virtually secure it to ourselves. Is it not, then, true statesmanship under all the circumstances to act while we have the opportunity? To ratify this treaty is but to follow in the footsteps and be guided by the counsels of some of our greatest statesmen of both political parties who have now crossed the dark river; men who were wiser in their day and generation than we; such as Webster, Seward, Marcy, Polk, Sumner, and others, all of whom regarded these island as invaluable in a political and commercial point of view as a base of naval operations and supplies.

In 1841 James Jackson Jarvis, of Boston, the historian, in his work on the Sandwich Islands, said:

> Should any of the great powers seize upon them it might be considered as holding the key to the North Pacific; for no trade could prosper or even exist while a hostile power possessing an active and powerful marine should send forth its cruisers to prey on commerce.

And speaking of the islands for defense he says:

> A military colony once fairly established on them might put at defiance any means of attack which could be brought to bear against them.

While Mr. Webster was Secretary of State the islanders apprehended that the French intended to take possession of them, which fact was communicated to Mr. Webster, when he replied by saying:

> If the French take possession of those islands they will be dislodged if my advice is taken, if it takes the whole military power of the government to do it.

Such has been the view of American statesmen generally in reference to the importance of these islands.

Mr. Marcy, when Secretary of State, negotiated a treaty similar to the one now before us. Mr. Seward directed the American minister to negotiate another, which was done; and now a third one has been presented to us by the present Administration.

It is in my judgment the third and last call, and as a last grand inducement, exceeding in value and importance all others. His Hawaiian Majesty solemnly stipulates and agrees that so long as the proposed treaty remains in force he "will not lease or otherwise dispose of any port, harbor, or other territory in his dominions, or grant any special privilege or rights of use therein, to any other power, state, or government."

Shall the Senate of the United States decline the proffered concession, and thus virtually say to that government, we do not desire to treat with you upon any terms whatever, even though you place at our disposal and under our control all you possess? Would France or England hesitate to accept such terms? They have long been looking down with an avaricious eye upon their wealth and position, nor are they uninformed or forgetful of the importance of these islands as a military foot-hold in future gigantic efforts for the further extension of empire.

Mr. President, I must not further detain the Senate. I hope this treaty may be ratified. As a question of policy. I will say, as I have said before, it reaches in my judgment far beyond the mere selfish considerations of present or prospective benefit to a special few; its direct tendency will be to countervail that spirit of foreign encroachment that would imperceptibly but surely sever the bonds that unite us with the governments of earth, and surround our nation with a wall of unfriendly power. It will eventuate in checking the further advance upon our Pacific shores of that spirit that actuated the French Emperor, under the false pretext of demanding payment of certain moneys alleged to be due his subjects, to invade a distracted Mexico, and by a system of treachery, aided by armed force, place or attempt to place a foreign prince upon a throne at our very door.

Is it not the part of wisdom, permit me to say in conclusion, to adopt and pursue such a policy toward those governments with which we are most nearly allied in political and commercial interest, that will tend to interweave their interests with ours in such a manner as to render them inseparable by the strong arm or the cunning device of unfriendly power—a policy not dictated by a desire of conquest, not originated by the unscrupulous and mercenary motives that induced a bloody Charles V to dispatch Hernando Cortez, that he might rob the golden treasure-house of the Montezumas, but a policy such as is enunciated in the treaty under consideration, one dictated by that enlightened spirit of the nineteenth century which, burning in the hearts and dwelling in the minds of the American people, impels them onward, as if by an irresistible and divine power, to strengthen, maintain, protect, and defend, by every legitimate means within their reach, the magnificent structure of republican government under which we live.

The Hawaiian Reciprocity Treaty.

SPEECH OF HON. JUSTIN S. MORRILL,

OF VERMONT,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

[In executive session, the injunction of secresy having been removed by a vote of the Senate, March 23, 1875.]

March 18, 1875.

The Senate (in executive session) having under consideration the treaty of commercial reciprocity between the United States and His Hawaiian Majesty—

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I have no prepared speech to make on the present occasion and the only advantage I shall have over those who have spoken in favor of the treaty will be, as I think, that I shall not be on the wrong side. The people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent have no local interest in the proposed reciprocity treaty with the King of the Sandwich Islands, and my conclusions upon its merits will be, therefore, wholly based upon national considerations. Let me say at the start to those who were firmly fixed in their opposition to Canadian reciprocity, that however insuperable might be the arguments against it, the arguments in its favor were tenfold stronger than any which can be brought to the support of reciprocity with the Sandwich Islands, and the precedent to be established is not less dangerous in the one case than the other. What may be done with King Kalakaua may be done with the Queen of Great Britain or the Autocrat of Russia.

For twenty years, or ever since 1855, the proposition for a reciprocity treaty with the Sandwich Islands has been kept before us and persistently urged, first by Mr. Harris, then by Mr. McCook, and recently by Mr. Allen, a gentleman of culture and character, who was first sent out there as our consul, came back as their minister, and now, I believe, holds the place of chief justice under King Kalakaua. He has been most assiduous in visiting and button-holing Senators here and at their homes, as many Senators have informed me. Doubtless he thinks he is right in asking for the surrender of what will be but little for us and much for those to whom he now owes allegiance. The most potent argument now offered is the same suggestion that has heretofore been most prominently presented, as in 1855 and 1869, namely, that if we do not make this arrangement—so feeble are their numbers, so lamentably deficient are their resources—they will be compelled to lean upon some other power. Great Britain or New Zealand will snatch them up and they will be lost to us forever. Allow me to say if we are to come forward to the support of the paupers of the world—to bolster up all the islands, peninsulas, and continents whose waning finances need a tonic, or whose tottering dynasties are shivering in the wind—we shall have no lack of this sort of national missionary work.

But who or what is it that figures on one side of this compact, dignified by the name of a reciprocity treaty? Why, sir, a veritable kingdom of Lilliput, the whole trade of which does not amount to a tithe of that of the city of Memphis, Tennessee, or of the city of Portland, Maine, each having about 40,000 inhabitants. The population of the Sandwich Islands in 1860 is stated to have been 120,000, but our intercourse with them, philanthropic and enterprising as it has been, seems to have sadly diminished their numbers, so that now their census shows only 56,897 inhabitants, of which 5,366 are foreigners and 2,487 half-castes. It is obvious that these people, living in a climate which exacts little labor for a bare subsistence from those without ambition for anything more, will never furnish a market for any considerable amount of manufactures or products of any kind. Their means and their wants are equally narrow and are at the lowest point of semi-civilization. But poor and dwindling as they are, it is expected that a closer commercial contact and a free reciprocal intercourse will soon extinguish throne and dynasty, as well as the last fleeting breath of their national existence. Once the natives of this waif in the ocean would have Cooked and eaten us up in a different way, but this is a reversal of the feast to which we are invited, and now our power of digestion is to be tested.

It has been claimed in the opening speech made here that the proposition before us is one in the usual form of reciprocity treaties. Pray what is meant by the term of "usual form of reciprocity treaties?" There is no such form. We have no such treaties, and never have had but one, and that one of so unsavory a sort that it was abrogated at the earliest possible moment. We have had several reciprocity abortions—notably two with these same islands, or the proposed treaty of 1855 and that of 1869, both of which were rejected, although urged with the same persuasive arguments used to-day, including the never-forgotten one, that, if we do not do this, somebody else will right away. Besides these abortions we have had also the proposed Zollverein treaty of 1844, and the proposed Canadian treaty of last year, each in its turn having been coldly and very properly rejected. If it was intended to say that the present proposition is in the form of the Canadian reciprocity treaty of 1854, then I deny it. That treaty provided for the full and complete assent, by the passage of the laws required, of all the legislative departments of the respective governments before it was to take effect. This Hawaiian treaty, however, by its terms is to go into operation "as soon as it shall have been approved and proclaimed by His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands and shall have been ratified and duly proclaimed on the part of the Government of the United States, and the laws required to carry it into operation shall have been passed by the Congress of the United States of America."

It will be observed that the treaty is to take effect when proclaimed by His Majesty the King and by the Government of the United States—meaning the President of course—and the after-thought, tacked on at the end, about the laws required to carry it into operation is of little binding force if the arguments of some Senators are to be accepted as correct, that such a treaty as this, when advised and consented to by the Senate, will be the supreme law of the land, either by executing itself or by making it the duty of the House of Representatives or of Congress to consent to the passage of all laws required to carry it into operation. When Canadian reciprocity was before us, the form presented was very different and required the assent and action of Congress first and before ratification, but here, whether by accident or design, ratification stands foremost. Should Congress refuse or omit to pass any laws upon the subject, according to the extreme doctrines of some Senators here, none would be necessary and the treaty might still be proclaimed as the supreme law of the land without the co-operation of the House of Representatives. The Treasury Department would be able at once to order the sugar and rice and other articles received from Hawaii to be admitted free of duty, according to the treaty, and then might snap its fingers at Congress. In any event this part of the treaty should be amended,* for I will not assume that it is really intended to evade the future action of Congress as to the passage of the laws required.

I hope it will not be considered presumption in me once more to call the attention of the Senate briefly to what I hold to be the unconstitutional character of reciprocity treaties. The Senate itself has after elaborate reports twice decided against them, and has so

NOTE.—The Senate having passed a resolution authorizing the publication of all the speeches delivered on the Hawaiian treaty, it seems not inappropriate that something should appear from some one of those who argued against the treaty as well as from those who made carefully prepared speeches in its support. This is the substance of an extemporaneous speech, occupying when made about an hour and a half of time, and is as faithfully reproduced, after the lapse of some weeks, as it is possible by the author.

*This was subsequently amended.

repeatedly rejected them as to make them suspected and more than questionable as a class. Four have been squarely rejected and only one accepted. When the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations in 1844 made, through Mr. Choate, their well-considered report on the Zollverein treaty, the unconstitutionality of reciprocity treaties was so clearly demonstrated that the treaty was at once laid on the table as the most inoffensive way of getting rid of it. President Tyler, not being satisfied with this action, again urged further consideration of the measure at the next session, and then (1845) a final report by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Mr. Archer, of Virginia, was made, reaffirming the positions of the former report and re-enforcing them by additional arguments. There are few men whose indorsement would add much weight to the senatorial opinions of Mr. Choate, but his authority gives to me what I need, a very solid support. Mr. Archer, by virtue of his long service in the House of Representatives, was made chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate upon his first entrance here, and so continued to the end of his service. In the history of our country no man has had for a longer period a more controlling voice in the conduct of our foreign affairs than Mr. Archer. He claimed that the Zollverein treaty would have promoted our interests, and yet he rejected it on the higher constitutional grounds. If Mr. Archer and Mr. Choate, twice backed by a large majority of the Senate, found no warrant in the Constitution for such treaties, I hope to be excused for sharing their blindness.

Such a treaty as a reciprocity treaty was unknown at the time the Constitution was framed, and to-day there is not one existing in the world—between any nations here or elsewhere. It is wholly a new and modern invention. It may be claimed that the Cobden treaty between France and Great Britain was of this character, but such is not the fact. That treaty was for the reduction of duties and the removal of those of a prohibitory character. Its operation was not entirely satisfactory, having destroyed several flourishing branches of British trade, besides proving so detrimental to the revenues of France that President Thiers, at the close of the recent war with Germany, was compelled to ask for its abrogation.

The Constitution of the United States gives to Congress the whole power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. There is no residuum of power left to be exercised elsewhere. It is as exclusively belonging to Congress as any other of the provisions in the whole chapter, or as the power "to provide and maintain a navy," or "to establish post-offices and post-roads," or "to raise and support armies." What would be said of a treaty which should be made providing for a reciprocity in establishing post-roads—we to build one and Canada another? What of a treaty providing for doubling the number of our naval vessels or for reducing them one-half? What of a treaty that should reciprocally require a larger or a smaller standing army? And yet the treaty-making power is no more excluded from doing these things than from regulating commerce by making dutiable articles free to the subjects of the King of Hawaii. If any one of the distinct powers of Congress can be invaded, all may be. A reciprocity treaty is an instrument that may be made to do all sorts of work. It has the genius of adaptability for the big job of yesterday and for this little one of to-day.

Let me strip the husk off from these so-called reciprocity treaties, and that husk it will be seen is all in the word reciprocity. Look at the present treaty and from beginning to end there is nothing in it but a compact to regulate commerce with His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, from whence rice, sugar, and other articles are to be exempt, by the treaty, from the payment of all duties, while any other rice and sugar are not exempt. Congress regulates commerce only by the passage of general laws applicable to all the world alike, but here, under the guise of reciprocity, the treaty-making power undertakes to regulate commerce by a special bargain which grants favors to one kingdom that are denied everywhere else. How far and how long the Senate will advise the Executive to travel in this direction time will disclose, but to whatever extent it may go it will to that extent be a suspension of the legislative power of the nation.

Possibly it will be contended that all of our treaties more or less attempt to regulate commerce, but it will be found that not one of them attempts to make any compact as to the rates of duties to be imposed or not to be imposed upon the importations of produce or merchandise, the only object of commerce, and the point where alone it can be regulated. There is a difference in the comity and usage of nations as to the treatment of foreign vessels when visiting their ports, with freights or passengers, laden or unladen, for repairs or for stores, and our treaties very properly embrace such questions as salvage, pilotage, quarantine, consular duties and privileges, light-house and harbor dues, but these are mere incidents of our general intercourse with the world, and do not even pretend to touch the primary question of regulating commerce.

The Constitution explicitly declares that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives." One of the largest sources of revenue undoubtedly is the duty fixed by Congress on sugars, and this source of revenue the treaty is to step in and dry up so far as sugars from the Sandwich Islands are concerned. Of what value to the House of Representatives will be the power to originate revenue bills, if the treaty-making power should step by step leave nothing upon which such bills can operate? Will it be said that a treaty is not a "bill" and therefore is not inhibited? That would be merely a petty subterfuge. This is one of the popular privileges of the people—to tax or not to tax, when and how they please—confided to the sole guardianship of the House, and the House as long as it maintains its own self-respect must stand as a sentinel to resist attempts to exclude them from their full participation in the joint power of regulating commerce and especially to resist any diminution of their exclusive power to initiate all revenue measures—never intended to be initiated otherwise than by bills. The Constitution speaks in the imperative mood: they shall originate in the House of Representatives.

If reciprocity treaties are to become the settled policy of the country, then farewell to all stability in our revenue laws. The Executive will agitate these questions as well as Congress. We shall be subject to all the changes which foreign powers may successfully urge upon whoever may happen to be an able and influential Secretary of State. Our own interests will have to be bartered for the interests of foreigners, and reciprocal compromises will be the order of the day. There must be a pretense of equal sacrifices in order to give some meaning to the word reciprocity. In the present case we are to give up ten, if not twenty, times the revenue given up by King Kalakaua, and yet that is called "reciprocity!" It is obvious, if this policy shall be established, that any party when coming into power would find its first duty in a revision of reciprocity treaties. Free trade or protection could be established for twenty as well as for seven years, the limit of the present treaty, and long after any Administration responsible for such a treaty had been, it may be, driven from power by the verdict of the people.

These are no idle suggestions. Precedents for the exercise of power once established are seldom eradicated. Executive, legislative, and judicial bodies are prone to amplify and extend their jurisdiction and rarely practice self-abnegation by any restricted construction of their constitutional functions. I am sure that I do not desire to cripple the just power of the Senate, nor to diminish that affectionate respect so generally accorded and to which it has been so long historically entitled. But I trust I may be pardoned for avowing my deliberate convictions that reciprocity treaties are unconstitutional, and that they must be practically regarded as a serious invasion of the rights of the House of Representatives, and whether constitutional or not they will subject the Senate to popular criticism and jealousy that had much better be avoided. The exercise of legitimate power often excites detraction, but the exercise of doubtful power always excites execration.

I know that some of these objections are sought to be obviated by the proposition which looks to obtaining the assent of the House of Representatives. But the House, however, has no power to give its assent any more than it could delegate to the Executive the right to coin money or to declare war. The House of to-day cannot consent to waive its own right, much less to waive the right of the House of to-morrow. In spite of all treaties its functions and privileges must remain the same. No provision of the Constitution can be put out of sight and held in abeyance even for seven years by the forms of a treaty with His Majesty King Kalakaua, or any other foreign potentate.

Reciprocity treaties fly directly in the face of the "most favored nation clause," which exists in nearly all of our treaties with every nation in the world and bind us to admit the products and manufactures of one country on the same terms conceded to the products and manufactures of any other country. We have at least thirty-five of these treaties confronting us as an absolute bar to any special favors which shall not at once become common to all, or a bar to any treaty of reciprocity whatsoever. We have agreed over and over again not to do it, and the agreements being mutual were and are as much for our benefit as for that of others, being designed to prevent all discrimination either by ourselves or others, while reciprocity treaties have no other design than to establish discrimination. They are hostile and adverse to all other nations except the parties to the compact, and must be regarded as unfriendly by all whom its terms practically exclude.

It is true that I have sometimes pondered the question as to the propriety of making some discrimination in favor of republics, perhaps in favor of the South American governments, and certainly, if we were to have reciprocity anywhere, it would seem to be the part of broader statesmanship to make such compacts with Mexico, Buenos Ayres, the Argentine Republic, or Brazil—countries of sufficient population and wealth to give us some prospect of a larger market for our own products—rather than with the Hawaiian kingdom where our ambition must be satisfied with a prospect at zero or with a most pitiful and beggarly extension of commerce.

But, sir, on the whole, our ancient policy, handed down from the fathers, of holding all mankind "enemies in war; in peace, friends," is by far the wisest and safest national policy. Discrimination, by extending favors in one direction and withholding them from another, must in the end breed discord and arouse jealousies that will not tend to promote the interests of universal peace. Favoritism is ever odious. Should the policy of reciprocity treaties prevail to any extent it would create hateful "rings" among nations, quite as odious as any holy alliance of a by-gone age, and become the fruitful source of unnumbered fretful complications. Having promulgated the great American doctrine of the equality of mankind, let us not be the foremost to set the un-American example of granting special privileges to favored nations.

The Sandwich Islands include a small group, nearly midway in the Pacific Ocean, more than two thousand miles away from San Francisco, and about three thousand from China. But, although the most valuable, they are by no means the only islands of the Pacific, which is dotted all over with petty islands, forming a vast but very inconsequential archipelago. Among these are the Bonin, the Ladrone, the Marshall, the Mulgrave, and others, scattered far and wide, altogether too numerous to mention. Some geologists have supposed that in an earlier age there was a broad continent in the Pacific which has gradually sunk out of sight, leaving as islands only the higher elevations, and this sinking process, it has been affirmed, is still going on at Honolulu, but it is hardly probable that the islands will be submerged before the time named for the expiration of the proposed treaty, although this may be as much to be dreaded as the danger of which we have been forewarned, from their being gobbled up by the New Zealanders.

The financial question raised by this treaty, in proportion to its magnitude, will be a tough and unprofitable one for the Treasury of the United States. Measured by the past, it will deprive us of $500,000 of revenue. Measured by the whole amount of sugars annually produced in the Sandwich Islands, and this must be the actual test, it would at once be nearly double this amount, to be further augmented year by year until the utmost sugar-producing capacity of the islands shall have been reached. This capacity is variously estimated and will reach from three to five times the amount of the present production, which is stated to be from twenty-three to thirty million pounds. So that from one hundred to one hundred and fifty million pounds of Sandwich Island sugars may ultimately take the place of an equal amount coming from other places that is now subject to the payment of duties, averaging, for the class which will be received, not less than 3¼ cents per pound, and may soon involve an uncompensated loss to the Treasury of two, three, or four million dollars annually.

The charming reciprocity for our loss is that His Majesty King Kalakaua will surrender about forty or fifty thousand dollars of revenue, as hard for him to bear very probably as our much larger surrender; but if the owners of the sugar-plantations, after having over 60 per cent. added to the value of their product, do not replace twice or thrice the amount of the king's loss of revenue, their sense of gratitude must be obtuse, and they will deserve the treatment they might have received from the hands of the king's hungry ancestors.

The duty we have charged upon sugars has been, when under No. 7 Dutch standard, 1¼ cent per pound; over that and not over No. 10, 2 cents per pound; over that and not over No. 13, 2¼ cents per pound; over that and not over No. 16, 2¾ cents per pound; over that and not over No. 20, 3¼ cents per pound. By our recent legislation we have added 25 per cent. to all of these rates. Sugars of No. 13 Dutch standard are very passable common grocery sugars. The great bulk of the sugars from the Sandwich Islands will be brought up to or over No. 16 Dutch standard, and will compete with other sugars which would be charged with a fraction over 3¼ cents per pound duty. They will make the most profit on the highest grades, and of course will prepare and send these exclusively. The highest grades are as legitimately Sandwich Island sugars as the lowest grades.

Our market for their sugars is the best they can possibly have, treaty or no treaty, charged with duty or not. The duty is a sheer loss to us and a sheer gain to the twenty-five owners of the sugar-plantations, whether they reside in Hawaii or elsewhere. It is an immense subsidy to these wholly private interests and far more obnoxious than any subsidy which has heretofore found congressional advocates. However honestly intended by the parties to the negotiation, I feel constrained to denounce it as a job, the chief result of which will be to put money into the purses of a few Hawaiian sugar-planters, who have captured a good enough king to march at the head of their triumphant procession through the country at our expense and who by and by is to issue his royal proclamation ratifying the treaty.

When the rejected Hawaiian treaty of 1869 was before us it was claimed as a merit that all of the owners but two of the twenty-five were foreigners and almost wholly Americans. There is no doubt they are so now. They may be called smart, whether we are or not. We are proposing to pay for their ventures at least 3¼ cents upon every pound of sugar they may send to our market, which will nearly double their profits. No duty being imposed upon sugars imported there, whatever they require for their own consumption will hereafter be obtained from India and China, and it is quite possible their own crop will be miraculously re-enforced by these cheap oriental resources. If the sugar from the Indies takes another name, will it not be as sweet?

If we are to give such a bounty as this just at the time we have increased the duty 25 per cent. upon our own people to obtain more revenue, it seems to me that it would be far better to bestow it upon the home production of sugar rather than upon any foreign production. If we were to offer even one cent per pound bounty on home-made sugar, I cannot doubt but the increase of cane, beet, and maple sugars would soon far out-strip the whole product of the Sandwich Islands, and how much more it would contribute to the prosperity of our own people! California, not surfeited with the vast increase of Hawaiian sugars, produced most probably there by the employment of large numbers of Chinese laborers, would nobly strive with Louisiana for the mastery, and the gold to be sent abroad for sugars would be sensibly and profitably diminished. This was the policy of Napoleon in encouraging the culture of the sugar-beet, which at length, instead of requiring a bounty, was found to be so profitable as to be able to bear taxation when the cane sugars of French dependencies could not. The beet sugar of California now amounts to one million of pounds and is increasing. It deserves the tenderest encouragement instead of this neck-and-neck contest with the Hawaiian speculators. I would not unreservedly argue that a bounty on home-made sugars would be expedient, but I cannot hesitate to denounce the Sandwich Island bounty as wholly inexpedient.

The production of rice in our own Southern States and of the cane sugars of Louisiana and the Gulf States has been greatly depressed, and it is profoundly to be hoped that in spite of all obstacles they will, under the large protection offered by our present scale of duties, soon revive and pass any limits to which they have heretofore been confined. Surely our sugar-planters cannot look with any complacency upon the fact that they are to have the Sandwich Islands as equal competitors for a class of sugars similar to their own. In 1855 the objections of Louisiana Senators to a like treaty then proffered were thought to be very potential. Her interest in the question to-day is not less, but greater.

Will California and Oregon be benefited by this treaty? If they were to be, that might be claimed at least as a local benefit. But they will not obtain their sugar at any reduction from the market price, whatever may be exempt from duties at their ports. If that were otherwise the provision of the Constitution, that duties shall be uniform throughout the United States, would be indirectly violated. The only effect will be that the owners of Hawaiian sugars will obtain an advance in price just equal to the duties released, and the more we import of these, the less shall we import of other dutiable sugars. Our people on the Pacific coast will not be benefited in the slightest degree as to the cost of living, although it is not improbable their sugar refineries may be destroyed. Their occupation to a large extent will be superseded, and this will be a considerable local loss that will not be compensated by an increase of other trade. The poverty of the Hawaiians, their inferior state of civilization, and their deeply rooted habits of indolence, give no promise of enterprise, nor of any considerable expansion of trade. The removal of their 10 per cent. duties heretofore charged on some of our products will not be so great an advantage as to enable us to control their markets against all the world, and, if we could monopolize their whole trade, it would be a very small nugget in the commerce of the Pacific coast, or the merest trifle and wholly incapable of diverting attention from the vast field which lies beyond.

There was a time when Honolulu was of greater importance as a rendezvous of our whale fishermen than it is to-day. But the whale, that gigantic game of the ocean, seems to be disappearing. The hunchback, the sperm, and the right whale are no longer plentiful anywhere. The Greenland fisheries were thought to have been exhausted some years ago, although they have been so relentlessly pursued elsewhere that they have made their reappearance there, but in lessened numbers. The number of our whalers in the Pacific has been reduced from over two hundred and fifty to less than one hundred, and the catch, from an average of often one thousand barrels of oil for each vessel to less than six hundred. One-half of the whales taken near Alaska, or around the Aleutian islands, have also an unfortunate alacrity when struck by the harpoon of sinking beyond recovery and are lost.

The wonderful discovery of kerosene, or rock oil, has in a large measure superseded sperm oil. It no longer furnishes a cheap light. The vocation of whalemen no longer dazzles sea-going adventurers by its profits, and has ceased to be a world-wide necessity. Ocean-going steamers by their huge dimensions and rapid voyages absorb the freights of whole fleets of the smaller fry of sailing-vessels, and the bulk of the commerce of the Pacific Ocean, as elsewhere, will hereafter be carried by these steam leviathans of the great deep. The few whalemen we have left which may visit the Pacific will derive no advantages whatever by this treaty. Their interests are wholly untouched. They have always been allowed to deposit cordage and ship-stores there in bond and, upon returning to refit, to take what they wanted without payment of duties. Whatever flag covers the islands there will never be a government there so stupid as to deny such privileges to anybody. It is the chief link that connects them with the rest of mankind.

Once American statesmen might have felt disinclined to see these islands pass under the control of any other power, as it has been stated was the case with Daniel Webster. In that part of the message of President Tyler in 1842, supposed to have been written by Mr. Webster, it is true that he states such a condition of affairs "could not but create dissatisfaction," but he at the same time takes good care to say that the United States "seeks, nevertheless, no peculiar advantages; no exclusive control over the Hawaiian government, but is content with its independent existence and anxiously wishes for its prosperity and security." This was a position wholly at war with what we are now proposing to do. Webster sought no peculiar advantages then, and much less would he now, if he were living, with far less favoring circumstances, seek to give or take the peculiar advantages of a reciprocity treaty.

At the bottom of this scheme something more grave than this treaty it appears is impending. The superstructure of reciprocity might topple and fall if there was not something stronger at the base. The Hawaiian inhabitants are decreasing, it is declared, at the rate of 2 per cent. per annum. Soon they will be too few in numbers to support a monarchy or any other kind of national government. The government is a small drop in the ocean to be absorbed by the first larger drop with which it comes in contact. Their whole revenues from all sources are less, it is said, than two hundred thousand dollars. Already they are financially embarrassed, and must somehow borrow a million or two for immediate relief. They have no security to offer but their government and the islands. "Nor is the matter of much consequence," says Mr. Pierce, our minister resident, "inasmuch as the loan, if taken, can never be repaid." Whoever loans King Kalakaua a million or more, may exact the pound of flesh or the surrender of the islands whenever the loan shall become due, and we are teaching the king to lean upon us for such a loan as his most distinguished acquaintance. The treaty, if consented to, will diminish his revenues on imports forty or fifty thousand dollars, and how then, as we shall have been the latest cause of so much of his woe, can we refuse the loan? This is the tropical fruit the treaty will be expected to ripen and which we are to stand in readiness to catch when it drops. We are urged to make a reciprocity treaty because other nations will be eager, if we fail to do it, to make a loan that "can never be repaid." The next step in this little drama will be for us to tender the loan so greatly needed because New Zealand has already offered it, and King Kalakaua does not seek absorption in that direction, but prefers the honor of being the debtor of the United States. He prefers to take refuge when swallowed in a larger stomach. The ultimate object thus comes to the surface. It is to prepare the way for an island colony in the Pacific Ocean, not contiguous, but two thousand miles away from our shores. Should that be our American policy?

To Great Britain colonies have long been a necessity. First, to afford a market for her manufactures by which their dense population derive their only means of support; second, to afford an outlet for large numbers of the unemployed and more or less turbulent class of their people; third, to give official employment to the younger sons and lower ranks of their aristocracy. Colonies have therefore been the safety-valves through which the dangerous surplus of their population makes its exit, and by which political explosions and revolutions have been postponed or avoided.

The United States are under no such necessities. (1.) Our ample territory will afford our people room and verge enough for centuries to come. Our new States and Territories are panting for every soul they can induce to leave the older States. We have no surplus or turbulent population anywhere that we want to be rid of. The strength of a nation in peace or war lies not in dispersion but in concentration. (2.) Our manufactures yet fall far below what are required for home consumption, and we therefore have a better market at home than any we can create by means of colonies abroad. (3.) Nor do we desire to multiply places for official employments, and thus swell our already extravagant national expenditures.

The colonial system even to Great Britain has been an oppressive financial burden and the source of many wars as well as of bloody revolts on the part of the subjugated nations or other disputants. In these collisions it mattered little on which side the slaughter occurred, as in any event the disappearance of useless friends or dangerous foes could be dwelt upon with composure. In New Zealand these collisions have been constant and exhaustive. To-day the Canadian Dominions, Australia, and New Zealand might proclaim independence without a blow or a protest against it from the mother country. The colonial system is in its dotage. The discovery of new worlds no longer feeds this vanity of nations. The world will not long tolerate colonial monopolies, and the day is coming when no part of enlightened mankind will consent to remain the political underlings of any foreign rulers.

There is no attribute in the character of our people, and no principle in our form of government, that can give success to any system of American colonies. Our ambition has been properly limited to the desire that all nations should be free and independent. We have been trained to govern ourselves, not others. With all of our well-founded historic hatred of colonial systems, shall we, when all of its glories are becoming dim in the eyes of the world, start in the colonial business by an enterprise that will find its chief distinction not in its magnitude, but in its resplendent littleness? If we were to squat anywhere, or were disposed to add anything to the land-stealing fame of the Anglo-Saxon race, Cuba or Mexico might at least give some dignity and grandeur to a criminal blunder, but Hawaii is a mere speck that can only blot our record and make our eagerness for colonial appendages ridiculous.

There is one more notable argument, namely, that we need the Hawaiian Islands as a naval station, and this is as baseless as all the rest. It has been said that it is "due to the Pacific coast as a guard." Two thousand miles away from the Pacific coast, and yet to stand as a guard! This does not appear to me as a very substantial argument. The strong arms of the men of California and Oregon—and we have none worthier or stronger—are abundantly able to defend their own coasts. They need no other bulwarks to repel all assailants. Has Maine ever been afraid of Halifax or Quebec? Has she ever wanted any islands of the Atlantic to guard her coasts? No, sir! When in the progress of the negotiations for the settlement of our northwestern boundary Great Britain offered to give us Newfoundland for Oregon and Washington, the offer was at once refused. Distant islands must be defended and have no power to guard a continent.

To build up and maintain a naval station of any importance involves a large expenditure; and at the Sandwich Islands, if made entirely safe, it would be exceptionably large. All the harbors and coasts would have to bristle with forts, batteries, and martello towers. Wharfs, docks, and yards would have to be provided, and all the material for the purpose transported from our own shores. Men for garrison duty would have to be permanently stationed there, and naval vessels constantly sent and maintained to represent our flag. All this, however, would be of no consequence unless at the approach of peril we had at the instant more guns afloat there than our enemy. A stronger force than our own would capture the islands in half an hour, as we might do if they were in hostile hands and it was of any importance to us to possess them. In time of peace we can have all the privileges that are needful, as we have at Liverpool, Havana, or Bremen; and in time of war the islands would be a source of weakness by multiplying points of attack and by withdrawing from home the ships and men required for their defense. The rocks of Gibralter, Malta,* and Saint Helena are truly formidable and are very capable of defense, but if Great Britain should at last find her strength waning at home in comparison with other powers, all these would furnish to her own shores no security against an attack waged by an equal enemy and conducted according to the methods of modern warfare. But the Sandwich Islands have no resemblance to Malta and Gibralter, and could not themselves be made defensible much less capable of offense.

It will be seen that I am opposed to this treaty—

First. Because it seems to me to be in open and plain conflict with the provisions of the Constitution.

Second. Because it would establish a policy and a precedent of discrimination and favoritism in our intercourse with foreign nations—exposing us to the jealousies and ill-will of those less favored—and would be a broad departure from the true American policy of the fathers of the Republic.

Third. Because it offers financially little or no compensation to our Treasury or to our people for an extravagant subsidy, amounting to millions, bestowed upon a small number who own sugar-plantations in Hawaii.

Fourth. Because it is now, as it ever has been, a job of a few sugar-planters to enrich themselves at the expense of the United States.

Fifth. Because only on the most diminutive scale can it increase our commerce. The character of their population, small in numbers, destitute of property, little advanced in civilization, except in its vices, deplorably feeble in mechanic arts, education, science, and trade, forbids all ideas of an extensive or profitable commerce.

Sixth. Because we should not take any incipient steps toward the establishment of colonies which, if established, would be wholly incongruous and incompatible with the fundamental principles of our form of government.

Seventh. Because, if our full title to the islands were to be completed, we should have an elephant on our hands, costing large sums annually, of no practical use to ourselves in time of peace, and inspiring no dread among our foes in time of war.

Eighth. Because there is no general sentiment of the country in its favor, and because there is and ought to be a general sentiment in the House of Representatives against all so-called reciprocity treaties.

The Hawaiian Reciprocity Treaty.

SPEECH OF HON. NEWTON BOOTH,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

[In executive session, the injunction of secrecy having been removed by a vote of the Senate, March 23, 1875.]

March 18, 1875.

The Senate (in executive session) having under consideration the treaty of commercial reciprocity between the United States and His Hawaiian Majesty—

Mr. BOOTH said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I am exceedingly reluctant to intrude at this time upon the attention of the Senate, but as it is supposed the Pacific coast has an especial interest in the subject under consideration, justice to myself seems to require that I should briefly state the reasons which will control my vote. I do not believe that the people of California desire any local interest of theirs to be advanced at the expense of the general good, nor do I believe they have any general interest which will be substantially promoted by the ratification of this treaty.

In listening to the very earnest and able speeches of the Senators from Oregon, I was almost persuaded into the belief that if we failed to conclude this treaty, the trade-winds of the Pacific Ocean would cease to blow, its currents be reversed, and the Sandwich Islands would sink; or, at least, that some mysterious line of political and commercial quarantine would be drawn around the islands, which no American vessel could ever cross, and that American intercourse with Hawaiians would be forever "tabooed." But, Mr. President, none of these things will happen. Whether we ratify this treaty or not, the Hawaiian Islands will remain where Captain Cook found them, they will still be landmarks in the ocean, their harbors will be open to American vessels in distress, for supplies, for trade, and the Hawaiians will be ready to sell us what we wish to buy of them, and to buy of us what they need when the terms are satisfactory.

It is fortunate there is so little dispute as to the commercial aspect of this treaty as to greatly simplify its consideration in that regard. The population of the islands is stated to be 56,000, of whom 2,000 are Americans or their immediate descendants, 2,000 Europeans, and 2,000 Chinese.

Their exports to the United States in 1874 amounted in round numbers to a million of dollars, of which sugar constituted something more than nine-tenths in value. The entire production of sugar in the islands in that year was about 28,000,000 pounds, of which the United States received more than one-half. Under the existing tariff, 14,000,000 pounds of "Sandwich Island sugar" would pay an average duty of three cents per pound, and the loss to the Treasury by admitting it duty free would be $420,000; but under the provisions of the treaty, we shall receive the entire crop of the islands, and the loss next year would be $840,000.

Mr. CONKLING. Why will the loss be increased? If we received 14,000,000 pounds last year, why shall we get double that under the treaty?

Mr. BOOTH. We shall get the whole amount exported by the islands, because it will have an advantage of three cents per pound over all other foreign sugars. We shall get it as certainly as we do the Louisiana crop, and for the same reason. We shall draw that much less from Manila and other sources of supply in the Pacific, whose sugars will pay duty. It was admitted, and even argued by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] in support of the treaty, that the production of the islands at their maximum capacity bore so small a proportion to the consumption in the United States, that its admission, duty free, would not influence the price of sugar in our markets. Last year the Hawaiians supplied us with less than 1 per cent. of our entire consumption, and under the most favorable circumstances could not send us more than 6 per cent. Last year the consumption of sugar in the United States was 1,600,000,000 pounds, and the estimated annual increase is 30,000,000 pounds. I believe this argument of the Senator was correct, and that this proposition would be found true, even if our importation from the islands should exceed the largest estimate: for sugar, like wheat, is an article of such universal consumption, that its price at any given time is determined by the relation of supply and demand throughout the world, and its price in the world's great commercial markets is simply an index to that relation.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator from California allow me to ask him if price is not regulated by cost of production?

Mr. BOOTH. Ultimately, yes; immediately, no. The farmer in Wisconsin does not make a calculation after he harvests his wheat as to how much it has cost him to raise it, and then fix the price. He does not refuse a profit; he sometimes sustains a loss. When he has raised his crop, he finds a market price fixed; the quotation at London determines the price in Milwaukee; and he must either hold or take that price. It is true that if raising wheat paid an unusual profit its production would be increased; if it involved a loss it would diminish, so that the price is always gravitating toward cost, and in a series of years, with free competition, average price is average cost. Granting the general principle, that average cost determines average price, and making an immediate application to the case in hand, the price of sugar in the United States will be the cost of producing and transporting it plus a duty of three cents per pound. That will be the price the Hawaiian planter will get for his, though he will not pay any duty. This is not free trade; it is simply extending the protective tariff of the United States over the Hawaiian Islands, and while the Government loses revenue the consumers receive no benefit. It is not protection, for American production is not fostered. It is simply a bounty paid by the United States to the owners of sugar plantations in the Sandwich Islands. The treaty itself provides that this bounty shall go to these men, and to no one else; for if the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] was right in stating that removing the duty from Sandwich Island sugar would not affect the price, neither would it if the Hawaiian government should impose an export duty equal to that we take off; but this is prohibited by this treaty, which seems to be negotiated rather in the interest of the planters of the islands than of the governments which are parties to it.

This bounty of three cents per pound upon sugar the average cost of which is not to exceed five cents will stimulate the production to the highest capacity of the islands, and the loss to the Treasury will be determined by that as rapidly as the sugar lands can be brought under cultivation. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] in his very able speech in support of the treaty estimated that there were 100,000 acres of sugar lands in the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. MITCHELL. But a large portion of them not susceptible of irrigation.

Mr. BOOTH. I was about to add the qualification. He stated also that 1,000 pounds of sugar was about the production per acre. I regret that I have no exact information as to that; but the Senator from Louisiana informs me a good sugar plantation in Louisiana will yield more than 2,000 pounds to the acre, and as sugar-cane is indigenous in the Sandwich Islands, I do not know why the yield there with proper cultivation should be less, which would give 100,000,000 pounds as the product of 50,000 acres. The commissioners who represent the Hawaiian government estimate the probable production at 50,000,000 pounds, and certain gentlemen in San Francisco who are familiar with the subject estimate it at 135,000,000. The average annual production during the seven years this treaty is to continue would certainly not be less than 50,000,000 pounds, and the annual loss to our Treasury $1,500,000, (I think it would be much more,) without any advantage to consumers. What compensation are we to receive?

First. It is said by an increase of our exports to the islands. Why, Mr. President, the whole foreign trade of the Hawaiian Islands is less than $1,400,000. If we should get it all, it would simply be paying the planters a million and a half for the privilege of selling $1,400,000 worth of goods. If the profit on these exports were 20 per cent., we should pay something more that five dollars for one. I have no doubt we could buy the markets of the world upon the same terms, but the difficulty is that after paying for them we should have nothing left to sell.

Mr. EATON. Would not the foreign trade of the islands increase with increased production of sugar?

Mr. BOOTH. It would increase, but not in that proportion.

The mere diversion of labor to raising sugar would not largely increase the demands of a people who live in a tropical climate and do not know the artificial wants of high civilization. The planters, it is true, would be very ungenerous if they should not take a part of the annual subsidy it is proposed to give them "in trade."

The removal in our favor of the 10 per cent. duty imposed now by the Hawaiian government would by no means give us the exclusive control of that market. It would not open it to that large class of American goods which require a protection of from 30 to 50 per cent. to give them a market at the doors of the manufactories. If it would, a duty of less than 10 per cent. is all the protection American manufacturers require.

Why, Mr. President, there are less than forty of these Hawaiian sugar planters—not to exceed three thousand men employed, four-fifths of whom are natives, the remainder nearly all Chinese. Treble these and you have not a population for an eighth-class American city. Then take into consideration the limited wants, the primitive habits of the natives, the wages of labor but twelve dollars per month—and where is that magnificent market which captivates the imagination and is to induce us to conclude a treaty which disturbs the uniformity of our revenue system and infringes upon the constitutional prerogative of the House of Representatives to have a potential voice in matters of revenue?

But, Mr. President, it will not be seriously contended that this treaty with a nation which the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] aptly styled the Kingdom of Lilliput has been negotiated upon our part for any commercial purpose. The object is political. It is assumed that by bringing ourselves into special relations with the Hawaiian Islands we shall acquire a protectorate over them, and eventually their sovereignty.

The means seem to me of doubtful success, the object of more than doubtful utility. the subject a matter of such grave importance that it ought not to be disposed of upon a mere assumption without that full discussion which is impossible in the short time left for its consideration.

About two years ago an eminent citizen of the United States went to the Hawaiian Islands with authority to open negotiations to obtain the possession of Pearl Harbor. This harbor is practically of no use to the Hawaiians, on account of the narrowness of its entrance, through an opening in the reef, and the Hawaiian government is not able to widen it. The Hawaiian government would not entertain the proposition, as it would certainly give offense to the sentiment of the people and possibly to foreign powers. Is it probable that government will be disposed to make greater concessions hereafter than it would when upon the verge of bankruptcy and dissolution—perils from which it hoped this treaty will save it?

But it is suggested that by creating a demand for American capital, enterprise, and labor, in extending our protective tariff over Sandwich Island sugar, an immigration will be drawn to the islands from the United States which will eventually control the Hawaiian government; that an American colony will be first established in sentiment, afterward in fact. If the limitations placed upon the capacity of the islands to produce sugar by the supporters of this treaty when they estimate loss of revenue are correct, this colony would be far too small to accomplish any such purpose. Be their capacity small or great, the demand for capital and labor will not necessarily be supplied from the United States. It is reasonable to suppose they would go from the countries where they are cheapest. The Senator from Oregon who spoke last [Mr. KELLY] stated that the Chinese would not go to the islands, as they could get better pay in California. If that be true, the invitation to American labor is not very enticing.

The American element now in the population of the Sandwich Islands is due to two causes which have been so greatly modified as to be practically obsolete—the enterprise of American missionaries in taking possession of this field of missionary labor, and the convenience of Honolulu to the American whaling fleet in the Pacific before the settlement of California and Oregon and when the whale fisheries were important. If you attempt to substitute for these causes simply an invitation to capital by offering profitable investment, you will be quite as likely to find the European buying out the American planter as the American opening new plantations. Who ever may go on this open invitation to raise sugar immediately, and revolutionize a government remotely, will employ the labor he finds there—and that will not be American.

Finally, Mr. President, is it certain that we want the sovereignty of the Hawaiian Islands, if we could get it for the asking? Are we prepared to-day to enter upon a scheme of colonization? Heretofore, with the exception of Alaska, all the territory we have ever acquired has been contiguous, and has or will become a part of a homogeneous political plan. I suppose no one now expects to erect the Hawaiian Islands into a State, and the suggestion that they may become a dependency of California is at least more visionary than practicable. No, sir, this colonial idea means an innovation upon our general plan of government. It will be a government at Washington of islands 2,000 miles distant from our nearest port. It means that we are to become a great naval power, with distant possessions which it is a point of honor to defend, with all the additional expense and strengthening of the central government which that implies. It means that we, a continental republic, shall enter upon a colonial system like that of the insular kingdom of Great Britain, and which many of the wisest of British statesmen to-day regard as the great mistake in the policy of their government. It is only a beginning, but a beginning which in my judgment we should avoid.

To-day a commissioner of the United States is sailing upon a United States vessel to the Samoan Islands, bearing presents of peace and good-will in the shape of implements and munitions of war to barbarous chiefs of warlike tribes.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. KELLY] urged that we ought to take steps to acquire these islands as they might become in unfriendly hands the base of naval attacks upon our Pacific coast, and instanced as an illustration the annoyance we suffered from the British islands in the West Indies in the war of the rebellion. Why, sir, these were under our shores, yet we refused San Domingo, and the Hawaiian islands are almost as distant from our Pacific as England is from our Atlantic coast.

It is one of the infirmities of our nature, Mr. President, that after we have mastered a specialty it masters us. It is probably almost impossible for a naval officer, an enthusiast in his profession, not to regard every island in the seas as a useful base for operations in naval warfare. So to the military engineer the value of a harbor is in its sites for fortifications. The physician may sometimes speak of a beautiful case of small-pox, the surgeon of a superb compound fracture.

It is possible that the possession of the Sandwich Islands might prove a convenience in the event of war between this nation and a naval power, but is it wise to change our political policy to secure so small an advantage for so remote a contingency? We have been a nation nearly a hundred years, and have had a war of three years with a naval power. It is said that the best way to preserve peace is to be prepared for war, but it is even more true that the best way to be prepared for war is to cultivate the arts and preserve the policy of peace.

I differ, Mr. President, with great diffidence upon this question from the other Senators of the Pacific coast States, but I can come to no other conclusion. I can see in the avowed commercial purposes of this treaty nothing but loss, in its real political object nothing but danger.

The problems of our Government are difficult enough without further complications, and there is room on this continent for our highest ambition.

PRAYER.

Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D., Chaplain to the Senate, offered the following prayer:

Almighty and everlasting God, we adore Thee as the Supreme King. May we believe and trust in Thee as our Father in heaven, the Author of every blessing. As we come into this place, yet dark with the shadow of national bereavement, as Thy servants assembled together here, and some who were with them last shall come no more, help us to realize the truth that we too are mortal; that our days are swift as arrows; that our work will quickly cease; that the sunset will be upon us ere ever we come to know it.

O, Lord our God, we thank Thee for the kindness shown to these Thy servants, in that Thou hast brought them together here from many distant points in health and safety. Remember them still for good. Bless Thy servant the President of the United States, and all in authority over us. Bless the Congress now convened to enter upon their labors. Bless this whole nation with the presence and the power of Thy Holy Spirit, and with a deeper faith in Thee, through Jesus Christ. Amen.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. COOPER presented the credentials of David M. Key, appointed by the governor of the State of Tennessee a Senator from that State, to fill, until the next meeting of the Legislature thereof, the vacancy caused by the death of Andrew Johnson.

The credentials were read; and the oaths prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. KEY, he took his seat in the Senate.

NOTIFICATION TO THE HOUSE.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, it was Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate has assembled, and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

HOUR OF MEETING.

On motion of Mr. HAMLIN, it was Ordered, That the hour of the daily meeting of the Senate be twelve o'clock m., until otherwise ordered.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. ANTHONY offered the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two members be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the committee; and Messrs. ANTHONY and THURMAN were appointed.

RECESS.

Mr. ROBERTSON, (at twelve o'clock and twelve minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate take a recess for thirty minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of the recess (at twelve o'clock and forty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate reassembled.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I offer the following order:

Ordered, That the petition and papers of T. T. Garrard and others, of Kentucky, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator that no committees have yet been appointed.

Mr. STEVENSON. Let the order lie on the table, then, for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will lie on the table until the committees are appointed.

DEATH OF THE VICE-PRESIDENT.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I rise to announce in the Senate the death of the Vice-President of the United States, and to say that at an early day resolutions relating to his life, character, and public services will be proposed for the consideration of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suppose that there is no probability of receiving a message from the House until very late, if at all, to-day, and I see no impropriety in the Senate adjourning.

Mr. CONKLING and others. Let us adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. If there be no objection, I will make that motion. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at twelve o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

The following members failed to answer to their names:

SAMUEL A. DOBBINS, of New Jersey; ALBERT G. EGBERT, of Pennsylvania; ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, of Georgia; and ADDISON OLIVER, of Iowa.

Mr. MACKEY, of Pennsylvania, stated that his colleague [Mr. EGBERT] had gone home on account of a death in his family.

When the thirty-third district of New York was reached,

The CLERK said: For the thirty-third district of New York the vacancy on the roll, caused by the death of the gentleman originally returned, has not been filled. The action of the State board of canvassers upon the returns of the late election has been received at the Clerk's office, but, being of unusual form, is submitted for the action of the House.

When the State of Louisiana was reached,

The CLERK said: Respecting Louisiana, the Clerk begs to say that he has received two sets of certificates as to the first five districts—one signed by William Pitt Kellogg as governor of Louisiana, the other signed by John McEnery as governor of Louisiana. The Kellogg certificates were all received by the Clerk prior to the adjournment of the Forty-third Congress. One of the McEnery certificates was also received during that session; the others at different dates during the last summer and fall. The two sets of certificates agree in declaring the same persons elected in the first, second, third, and fourth districts. In the fifth, the Kellogg certificate declares Mr. Frank Morey elected; the McEnery certificate declares Mr. William B. Spencer elected. As to the sixth district, no McEnery certificate has been presented. The Kellogg certificate declares Mr. Charles E. Nash elected. The Clerk has enrolled all the gentlemen bearing the Kellogg certificates as coming from the de facto governor recognized by the last House of Representatives.

At the close of the call,

The CLERK said: Two hundred and eighty-six members having answered to their names, and that being more than a quorum, the Clerk is now ready to receive a motion to proceed to the election of Speaker.

Mr. LAMAR. I move that the House do now proceed to the election of Speaker, preparatory to the organization of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Mr. Clerk, I hope the rules of the House as to the privileges of the floor will be rigidly enforced. There are a number of members-elect standing in the aisles who cannot obtain seats to which they are entitled.

The CLERK. The Doorkeeper of the House will enforce the rules, and all persons not entitled to the privileges of the floor will please retire from the Hall. The persistence of persons not entitled to the privileges of the floor who occupy places in the rear of the seats is a great impropriety, in violation of the rules of the House. They will please retire and give gentlemen having the right to the Hall their full privilege.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Clerk, the trouble is that a number of seats are occupied by those not entitled to the floor, and that, too, while there are members-elect of this House who have no chairs in which to sit down.

The CLERK. That is a still grosser violation of the rules of the House than occupying places in the rear of the seats. Members-elect are entitled to occupy chairs in the Hall, which are limited to the number of Representatives-elect.

Nominations are now in order for Speaker.

Mr. LAMAR. I place in nomination for the office of Speaker of this House for the Forty-fourth Congress MICHAEL C. KERR, member-elect from the State of Indiana.

Mr. WHEELER. I nominate for the same position Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE, of Maine.

The CLERK. There being no further nominations, the Clerk requests that Mr. HOLMAN of Indiana, Mr. CLYMER of Pennsylvania, Mr. DANFORD of Ohio, and Mr. BANKS of Massachusetts, will please act as tellers. The tellers will please take their places.

The House then proceeded to vote viva voce for Speaker, with the following result, which was announced by Mr. HOLMAN on behalf of the tellers:

Whole number of votes cast, 282; necessary to a choice, 142; of which—

MICHAEL C. KERR received	173
JAMES G. BLAINE received	106
ALEXANDER CAMPBELL received	1
WILLIAM B. ANDERSON received	1
ALPHEUS S. WILLIAMS received	1

The following is the vote in detail:

The Clerk announced that MICHAEL C. KERR, one of the Representatives from the State of Indiana, having received a majority of all the votes given, was duly elected Speaker of the House of Representatives for the Forty-fourth Congress.

Mr. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, and Mr. BLAINE of Maine, having been nominated by the Clerk for that purpose, conducted Mr. KERR to the chair amid applause, when he addressed the House, as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I am heartily grateful for the honor you have conferred upon me in calling me to this exalted station. I profoundly appreciate the importance and delicacy of its duties. I shall doubtless many times need your patient indulgence. I pray that you will grant it; and, with nothing but kindly feelings toward every member of the House, I promise that in all my official acts I will divest myself, to the utmost of my ability, of all personal bias, and observe complete fairness and impartiality toward all, and toward all the great and diversified interests of our country represented in this House.

Mr. KELLEY, being designated by the Clerk as having served longest continuously as a member of the House, administered to the Speaker-elect the oath prescribed by law.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate was announced, when Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, said: I am directed by the Senate to inform the House that a quorum of the Senate has assembled and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business; also, that a committee has been appointed by the Senate, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make; and that Mr. ANTHONY and Mr. THURMAN have been appointed as such committee on behalf of the Senate.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBERS.

The SPEAKER proceeded to administer to the members in attendance the oath of office. The members presented themselves, as their names were called, by States, and took respectively the "test-oath" prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, or the special oath provided in the act of July 11, 1868, for those who, having participated in the recent rebellion, have had their legal disabilities removed by a vote of two-thirds of each House of Congress.

When the State of Louisiana was called,

Mr. WOOD, of New York, said: I ask that Mr. Morey, claiming the seat from the fifth district of Louisiana, stand aside.

When the State of Virginia was called,

Mr. GARFIELD said: I ask that Mr. John Goode, jr., from the second Virginia district, stand aside.

At the close of the swearing in of members,

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, said: I move that Hon. John Goode, jr., member-elect from the second district of Virginia, who holds the regular certificate according to the laws of the Commonwealth by which we have all taken our seats, be allowed to qualify now.

He has the prima facie case; and I believe it is the universal custom of the House in such cases to permit the party holding the prima facie evidence of the right to a seat to qualify, and then let the contest, if there be one, go on before the Committee on Elections. I will ask for the reading of the certificate of election of Mr. Goode.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that the question must first be taken upon the member who was first called upon to stand aside. That question must first be decided.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Very well, then; I will reserve the question for a moment.

FIFTH DISTRICT OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. At my request Mr. Morey, of Louisiana, was required to stand aside. I objected to his being sworn in as a member of this House because he lacks the prima facie evidence of election; and I predicate my doubt as to that fact very much on the statement made by the Clerk with reference to the certificates from the governor of Louisiana when he called the Representatives from that State.

It will be recollected that he told the House that from the State of Louisiana gentlemen presenting themselves had filed certificates in his office from two persons both claiming to be governor of the State; but in this instance that I refer to, that of Mr. Morey, he presents but one certificate. And thus, sir, a very grave doubt is raised as to whether he has got that kind of credential which will entitle him to be sworn in and occupy the seat awaiting the decision of the question by the Committee on Elections. I offer, sir, the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas William B. Spencer and Frank Morey have each filed with the Clerk of this House a certificate of election as a member of the Forty-fourth Congress from the fifth congressional district of the State of Louisiana, both of said certificates being in due form as prescribed by law, and respectively signed by John McEnery and William P. Kellogg as governor of the State of Louisiana, with the seal of the State affixed thereto:

Be it resolved, That the credentials of said claimants and papers in the possession of the Clerk in relation thereto be referred to the Committee on Elections, when appointed, with instructions to report at as early a day as may be practicable which of said claimants should be sworn in as a member of this House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to raise the question at this time as to who is the legal governor of the State of Louisiana. It is not pertinent to this inquiry to determine that question. The sole and exclusive question is as to what form of credentials the claimant in this case presents.

If no gentleman desires to discuss the question I will move the previous question; but I will yield to any gentleman for a brief period, say five or ten minutes, who desires to discuss it.

I yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] for ten minutes.

Mr. BLAINE. I will be glad to have the resolution read.

The Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker, if that resolution shall be adopted, it would put on the records of this House a statement of facts, or purporting to be facts, for which there is no possible ground. There is no more official ground for speaking of John McEnery as the governor of Louisiana than there is for so speaking of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.] No department of this Government has ever recognized him as such. And this House of Representatives, by a very large vote, after Mr. Kellogg had been recognized by the executive department of the United States for years as the governor of Louisiana—this House of Representatives last winter, by a very large vote, to which many gentlemen on the other side of the House were consenting, and more of them anxious that the resolution should pass, solemnly recognized Kellogg as the governor of Louisiana.

And for the gentleman from New York to embody in a resolution the statement, and to commit this House to the statement, that the governorship of Louisiana is still a matter of doubt, is still in suspense, and that it is not an absolutely settled and adjudicated matter, is to place this House in a wrong position.

Any gentleman in the State of New York might send forward here a certificate giving the credentials of the district which the gentleman himself represents to some other man, and he would have precisely the same ground to arrest the swearing in of the gentleman from New York as had that gentleman to arrest the swearing in of the gentleman from Louisiana.

And the gentleman is mistaken in a matter of fact. The statement that all of the others sworn in from Louisiana had certificates from both the claimants of the office of governor of that State is not the fact. One gentleman has already been sworn in with only the certificate from Governor Kellogg.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. It was unchallenged.

Mr. BLAINE. Precisely. But if the governor of Louisiana is not competent to give a certificate, why should not it have been challenged? Why should the gentleman from New York, the watchful guardian of the interests of this House, permit a man to be sworn in upon the certificate of one whom he does not acknowledge to be the governor of Louisiana?

The Clerk of the House, from excess of care, and in the conscientious discharge of his duty, brings to the attention of the House these different certificates, which he does properly enough, perhaps, though I think the Clerk would have been entirely justified in tearing them up as waste paper and putting them into the waste basket. They are impertinent here; they have no ground to stand upon; and it would utterly disorganize all regular proceedings at the very threshold of this session, on a preliminary case of this kind, to attempt to introduce and revive the Louisiana question. I trust the gentleman from New York will not do that in this case. I therefore move to substitute for the resolution which has been read a motion that the gentleman holding the certificate from the governor of Louisiana be now sworn in.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield for that motion?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I do not. The papers in the case is the answer to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.] If it really was, as assumed by my friend from Maine, that there is no possible question as to who is the legal governor of the State of Louisiana, why is it that his own friend and partisan from that State has deemed it necessary and proper to obtain the certificate of Governor McEnery? All of the gentlemen from that State, and there are six of them—all except one, about whose right to the seat there can be no question, whether McEnery or Kellogg be governor—have deemed it sufficiently important to come here clothed with certificates signed by each of these so-called governors.

Now I do not propose, as suggested by the gentleman from Maine, by the presentation of this question, to raise the great question involved, of who is or is not the governor of Louisiana. It is not necessary for our purpose now to raise that question. This is a preliminary inquiry, directed by the House to be made by the Committee on Elections, when appointed, as to who in the first instance is ostensibly entitled to the seat. That is all there is in it. We determine nothing by this reference; we settle no question. That is a matter to be determined by this House, after investigation by that committee; after the report of the committee; a question for this House to consider and determine. In this preliminary investigation and inquiry, the only question for us to determine is whether in the first instance this gentleman presents that kind of certificate which from its form entitles him to a seat until the inquiry shall be prosecuted and determined. I now renew the motion for the previous question.

Mr. WHEELER. Will my colleague yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Yes, sir, for a few moments.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I had trusted that this question as to who is governor of Louisiana had been set at rest, at least until the next general election. I am surprised that, for the paltry advantage which is now sought, this question should now be raised here. I would state, in addition to what the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] has said, that Mr. Kellogg has been recognized as the governor of the State of Louisiana, not only by the President of the United States and by this House, but also by the people of the State of Louisiana; by solemn enactment, by a statute passed by the Legislature at its extra session in April last. I state, further, that this man, Mr. Spencer, has precluded himself from the advantage of this motion by having made himself a contestant. The files of the Clerk's office afford proof of the fact that testimony has actually been taken in this case, Mr. Spencer having given notice as a contestant of Mr. Morey. The gentleman speaks of the form of the certificate. Why, sir, the certificate in the case of Mr. Nash, which has not been challenged here at all, is identical in form and substance with the certificate of Mr. Morey. There is no difference whatever.

You gentlemen of the opposition have the majority here. You will appoint through your Speaker the Committee on Elections and will have a majority there. You have the power any day to foreclose this question. Why should you break down all precedents and all rules of law? There is no better settled principle of law than that you cannot try the title to an office in the collateral way in which you are seeking to do it here. There is no better settled principle of law than that the acts of an officer de facto are valid as respects third persons. You seek by this line of action to break down all these principles of law and all these precedents, when you have it in your power on any day of the session to bring this matter to a termination and to decide who is entitled to this seat. I trust that the majority here will not take any such line of action as is here proposed.

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] yield for a question?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRYE. Is there any record since the election of 1872 in the State of Louisiana of a single official act of Mr. McEnery except this single one of signing these certificates?

Mr. WHEELER. Not one. There is no man here who has the hardihood to assert that McEnery made any proclamation for an election in the State of Louisiana; that any returns were ever made to a returning board recognized by him. There is no solitary official act to be found in the archives of this whole Government which supports the claim of McEnery ever to have been elected governor of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. In conclusion, I will say but one word in reply to my colleague, [Mr. WHEELER,] who, it will be recollected, was the chairman of the committee that the last House of Representatives sent down to Louisiana to investigate the condition of affairs there. In answer to the gentleman, it is only necessary to refer to the remarkable fact that in their report, and in the substance of the conclusions at which the committee arrived, they confined themselves entirely to the question as to the election of a Legislature, not taking into consideration the election of governor, which will be the question before this House at the proper time.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] to something in the framing of his resolution which I think he does not mean.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I should be very sorry to state anything I did not mean.

Mr. HOAR. The point which I think the gentleman does not design is that the resolution refers to the committee only the credentials and the papers in possession of the Clerk connected with the credentials, and on them directs the committee to determine, not who has a prima facie case, but who is entitled to the seat; in other words, it requires the Committee on Elections to determine the final question upon merely these credentials and the attendant papers.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Speaker, I concur with the suggestion thrown out by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] that the only question presented in this case is the question of the prima facie right of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. Morey,] to be seated upon this floor while the disputed question of permanent membership is pending. Mr. Speaker, what is a prima facie right? It is a right based upon a certificate of the proper authority of the State, formal, regular, and in accordance with law. By the act of Congress, the Clerk of the preceding House of Representatives is invested with the power of determining in the first instance this question in order to the organization of the House. He has decided the question, sir, in the first instance by putting the name of Mr. Morey upon the list of members. This is no mere nominal authority vested in the Clerk. It is a substantive power, and by virtue of its exercise Mr. Morey has participated in the organization of this House, voting for or against the present occupant of the Speaker's chair.

But, sir, while the Clerk has done this thing, (which it was his duty to do under the law), he has also, in accordance with his duty, put upon record and reported to this House the fact that there is a dispute as to the prima facie right of Mr. Morey. That is the point to which I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Maine; that the Clerk of the House has made known to this body the existence of a controversy, not only with reference to the question of the election of Mr. Morey, but with reference to his prima facie right.

The House is in possession of the fact that there is such a controversy. It may be, in the estimation of gentlemen, based upon the previous action of this House, a very simple question; one which can be decided only in one way; but still, sir, it is a question of law as to whether this certificate is signed by the proper governor or not.

Now, sir, what is the practice of the House when the Clerk brings to its attention the fact that such a controversy exists; that there is a dispute as to the prima facie right? Its practice is uniform. The gentleman from Maine cannot show an instance to the contrary. When it is communicated officially to the House, by the Clerk, its official organ in such matters, that there is pending a contest as to the prima facie right, in every instance the question was referred to the Committee on Elections or to the Committee on the Judiciary, in order to determine, first, the prima facie right and, afterward, the right of permanent membership. It is a question, sir, which it is the practice of the House to refer to a committee, however strongly the different departments of the Government may be committed on the question in dispute or however clear may be our own duty when the question is appropriately before us.

It is not usual for questions like this to be thus summarily decided; for the decision might in some cases render the merits of the controversy res adjudicata. From the New Jersey cases down to the Virginia and Louisiana contested cases the practice has been uniform, without a single exception that I now recall—one which has been crystallized as it were into regular parliamentary law—to refer the question to a committee, as well that of the prima facie right as that of the merits of the controversy.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman from Mississippi permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LAMAR. Yes, sir; but I do not pledge myself to answer it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. That may be. Does the gentleman know of any precedent whatever in the history of this House of credentials, or pseudo credentials, of a pretended governor, who has never been recognized by any department of his own State or of the United States—I throw out of sight the election—who has never had any recognition, who speaks of the seal of the State which he never had in his possession, a fabricated seal; a seal which could be bought for two dollars and a half by any one—does the gentleman know of any instance in which there has ever come to this House a similar question? Does the New Jersey case involve any parallel to it? Does any case the gentleman can recall in his long service here, with his intimate acquaintance with the law of elections during his service on that committee—can he give us any case in the slightest degree parallel to it? Otherwise, if the precedent which gentlemen attempt to force upon this House is followed, any pretended governor, certifying to any pretended or presumptuous candidate, may delay the organization of this House by putting in any sort of manufactured credentials and testifying by any sort of factitious or fictitious seal. Tell me of a single precedent or a single parallel for it. I repeat again, with no disrespect either to the gentleman who now occupies the floor or to my friend who introduced the resolution, that the matter on the part of McEnery was an entire impertinence. He never had possession of a single return. He had nothing before him to base that upon any more than lies upon this empty desk. It was, so far as he is concerned, a bold, presumptuous fraud; and I trust, in the hot zeal of advent to power, my friend, with his well-known moderation, will restrain his party from placing on record such an outrage, not only upon State rights, of which he stands as such a great exemplar, but upon the rules of common decency as well.

Mr. LAMAR. I desire to respond to the gentleman's interrogatory. I beg pardon for calling it so; but I believe it was an interrogatory, into the stomach of which has been injected something like an argument and an exhortation besides. [Laughter.] Now, sir, the single question on which the gentleman from Maine hangs his speech is itself an adroit petitio principii of the logician. He asks me, sir, if I have known a single instance in which the certificate of a pretended, a sham governor, was ever referred to a committee. I answer, sir, and I do it with perfect confidence, that the question as to whether this is the certificate of a sham governor or not is the very question which is to be referred to the committee.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I understand the gentleman to mean that this is the formal re-opening of the Louisiana case, and not merely the question of the seat of Mr. Morey. Do I understand that?

Mr. LAMAR. The gentleman understands simply that a question which the Clerk of this House has remitted to the House (whether it involves the other question as to the legal authority of the gubernatorial contestants in Louisiana or not) is a question that ought not to be decided informally on the seating of a member, but ought to be formally referred to the committee and gravely and maturely decided upon, as has always been done in like cases.

There never has been an instance in which the validity of a credential involving a dispute as to a contested seat has ever been decided in this summary manner. Take the New Jersey case. There, sir, was a certificate of a governor for one set of claimants and the certificate of a secretary of state for the other. Now, sir, if the governor in that case was not authorized to give that certificate, the credentials bearing his signature and seal were just as much of a sham, was just as invalid, just as much of an unreality in law, as that of a pretended governor. The question presented to us by the Clerk's report is, who was authorized to issue that certificate, and it is simply following parliamentary usage to refer it.

Mr. BLAINE. Before the gentleman from Mississippi takes his seat, will he permit me to ask him, because he is the gentleman of all others to whom I desire to address the inquiry, if it is not a matter of history known outside—and, while I shall reveal nothing other than what is known outside, yet still better known inside the House—that last year in what was known as the Louisiana adjustment, when the Legislature was changed and the party relation within that State was changed, it was, upon this floor, a perfectly understood matter—the gentleman himself understanding it—that the vote of the House declaring Kellogg to be governor was considered to be the final settlement; and I ask him further whether, in order to get that question before the House, the very Nestor of the gentleman's party, the venerable gentleman who I regret is absent to-day, the invalid statesman from Georgia, [Mr. A. H. Stephens,] did not vote with the republicans, avowedly that that might be the settlement? And now the party of the gentleman having obtained all the advantage which was involved from their side of the question in Louisiana through the Legislature, do I understand my honorable friend that he comes here to head a movement to trample on the other side of that agreement; that the other side of the Louisiana agreement is to be stamped in the dust; that the republicans having obeyed, and to the last jot and tittle of honor's extreme demand, what they agreed to, a democratic House of Representatives in which the gentleman himself is a conspicuous leader shall trample on their side of it, and that they will in an incidental way of this kind attempt to reopen and dishonor the agreement that was made last year?

Mr. LAMAR. The gentleman from Maine has addressed to me a series of interrogations upon this subject, all of which I will answer if I can remember them. So far as I myself am concerned—I believe he has referred to my own knowledge of the matter—I will answer him cheerfully; for, with reference to the Louisiana contest and the compromise to which the gentleman alludes, I am perfectly willing to disclose both my relation to it and my understanding of its effect and obligation. That compromise did involve, in my opinion, the recognition of Mr. Kellogg as acting governor of that State. I think such was the spirit of that compromise when it was brought into this House. I admired the course of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and expressed my gratification at the fidelity with which he had brought the matter here. But, sir, when he appealed to me for my support I told him I could not vote for it, because, occupying my position, I could not give a vote which involved the recognition of Kellogg as governor. But in point of fact, sir, that resolution did pass, and its avowed and understood object and meaning were what the gentleman from Maine ascribes to it, and I acknowledge it has been carried out by the other side faithfully.

There will be no receding from that understanding so far as I am concerned. But when the Clerk raises a question here, neither the gentleman, nor I, nor this House can consistently, in the face of the unbroken usage of this body, decide the question in this summary manner. It should go to the Committee on Elections, where all questions of prima facie right presented by the Clerk have been hitherto decided. It is a pure question of parliamentary procedure, and involves no repudiation of bargains expressed or implied, and I undertake to say that he will hear of no repudiation from me.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] modify his motion in the way I have suggested?

Mr. LAMAR. I was about to propose, in deference to the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, an amendment which I think will meet his views. It is as follows:

That the credentials of Mr. Morey, of the fifth district of Louisiana, be referred to the Committee on Elections, with instructions to report as soon as possible upon his prima facie right to a seat on this floor.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I accept that amendment.

Mr. LAMAR. Does that meet the views of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. HOAR. I do not agree that the question of the governorship should be referred, but the amendment is preferable to the original resolution.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I desire to say a few words and then I shall move the previous question. I am somewhat surprised that my able and eloquent friend from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] should attempt thus early in the session to introduce merely partisan considerations with reference to a plain common-sense duty imposed upon the members of this House.

As I said before the report of the Clerk in reference to this district presented such a case that it is a proper subject of inquiry as to who is entitled to the seat until the further question of the contest shall be investigated by the appropriate committee. But, sir, I will remind my friend from Maine that in the Senate a committee of investigation on the Louisiana case, of which his friends had a majority, reported that Mr. Kellogg was not elected governor of Louisiana. I do not propose, however, that the House shall determine the question as to who is or who is not the governor of Louisiana. I only propose a preliminary inquiry as to the prima facie right to this seat. Unless some gentleman desires to be heard, I will now move the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask my friend from New York to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. WOOD, of New York I yield to my friend from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the credentials under the authority of which the Clerk has placed the name of Mr. Morey on the roll-call be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF LOUISIANA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
New Orleans, December 26, 1874.

Be it known that at an election begun and held on the 2d day of November, A. D. 1874, for members of Congress, Frank Morey received 12,279 votes and W. B. Spencer received 11,038 votes, according to the certificate of the returns of said election made, filed, and of record in the office of the secretary of state in the manner prescribed by law:

Now, therefore, I, William Pitt Kellogg, governor of the State of Louisiana, do hereby certify that Frank Morey, who received a majority of the votes cast at said election, is truly and lawfully elected to represent the fifth congressional district of Louisiana in the Forty-fourth Congress of the United States.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto signed my name and caused the seal of the State to be attached, this 26th day of December, A. D. 1874, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-ninth.

WILLIAM P. KELLOGG.

By the governor:
P. G. DESLONDE,
Secretary of State.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for the reading of any other credentials which may be supposed to relate to this matter.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read any other credentials on file.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Ohio will allow me to say that under the law regulating the organization of this House the Clerk, in the first instance, is to determine what names shall be placed on the roll of members, who shall participate in the preliminary stages for the organization. He has, I have no doubt rightfully, upon the presumptive case before him, placed the name of Mr. Morey on the roll, for the credentials which have been read clearly make out a prima facie case in his behalf. The information furnished to the House by the Clerk, beyond the certificate which has been read, was certainly a matter entirely outside of his duty, but out of abundant caution. The Clerk of the House, in providing under the law for the primary organization of the House, places on the roll the person who has the prima facie right to the seat; there his duty terminates, and the person so entitled by virtue of his certificate is sworn in. We are told there is a contest in this case. Well, let the contest go on in the usual course; but no question in respect to that contest is before us. The question as to the person whose name is signed as governor of Louisiana is clearly unimportant, if the attestation is perfect, and no charge of fraud is raised; and yet the House knows that in fact the party whose name is signed to that certificate is the acting governor of Louisiana, and has been for three years the acting governor of that State, the governor de facto, the governor in fact, and this is sufficient. The question as to who is governor de jure is one which may well arise before the Committee on Elections. It may be a matter of important inquiry. I believe that it is in accordance with the better practice of the House, and at least with the often-affirmed views of this side of the House, and far better for the interests of the country, that the party holding such a certificate shall be held prima facie entitled to his seat and the matter of contest go in the usual course to the Committee on Elections and be determined by the evidence and law. Entertaining these views, I am confident that it is wiser and safer that the party whose name has been placed regularly and properly upon the roll of members and who appears here with the proper certificate, unchallenged for fraud, should be sworn in. I trust, sir, that such will be the action of the House. Let the party holding the certificate be sworn in and let the contest determine the ultimate right.

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw my request to have any other paper read.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] for two minutes.

Mr. BANKS. To me the question as presented to the House from the Clerk's desk seems to be more simple than it is in the arguments of gentlemen on the one side or the other. If I understand this question, it is the fact that the evidence by which this gentleman from the State of Louisiana is accredited as a member of this House is different from that upon which other gentlemen from that State have been accredited as members. It is, in fact, a difference in the credentials—a difference in the evidence presented.

Mr. GARFIELD. No; the evidence is the same.

Mr. BANKS. I understand that the evidence is different; and if there be a difference, then it is a proper subject for inquiry and should be referred to the appropriate committee. That course would be consistent with the unbroken and uninterrupted precedents of this House. If the evidence upon which other members have been recognized by the Clerk as accredited to seats in this House is different from that upon which this gentleman is recognized by him as accredited, then that difference should be submitted to the committee without regard to this other question.

Mr. GARFIELD. The evidence in all the cases is absolutely the same, if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] will allow me to say so.

Mr. BANKS. If that be so——

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if this certificate is not in the usual form, the form prescribed by act of Congress? As I understand it, it is in that form.

Mr. BANKS. If the evidence upon which the gentleman in question is accredited is not the same as in the other cases, then the proposition to refer the matter to the proper committee for inquiry is right and in accordance with the uninterrupted precedents of this House.

Mr. HOLMAN. If, in fact, this certificate differs from that prescribed by the act of Congress, then the case would be as suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts. But, if I understood this paper when it was read, it is in conformity to the law.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I desire to have read to the House the statement made by the Clerk two years ago in the case of Louisiana, when he refused to put upon the roll-call the names of three persons from that State because they presented a case precisely like this. In the one case they had certificates signed by Governor Warmoth and in the other case they had certificates signed by Lieutenant-Governor Pinchback. Not knowing which of them were entitled to have their names placed upon the roll-call, he refused them all. I desire to have the RECORD read at the Clerk's desk, that the House may know what was the action of the Clerk in that case as well as in this. I design by that no reflection upon the Clerk of this House, but only to show that this is an analogous case, and one which we should consider now.

The Clerk read as follows:

During the roll-call, when the State of Louisiana was reached,

The CLERK said: In Louisiana there are unchallenged certificates from the third and fifth districts only; in the remaining three districts and the Representative at large two conflicting sets of papers have been presented, each certifying the election of a different person and each purporting to have been issued by a proper State officer. There is no substantial difference in form; the one set of papers purports to have been executed on the 4th of December, 1872, and to have been signed by Governor Warmoth, though not transmitted by him to the Clerk's office; they were received, one of them early in March last, another later in that month, and two of them in the latter part of April, 1873. The other set of papers purports to have been signed by Acting Governor Pinchback, and transmitted by him to the Clerk's office by mail, and received early in January last. The Clerk accordingly enrolls the two unchallenged members, Hon. Chester B. Darrall and Frank Morey.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I now call the previous question.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I will yield to my colleague [Mr. COX] for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk requests permission to make to the House a brief statement on this subject. The Chair supposes there will be no objection.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I will not object.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the Clerk will proceed.

The CLERK. The controlling view which in the judgment of the Clerk of the House required him to accept the Kellogg certificates was that prior to the making up of the roll, on the 4th of March last, there had been a recognition of William P. Kellogg as the governor of Louisiana by the House of Representatives, and at that time he was de facto governor of the State. In view of the recognition of him by the executive branch of the Government of the United States, by all the departments of the Government, and by that branch of the legislative part of the Government to which the Clerk was responsible, he felt himself to be absolutely concluded, and therefore inserted those names returned by Governor Kellogg, without any reference whatever to any political aspect of the case.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I agree with my friend from Indiana [Mr.

HOLMAN] that where there is a prima facie case made, a certificate presented, and no doubt is raised as to the genuineness of that certificate, we ought not to hesitate in deciding according to our rule, laid down in all our books and digested lately by our friend from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY,] that the certificate should seat the member who holds it, if that certificate is in the form prescribed by the statute. This certificate is formal, legal. It certifies that the member is elected in pursuance of the laws of Louisiana and the laws of the United States. It is signed by the de facto governor. The Clerk testifies that his action was taken in view of the resolution passed on the 1st of March, 1875, by which this House agreed, by two resolutions, to recognize, first, the Legislature about to be constituted, and then that William Pitt Kellogg be recognized as the governor of the State of Louisiana until the end of the term of office fixed by the constitution of that State. All that is true, Mr. Speaker; but when those two resolutions came up here, Mr. Potter, at that time a Representative from my State, said "we shall vote against those resolutions only because of the second; we are not opposed to the first;" and in the vote which was taken parties divided on that issue. The first resolution declared—

That it is recommended to the house of representatives of Louisiana to take immediate steps to remedy said injustice, and to place the persons rightfully entitled in their seats.

I never believed in that second resolution. I would not have voted for it to the end of time. Gentlemen on that side and gentlemen on this, seeking pacification, brought about this compromise, which was consummated abnormally in some lawyer's office in New York, after our adjournment. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] and his party, at the last end of their session, recognized the McEnery government to some extent, by placing in their seats in this House the Democrats who had been elected, after you had kept in their places on this floor for two years the men that you yourself said were never elected.

Talk about fraud! The devil talking of piety! The gentleman from Maine talking of fraud in Louisiana! We never gave our consent to that Kellogg government. Why, in the Senate to-day there remain certificates from McEnery for McMillan, and from Kellogg for Pinchback. How, I ask the gentleman from Maine, was the question treated there? Both certificates were sent to the Committee on Elections. The late lamented Senator, Mr. Ferry, of Connecticut, made a speech in favor of sending both certificates to that committee, so that the prima facie case might be tried.

We are not responsible for the settlement in Louisiana. I would now—and I make this the conclusion of my speech—send this whole matter to the Committee of Elections, as the Senate has done, and let that committee make a prompt report on the subject, not to open up the Louisiana case again, (God forbid! they settled it themselves,) but to wind up this business of these double prima facie cases; for most prima facie cases seem to be bad in the rear while they may seem right in the front.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] will allow me, there is a piece of information I would be glad to obtain. I wish to ask the gentleman whether I understood him correctly as stating that all of the Representatives, or assumed Representatives, from Louisiana, except one, thought it necessary to obtain the certificate of Mr. McEnery as well as Mr. Kellogg?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I will answer the gentleman from Kentucky that there are six congressional districts in the State of Louisiana; that four of these six Representatives, and one of them a member of the dominant political party in this country, thought it proper to procure the certificate of Governor McEnery. One of them has not that certificate—the case in point has not that certificate—but four of them have.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Certificates from both McEnery and Kellogg?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I should like to ask my friend from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] if it be true that McEnery was never recognized as governor—a mere myth—why his Representatives, or some of them, or rather the Representatives of his party from that State, deemed it necessary to obtain the name of Governor McEnery? If it be true, Mr. Speaker, what my friend from New York has asserted, I think they ought all to be turned over to the Committee on Elections, every man of them, as there seems to be a doubt in that State as to who is governor.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I now call for the previous question.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry, to which the gentleman will, of course, yield. He declines to allow me to substitute the motion that Mr. Morey be sworn in. I desire to ask if that motion will not be in order if his demand for the previous question be not seconded?

The SPEAKER. It is the opinion of the Chair it will.

Mr. BLAINE. If the House refuse to second the demand for the previous question, as asked by the gentleman from New York, I will then submit that motion, with the leave of the Speaker.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. If the House refuses to consent to my demand for the previous question, I ask if the effect will not be to let the discussion run on until the House finally determines my resolution? Then, if my resolution be voted down, the proposition of the gentleman from Maine will be in order in case the previous question be not sustained.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on sustaining the demand for the previous question.

Mr. LAMAR. There is some misunderstanding here. I proposed my resolution in lieu of the one offered by my friend from New York.

The SPEAKER. The amendment was accepted and became a part of the resolution of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAMAR. But that recital which is there is not a part of the resolution I offered.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair it is, remaining a part of the resolution which the gentleman did not amend.

Mr. LAMAR. The way in which I wish to present it to the House is a clear reference of the question to the committee without any recital of facts.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. If it is not too late, as there is no substantial difference, I will accept the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi as a substitute for my preamble and resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on seconding the demand for the previous question on the resolution, which will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the credentials of Frank Morey from the fifth district of Louisiana be referred to the Committee on Elections, with instructions to report on his prima facie right to a seat on the floor.

Mr. LAMAR. The words "as soon as possible" should be inserted.

The SPEAKER. That will be done.

Mr. BLAINE demanded tellers on seconding the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. CLYMER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 142, noes 111.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. WHEELER demanded the yeas and nays on ordering the main question to be now put.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 135, nays 134, not voting 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., Banks, Barnum, Blackburn, Bland, Bliss, Blount, Boone, Bright, John Young Brown, Samuel D. Burchard, Cabell, John H. So the main question was ordered.

The question recurred on agreeing to Mr. WOOD'S resolution, as modified; and being taken, the Speaker stated that in the opinion of the Chair the "noes" had it.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I call for a division.

The "ayes" having risen, the Speaker stated that the motion was evidently not sustained by a majority.

Mr. BLAINE. I now submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That Hon. Frank Morey, holding a certificate from the governor of Louisiana, be sworn in as a member of this House.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend by striking out that portion of the resolution which recognizes Mr. Kellogg as governor of Louisiana, so that it shall be simply to swear in.

Mr. BLAINE. I am willing to modify the resolution in that way, and move that Hon. Frank Morey be sworn in. I do not want to raise the question of the recognition of the governor on the credentials presented.

The question was taken on Mr. BLAINE'S resolution, as modified, and it was agreed to; and Mr. MOREY, having presented himself, was duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862.

VIRGINIA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I now move that my colleague, Mr. John Goode, jr., Representative of the second district of Virginia, be sworn in. Mr. Goode holds the certificate of election provided by the laws of the Commonwealth of Virginia, which certificate I desire the Clerk to read. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to make a request of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I do not yield. I ask that the certificate be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA:

This is to certify that at a meeting of the board of State canvassers of Virginia, held at the office of the secretary of the Commonwealth, the fourth Monday in November, 1874, on an examination of the official abstracts of votes on file in that office, it was ascertained and determined that at an election held in said State, pursuant to law, the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, 1874, for Representatives in the Forty-fourth Congress of the United States, John Goode, jr., was duly elected as Representative from the second district.

Given under my hand and seal of office at Richmond, this 25th day of November, 1874.

[SEAL] JAMES McDONALD,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I now call the previous question, believing that no debate is necessary upon this question. It is too plain to admit of debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I appeal to the gentleman to concede to me what I supposed was my right when I demanded the floor, to state the ground of my objection to the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I will hear the gentleman's objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. The objection was wholly based upon the petition or demand by J. H. Platt, jr., which I will send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to be read. After it has been read I may desire to say a few words.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 6, 1875.

To the House of Representatives of the United States of America:

I, James H. Platt, jr., of Virginia, deny the right and title of John Goode, jr., to take his seat in the House of Representatives of the Forty-fourth Congress of the United States as Representative from the second congressional district of Virginia, upon the following grounds. I allege:

1. That the certificate which he holds as prima facie evidence of his right and title to the seat aforesaid is without authority of law, and is not supported by any record evidence, and is contradicted by the oath of the secretary of the Commonwealth, James McDonald, himself, who signed said certificate, and caused the same to be delivered to said Goode.

2. That said certificate could not be lawfully executed and issued by the secretary of the Commonwealth alone, without a statement of the whole number of votes given in the election in said second congressional district for a Representative therefrom, nor without an ascertainment and determination by the board of state canvassers as to the whole number of votes cast and the name of the person who had received the greatest number of votes given in said election.

3. The statement of the whole number of votes cast in the counties and corporations forming said congressional district in an election for a Representative in the Congress of the United States, held pursuant to law, on the first Tuesday after the first Monday of November, 1874, was made to the State board of canvassers, and laid before them on the 23d day of November, 1874, and the said board certified the said statement to be correct——

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, (interrupting the reading.) Would not the end of the gentleman from Ohio be better accomplished by having that document printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD? I do not suppose that he desires to detain the House by a full statement of the facts, as the contestant proposes to prove them on the prima facie question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly not.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that in no particular or form whatever does this partake of the nature of a credential.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman can hardly say that till he has heard it.

Mr. RANDALL. I have heard enough to know that it is an argument and not in the nature of a certificate.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I did not yield the floor to the gentleman from Ohio for the purpose either of the gentleman himself or my former colleague, the contestant, [Mr. Platt,] injecting an argument upon the supposed facts of his case on my motion to admit the qualification of my colleague upon the papers he presents making a fair prima facie case according to the law of the Commonwealth of Virginia.

Mr. HOAR. If the gentleman has the law of the State of Virginia prescribing the form of credentials and what officer shall be authorized to give them, I trust he will have it read.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The law of the State of Virginia is in the Library, and the gentleman can send for it; but this gentleman holds the same certificate which every other member from Virginia held who has been sworn in, and it was made in due form of law, according to the method prescribed by the Legislature of Virginia.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman have it read to the House?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Well, no. That is going behind the record; the certificate which this gentleman holds is prima facie evidence of his right to the seat.

Mr. GARFIELD. Would it be in order for me to have the residue of that paper read?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I do not yield for the reading of a paper in the form of an argument; and I am sure that my friend from Ohio will not take advantage of my yielding to him to have read that which does not appertain to the case now before the House. The paper which he presents bears upon the merits of the case, when, in fact, the only question now before the House is the prima facie case.

Mr. GARFIELD. As a matter of parliamentary courtesy, it was my right to have the floor, as I objected to the swearing in of this member. The gentleman rose and offered a resolution, and on my representation of my right to be heard on the question, he yielded to me. Now, if he chooses to withdraw his yielding, I suppose he can do it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I yielded to hear what the gentleman had to say.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, the gentleman from Virginia has a right to resume the floor.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I resume the floor and move the previous question.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the gentleman will have the law of Virginia read.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I am willing that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] shall have the residue of the paper which he presented printed in the RECORD, if he desires it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no ambition to have papers printed that cannot be read here.

The question was upon seconding the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, the question being upon the motion of Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia.

The question was taken, and the motion of Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, was agreed to.

Mr. JOHN GOODE, jr., Representative-elect from the second district of Virginia, then appeared, and qualified by taking the oath prescribed by law.

THIRTY-THIRD DISTRICT, NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER. There remains a question of a vacancy in the thirty-third congressional district of New York.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Nelson I. Norton, Representative-elect from that district, is here. I ask that he be sworn in. He holds a certificate from the board of State canvassers, which I ask the Clerk to read.

Mr. COX. Is that a prima facie certificate?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read it.

Mr. COX. I want to have referred with it other papers in connection with the same case.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States of America, by Samuel J. Tilden, governor of the State of New York:

It is hereby certified that Diedrich Willers, jr., was, on the day of the date of the annexed certificate, secretary of state of the State of New York, and duly authorized to grant the same; that the same is in due form, and executed by the proper officer; that the seal affixed to said certificate is the seal of the secretary of state of the State of New York; that the signature thereto of the said the secretary of state is in his own proper handwriting, and is genuine; and that full faith and credit may and ought to be given to his official acts.

In testimony whereof the great seal of the State is hereunto affixed.

Witness my hand, at the city of Albany, the 3d day of December, in the year of our Lord 1875.

SAMUEL J. TILDEN.

Passed the secretary's office the 3d day of December, 1875.

DIEDRICH WILLERS, Jr.,
Secretary of State.

STATE OF NEW YORK, ss:

We, the secretary of state, comptroller, treasurer, attorney-general, and state engineer and surveyor, having formed a board of state canvassers for the purpose of canvassing the whole number of votes given in the thirty-third congressional district of said State, comprising the counties of Cattaraugus and Chautauqua, at the general election held in said State on the 2d day of November, 1875, for Representative in Congress in the Forty-fourth Congress of the United States, in the place of Augustus F. Allen, (who died January 20, 1875, as appears by certificate of county clerk of Chautauqua County, filed in the office of the secretary of state, before the commencement of his term of office,) do certify and state:

That the whole number of votes given for the office of Representative in Congress in said counties at said election was as follows, to wit:

	Cattaraugus.	Chautauqua.	Total.
Charles S. Cary	4,525	4,614	9,139
Nelson I. Norton	4,961	.....	4,961
Flint Blanchard	.....	72	72
Whole number of votes	9,486	4,686	14,172

That the whole number of votes given in said counties at said election for the office of member of Congress was as follows, to wit:

Cattaraugus County, none.

Chautauqua county, 5,818; of which Nelson I. Norton received 5,809 votes; George W. Patterson received 1 vote; Carry of Olean received 1 vote; Richard P. Marvin received 2 votes; W. L. Sessions received 1 vote; Orsell Cook received 1 vote; blank, 3 votes.

That the whole number of votes given for the office of Representative in the Forty-fourth Congress in said counties at said election was as follows, to wit:

Cattaraugus County, none,

Chautauqua County, Augustus N. Lowry received 5 votes.

That upon said canvass it appears that the greatest number of votes given in the counties comprising the thirty-third congressional district at the said general election held November 2, 1875, for the office of Representative in Congress were given for Charles S. Cary.

That at said election the whole number of votes given in said counties for Nelson I. Norton for member of Congress and for Representative in Congress combined exceeds the whole number of votes given to Charles S. Cary for Representative in Congress by 1,631 votes.

That this board has not canvassed 5 votes given in said counties at said election to Augustus N. Lowry for the office of Representative in the Forty-fourth Congress, for the following reasons:

First. The statutes of the United States provide that, in cases of vacancy, the time of filling the same may be prescribed by the laws of the several States.

Second. The laws of this State, governing elections, provide that vacancies in the office of Representative in Congress, occurring before the commencement of a term, unless filled at a special election, shall be filled at the general election next succeeding the happening of the vacancy, to wit, the late general election, held November 2, 1875.

Third. That the general election held November 2, 1875, was not a general biennial election for Representatives in Congress, such election having last occurred at the general election held November 3, 1874, and it was not therefore necessary to designate upon the ballot the Congress for which persons were voted for.

This board, in making the foregoing statement, makes no determination as to the result of the election for Representative in Congress at the said general election in the said thirty third congressional district, for the following reasons:

First. That Charles S. Cary did not receive a majority of all the congressional votes cast in said district both for Representative in Congress and member of Congress combined, although receiving a majority of votes for Representative in Congress in said district.

Second. That this board cannot determine, declare, and certify, pursuant to act of Congress of February 19, 1867, that Nelson I. Norton was by the greatest number of votes "regularly elected in accordance with the laws of this State" a Representative in Congress of the United States.

Dated at Albany, December 3, 1875.

DIEDRICH WILLERS, JR.,
Secretary of State.
NELSON K. HOPKINS,
Comptroller.
DANIEL PRATT,
Attorney-General.
THOMAS RAINES,
Treasurer.
S. H. SWEET,
State Engineer and Surveyor.

STATE OF NEW YORK,
Office of the Secretary of State, ss:

I certify that I have compared the foregoing with an original certificate filed in this office, and that the same is a correct transcript therefrom and of the whole of such original.

Given under my hand and seal of office, at the city of Albany, this 3d day of December, 1875.

DIEDRICH WILLERS, JR.,
Secretary of State.

Mr. WHEELER. For the purpose of getting some disposition made of this question I move that Mr. Norton be now sworn in.

Mr. COX. This is not a prima facie case, and I would move to amend so as to send the case to the Committee on Elections, when appointed. By the laws of New York, as my colleague very well knows, the votes have to be cast for Representative in Congress. I know it is a technical point, but the law of New York is specific on that point, and I think we had better refer the case to the Committee on Elections.

Mr. RANDALL. I would ask whether there is any antagonistic statement or any applicant for this seat as against this gentleman?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not been advised of any.

Mr. HOSKINS. There is no contestant.

Mr. COX. There is no contestant. There is a desire to have the matter come before the Committee on Elections.

Mr. WHEELER. Every fact bearing upon the case is in the certificate which has just been read. There is no additional fact that can be adduced.

Mr. COX. Under the advice of gentlemen about me, and waiving all technicalities, I will withdraw any opposition to the gentleman being now sworn in, and will then ask that the subject be at once referred upon the statement made by the State board of canvassers.

Mr. WHEELER. There is no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. There being no opposition, the gentleman will now present himself and be sworn in.

Mr. NORTON then came forward and was sworn in, taking the test-oath of July, 1862.

Mr. COX. I suppose this paper will now be ordered to be referred to the Committee on Elections, when appointed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be so ordered.

SWEARING IN OF DELEGATES.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now call the roll of Delegates elected to this House, and those who are present will be sworn in.

The roll of Delegates was called, and the following gentlemen came forward and were sworn in, taking the test-oath of July, 1862:

New Mexico—Stephen B. Elkins.
Utah—George Q. Cannon.
Washington—Orange Jacobs.
Colorado—Thomas M. Patterson.
Dakota—Jefferson P. Kidder.
Arizona—Hiram S. Stevens.
Idaho—Thomas W. Bennett.
Montana—Martin Maginnis.
Wyoming—William R. Steele.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LAMAR. In order to facilitate the organization of this House and to save the time which would necessarily be consumed by the separate election of the remaining officers that are necessary to complete that organization, I have prepared a resolution which I believe is somewhat in accordance with usage. Before sending it to the Clerk's desk to be read, I am informed that the Clerk has some reports to make, which should be made before this part of the organization of the House is completed. I will therefore suspend for that purpose.

REPORTS FROM CLERK'S OFFICE.

Reports from the Clerk's office of the House of Representatives were then read, laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed, as follows:

Of payments and issues for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, classified in papers marked A, B, C, D, and E;

Of the receipts and expenditures of the Clerk's office from June 30, 1875, to the expiration of his term of office;

In reference to the erection of monuments in Congressional Cemetery to those Representatives who have died while in office;

An index and summary of the reports of the commissioners of southern claims in cases reported to Congress as disallowed;

Of payments made by the Clerk during the late recess of Congress to members elected to the Forty-fourth Congress;

In relation to the testimony taken before the Committee on Ways and Means upon the question of the corrupt use of money to procure the passage of an act providing for an additional subsidy in the China mail service.

ORGANIZATION OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. LAMAR. I now send to the Clerk's desk to be read the resolution I indicated a few moments since. I presume some gentleman on the other side will move an amendment, and of course the question will first be taken on the amendment. I ask, as a mere matter of information, if it is the wish of gentlemen on the other side to call for the yeas and nays?

Mr. WHEELER and Mr. GARFIELD. No.

Mr. LAMAR. We are willing to have them called, if required. I ask that my resolution be now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Hon. George M. Adams, a citizen of the State of Kentucky, be and is hereby elected Clerk of the House of Representatives of the Forty-fourth Congress; that John G. Thompson, of the State of Ohio, be and is hereby elected Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives of the Forty-fourth Congress; that Lafayette Henry Fitzhugh, of the State of Texas, be and is hereby elected Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives of the Forty-fourth Congress; that James M. Stewart, of the State of Virginia, be and is hereby elected Postmaster of the House of Representatives of the Forty-fourth Congress; and that Rev. I. L. Townsend, of the District of Columbia, be and is hereby elected Chaplain of the House of Representatives of the Forty-fourth Congress.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to amend the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] by striking out the portion naming the candidates, with the respective offices for which they are nominated, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

For Clerk of the House of Representatives, Forty-fourth Congress, Edward McPherson, of Pennsylvania; for Sergeant-at-Arms, Nehemiah G. Ordway, of New Hampshire; for Doorkeeper, Otis L. Buxton, of New York; for Postmaster, Henry L. Sherwood, of Michigan; for Chaplain, Rev. J. G. Butler, D. D., of the District of Columbia.

Mr. LAMAR. I move the previous question on the original resolution and the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] whether it is necessary to move the previous question.

Several MEMBERS. O, no.

Mr. LAMAR. I withdraw the call for the previous question.

The amendment of Mr. WHEELER was not adopted.

The resolution of Mr. LAMAR was then agreed to.

Mr. LAMAR moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The officers just elected, if in attendance, will now present themselves at the bar of the House to take the oath of office.

Mr. Adams, Mr. Thompson, Mr. Fitzhugh, and Mr. Stewart presented themselves, and were duly qualified, the two former taking the test-oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862; the two latter, the modified oath provided by the act of July 11, 1868.

NOTIFICATION OF ORGANIZATION.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform that body that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled, and that MICHAEL C. KERR, one of the Representatives from the State of Indiana, has been chosen Speaker, and that the House is now ready to proceed to business.

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me to suggest that this resolution ought to include a notification of the election of the Clerk. It is important the Senate should be informed of his election.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is not the usual form, although I see no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands it is usual to include a notification of the election of Clerk.

Mr. HOLMAN. The practice is not uniform; but I see no objection to the suggestion. Let the resolution be so modified.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. COX submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed on the part of the House, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses has assembled and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

RULES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the rules of the House of Representatives of the Forty-third Congress shall be the rules of the House of Representatives until otherwise ordered, except Rule 166 and Rule 167.

Resolved further, That a committee of five, to consist of the Speaker and four members, to be named by him, be appointed, to whom shall be referred the rules of the House, who shall report all such amendments or revisions of the same as they shall think proper, and such reports shall always be in order to be made.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a point of order. I object to the resolution under the existing rules, which are our rules without a declaration of this sort.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit that both these resolutions are strictly in order. I propose that we adopt the rules of the last House, with the exceptions stated. As to the second resolution, I will say there is no rule providing for the appointment of a Committee on Rules. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is therefore mistaken on this point.

Mr. GARFIELD. That particular point is not what I object to. I object to the first branch of the gentleman's resolutions, on the ground of immemorial usage.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman has a perfect right to object by voting against the resolutions, but in no other manner.

Mr. GARFIELD. I submit that this is not a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make that point of order?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules it, on the ground that the Constitution clearly gives to each House the right to adopt its own rules. Whatever may have been the rules or orders of a preceding House in reference to this matter, they cannot supersede the constitutional right of this House to adopt its own rules.

Mr. RANDALL. The Speaker is clearly right.

Mr. GARFIELD. I submit that these resolutions should be referred to the Committee on Rules when appointed.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no rule of this House, and there was no rule of the last House, by which a Committee on Rules can be appointed. It is only by a resolution of this character that the Speaker can be authorized to appoint a Committee on Rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will find that immemorial usage is in itself a rule.

Mr. RANDALL. Immemorial usage will do for that side of the House, but we mean to have strict construction of the rules. [Laughter.] For the information of the House, let the rules excepted be read, and then I shall demand the previous question on the adoption of my resolution, unless some gentleman on that side of the House may desire to speak. I ask the Clerk to read the two excepted rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

166. All motions to suspend the rules, except where they may be suspended by a majority, shall, before being submitted to the House, be seconded by a majority, as in the case of the previous question.—January 20, 1874.

167. Whenever a question is pending before the House, the Speaker shall not entertain any motion of a dilatory character except one motion to adjourn and one motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn. But the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of any bill or joint resolution shall not be ordered during the first day of its consideration unless two-thirds of the members present shall second the demand: Provided, That this rule shall not apply to House resolutions offered in the morning hour of Monday: And provided further, That it shall not apply to any proposition to appropriate the money, the credit, or other property of the United States, except the regular annual appropriation bills.—February 1, 1875.

Mr. RANDALL. I now demand the previous question on the adoption of my resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DRAWING FOR SEATS.

Mr. CLYMER. I beg leave to submit the following resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House shall at one o'clock p. m. to-morrow place in a box the name of each Member and Delegate of the House of Representatives, written upon a separate slip of paper; that he proceed in the presence of the House to draw from said box, one at a time, the said slips of paper, and as each is drawn he shall announce the name of the member or Delegate upon it, who shall choose his seat for the present Congress: Provided, That before said drawing shall commence the Speaker shall cause each seat to be vacated, and shall see that every seat continues vacant until it is selected under this order; and that every seat, after having been selected, shall be deemed forfeited if left unoccupied before the call of the roll is finished.

Mr. SAYLER. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. CLYMER. For what purpose?

Mr. SAYLER. I would suggest to the gentleman that the courtesy which has been always extended to the member of longest continuous service of selecting his own seat be extended in this instance, and for that purpose there ought to be an amendment of the resolution.

Mr. CLYMER. I make reply to the gentleman that it has never been done except by unanimous consent, which is always asked after the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. SAYLER. I think it has not been after the adoption of the resolution. It is certainly within my experience, which is to the extent of one time, the same exception was made, and I hope it will be made now. I make the further suggestion that the seat occupied by Mr. Stephens, of Georgia, be reserved for him, in view of the condition of his health.

Mr. CLYMER. In reply, I will remark that if the gentleman will examine the proceedings of the last Congress he will find a resolution precisely in form such as this was adopted, and that subsequent to its adoption the House, by unanimous consent, gave the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who had been longest in continuous service, choice of a seat, and by unanimous consent subsequently gave Mr. Stephens, of Georgia, the seat he occupied. I propose to ask for such indulgence both to the member of longest continuous service and to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Stephens.] I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Does any one object to the motion being put without the previous question?

There was no objection.

The resolution was adopted.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER announced the following committee to wait upon the President of the United States under the resolution adopted this day: Mr. COX of New York, Mr. KNOTT of Kentucky, and Mr. BLAINE of Maine.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, (at ten minutes to five o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 7, 1875.

AARON H. CRAGIN, a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, GEORGE GOLDTHWAITE, a Senator from the State of Alabama, and A. S. MERRIMON, a Senator from the State of North Carolina, appeared in their seats to-day.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. EATON presented the credentials of James E. English, appointed by the governor of the State of Connecticut a Senator from that State to fill, until the next meeting of the Legislature thereof, the vacancy caused by the death of Orris S. Ferry.

The credentials were read; and the oaths prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. ENGLISH, he took his seat in the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared below the bar of the Senate and said:

Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled, and that MICHAEL C. KERR, one of the Representatives from the State of Indiana, has been chosen Speaker, and GEORGE M. ADAMS, of Kentucky, Clerk; and the House is ready to proceed to business.

I am further directed to inform the Senate that a committee of three has been appointed on the part of the House, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States and to inform him that a quorum of the two Houses has assembled and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make; and that Messrs. SAMUEL S. COX of New York, J. PROCTOR KNOTT of Kentucky, and JAMES G. BLAINE of Maine have been appointed as such committee on the part of the House.

RECESS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, (at twelve o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate take a recess until one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of the recess the Senate reassembled.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, the joint committee appointed to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses of Congress had organized for the transaction of business and were ready to receive any communication he might have to make to them have performed that duty, and the President replied that he would communicate to the two Houses immediately in writing.

At one o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m. the President's Secretary, Mr. LEVI P. LUCKEY, appeared below the bar and said:

Mr. President, I am directed by the President of the United States to deliver to the Senate a message in writing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair submits to the Senate the annual message of the President of the United States, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary of the Senate, Mr. GEORGE C. GORHAM, read the message, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In submitting my seventh annual message to Congress, in this centennial year of our national existence as a free and independent people, it affords me great pleasure to recur to the advancement that has been made from the time of the Colonies, one hundred years ago. We were then a people numbering only three millions. Now we number more than forty millions. Then industries were confined almost exclusively to the tillage of the soil. Now manufactories absorb much of the labor of the country.

Our liberties remain unimpaired; the bondmen have been freed from slavery; we have become possessed of the respect, if not the friendship, of all civilized nations. Our progress has been great in all the arts; in science, agriculture, commerce, navigation, mining, mechanics, law, medicine, &c.; and in general education the progress is likewise encouraging. Our thirteen States have become thirty-eight, including Colorado, (which has taken the initiatory steps to become a State,) and eight Territories, including the Indian Territory and Alaska, and excluding Colorado—making a territory extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific. On the South we have extended to the Gulf of Mexico, and in the West from the Mississippi to the Pacific.

One hundred years ago the cotton-gin, the steamship, the railroad, the telegraph, the reaping, sewing, and modern printing machines, and numerous other inventions of scarcely less value to our business and happiness were entirely unknown.

In 1776 manufactories scarcely existed, even in name, in all this vast territory. In 1870 more than two millions of persons were employed in manufactories, producing more than $2,100,000,000 of products in amount annually—nearly equal to our national debt. From nearly the whole of the population of 1776 being engaged in the one occupation of agriculture, in 1870 so numerous and diversified had become the occupation of our people that less than six millions out of more than forty millions were so engaged. The extraordinary effect produced in our country by a resort to diversified occupations has built a market for the products of fertile lands distant from the seaboard and the markets of the world.

The American system of locating various and extensive manufactories next to the plow and the pasture, and adding connecting railroads and steamboats, has produced in our distant interior country a result noticeable by the intelligent portions of all commercial nations. The ingenuity and skill of American mechanics have been demonstrated at home and abroad in a manner most flattering to their pride. But for the extraordinary genius and ability of our mechanics, the achievements of our agriculturists, manufacturers, and transporters throughout the country would have been impossible of attainment.

The progress of the miner has also been great. Of coal our production was small; now many millions of tons are mined annually. So with iron, which formed scarcely an appreciable part of our products half a century ago; we now produce more than the world consumed at the beginning of our national existence. Lead, zinc, and copper, from being articles of import, we may expect to be large exporters of in the near future. The development of gold and silver mines in the United States and Territories has not only been remarkable but has had a large influence upon the business of all commercial nations. Our merchants in the last hundred years have had a success and have established a reputation for enterprise, sagacity, progress, and integrity unsurpassed by peoples of older nationalities. This "good name" is not confined to their homes, but goes out upon every sea and into every port where commerce enters. With equal pride we can point to our progress in all of the learned professions.

As we are now about to enter upon our second centennial—commencing our manhood as a nation—it is well to look back upon the past and study what will be best to preserve and advance our future greatness. From the fall of Adam for his transgression to the present day, no nation has ever been free from threatened danger to its prosperity and happiness. We should look to the dangers threatening us, and remedy them so far as lies in our power. We are a republic whereof one man is as good as another before the law. Under such a form of government it is of the greatest importance that all should be possessed of education and intelligence enough to cast a vote with a right understanding of its meaning. A large association of ignorant men cannot, for any considerable period, oppose a successful resistance to tyranny and oppression from the educated few, but will inevitably sink into acquiescence to the will of intelligence, whether directed by the demagogue or by priestcraft. Hence the education of the masses becomes of the first necessity for the preservation of our institutions. They are worth preserving, because they have secured the greatest good to the greatest proportion of the population of any form of government yet devised. All other forms of government approach it just in proportion to the general diffusion of education and independence of thought and action. As the primary step, therefore, to our advancement in all that has marked our progress in the past century, I suggest for your earnest consideration—and most earnestly recommend it—that a constitutional amendment be submitted to the Legislatures of the several States for ratification making it the duty of each of the several States to establish and forever maintain free public schools adequate to the education of all the children in the rudimentary branches within their respective limits, irrespective of sex, color, birthplace, or religions; forbidding the teaching in said schools of religious, atheistic, or pagan tenets; and prohibiting the granting of any school funds, or school taxes, or any part thereof, either by legislative, municipal, or other authority, for the benefit or in aid, directly or indirectly, of any religious sect or denomination, or in aid or for the benefit of any other object of any nature or kind whatever.

In connection with this important question I would also call your attention to the importance of correcting an evil that, if permitted to continue, will probably lead to great trouble in our land before the close of the nineteenth century: it is the accumulation of vast amounts of untaxed church property.

In 1850 I believe the church property of the United States which paid no tax, municipal or State, amounted to about $83,000,000. In 1860 the amount had doubled; in 1875 it is about $1,000,000,000. By 1900, without check, it is safe to say this property will reach a sum exceeding $3,000,000,000. So vast a sum, receiving all the protection and benefits of Government without bearing its proportion of the burdens and expenses of the same, will not be looked upon acquiescently by those who have to pay the taxes. In a growing country, where real estate enhances so rapidly with time, as in the United States, there is scarcely a limit to the wealth that may be acquired by corporations, religious or otherwise, if allowed to retain real estate without taxation. The contemplation of so vast a property as here alluded to without taxation may lead to sequestration, without constitutional authority and through blood.

I would suggest the taxation of all property equally, whether church or corporation, exempting only the last resting-place of the dead, and possibly, with proper restrictions, church edifices.

Our relations with most of the foreign powers continue on a satisfactory and friendly footing.

Increased intercourse, the extension of commerce, and the cultivation of mutual interests have steadily improved our relations with the large majority of the powers of the world, rendering practicable the peaceful solution of questions which from time to time necessarily arise, leaving few which demand extended or particular notice.

The correspondence of the Department of State with our diplomatic representatives abroad is transmitted herewith.

I am happy to announce the passage of an act by the General Cortes of Portugal, proclaimed since the adjournment of Congress, for the abolition of servitude in the Portuguese colonies. It is to be hoped that such legislation may be another step toward the great consummation to be reached, when no man shall be permitted, directly or indirectly, under any guise, excuse, or form of law, to hold his fellow-man in bondage. I am of opinion, also, that it is the duty of the United States, as contributing toward that end and required by the spirit of the age in which we live, to provide by suitable legislation that no citizen of the United States shall hold slaves as property in any other country or be interested therein.

Chili has made reparation in the case of the whale-ship Good Return, seized without sufficient cause upward of forty years ago. Though she had hitherto denied her accountability, the denial was never acquiesced in by this Government, and the justness of the claim has been so earnestly contended for, that it has been gratifying that she should have at last acknowledged it.

The arbitrator in the case of the United States steamer Montijo, for the seizure and detention of which the government of the United States of Colombia was held accountable, has decided in favor of the claim. This decision has settled a question which had been pending for several years, and which, while it continued open, might more or less disturb the good understanding which it is desirable should be maintained between the two republics.

A reciprocity treaty with the king of the Hawaiian Islands was concluded some months since. As it contains a stipulation that it shall not take effect until Congress shall enact the proper legislation for that purpose, copies of the instrument are herewith submitted, in order that, if such should be the pleasure of Congress, the necessary legislation upon the subject may be adopted.

In March last an arrangement was made through Mr. Cushing, our minister in Madrid, with the Spanish government for the payment by the latter to the United States of the sum of $80,000 in coin for the purpose of the relief of the families or persons of the ship's company and certain passengers of the Virginius. This sum was to have been paid in three installments, at two months each. It is due to the Spanish government that I should state that the payments were fully and spontaneously anticipated by that government, and that the whole amount was paid within but a few days more than two months from the date of the agreement, a copy of which is herewith transmitted. In pursuance of the terms of the adjustment I have directed the distribution of the amount among the parties entitled thereto, including the ship's company and such of the passengers as were American citizens. Payments are made, accordingly, on the application by the parties entitled thereto.

The past year has furnished no evidence of an approaching termination of the ruinous conflict which has been raging for seven years in the neighboring Island of Cuba. The same disregard of the laws of civilized warfare and of the just demands of humanity, which has heretofore called forth expressions of condemnation from the nations of christendom, has continued to blacken the sad scene. Desolation, ruin, and pillage are pervading the rich fields of one of the most fertile and productive regions of the earth, and the incendiary's torch, firing plantations and valuable factories and buildings, is the agent marking the alternate advance or retreat of contending parties.

The protracted continuance of this strife seriously affects the interests of all commercial nations, but those of the United States more than others, by reason of close proximity, its larger trade and intercourse with Cuba, and the frequent and intimate personal and social relations which have grown up between its citizens and those of the island. Moreover the property of our citizens in Cuba is large, and is rendered insecure and depreciated in value and in capacity of production by the continuance of the strife and the unnatural mode of its conduct. The same is true, differing only in degree, with respect to the interests and people of other nations; and the absence of any reasonable assurance of a near termination of the conflict must of necessity soon compel the states thus suffering to consider what the interests of their own people and their duty toward themselves may demand.

I have hoped that Spain would be enabled to establish peace in her colony, to afford security to the property and the interests of our citizens, and allow legitimate scope to trade and commerce and the natural productions of the island. Because of this hope, and from an extreme reluctance to interfere in the most remote manner in the affairs of another and a friendly nation, especially of one whose sympathy and friendship in the struggling infancy of our own existence must ever be remembered with gratitude, I have patiently and anxiously awaited the progress of events. Our own civil conflict is too recent for us not to consider the difficulties which surround a government distracted by a dynastic rebellion at home at the same time that it has to cope with a separate insurrection in a distant colony. But, whatever causes may have produced the situation which so grievously affects our interests, it exists, with all its attendant evils, operating directly upon this country and its people. Thus far all the efforts of Spain have proved abortive, and time has marked no improvement in the situation. The armed bands of either side now occupy nearly the same ground as in the past, with the difference, from time to time, of more lives sacrificed, more property destroyed, and wider extents of fertile and productive fields and more and more of valuable property constantly wantonly sacrificed to the incendiary's torch.

In contests of this nature, where a considerable body of people who have attempted to free themselves of the control of the superior government have reached such point in occupation of territory, in power, and in general organization as to constitute in fact a body politic, having a government in substance as well as in name, possessed of the elements of stability and equipped with the machinery for the administration of internal policy and the execution of its laws, prepared and able to administer justice at home as well as in its dealings with other powers, it is within the province of those other powers to recognize its existence as a new and independent nation. In such cases other nations simply deal with an actually existing condition of things, and recognize as one of the powers of the earth that body politic which, possessing the necessary elements, has, in fact, become a new power; in a word, the creation of a new state is a fact.

To establish the condition of things essential to the recognition of this fact, there must be a people occupying a known territory, united under some known and defined form of government, acknowledged by those subject thereto, in which the functions of government are administered by usual methods, competent to mete out justice to citizens and strangers, to afford remedies for public and for private wrongs, and able to assume the correlative international obligations and capable of performing the corresponding international duties resulting from its acquisition of the rights of sovereignty. A power should exist, complete in its organization, ready to take and able to maintain its place among the nations of the earth.

While conscious that the insurrection in Cuba has shown a strength and endurance which make it at least doubtful whether it be in the power of Spain to subdue it, it seems unquestionable that no such civil organization exists which may be recognized as an independent government, capable of performing its international obligations and entitled to be treated as one of the powers of the earth. A recognition under such circumstances would be inconsistent with the facts, and would compel the power granting it soon to support by force the government to which it had really given its only claim of existence. In my judgment, the United States should adhere to the policy and the principles which have heretofore been its sure and safe guides in like contests between revolted colonies and their mother-country, and, acting only upon the clearest evidence, should avoid any possibility of suspicion or of imputation.

A recognition of the independence of Cuba being in my opinion impracticable and indefensible, the question which next presents itself is that of the recognition of belligerent rights in the parties to the contest.

In a former message to Congress I had occasion to consider this question, and reached the conclusion that the conflict in Cuba, dreadful and devastating as were its incidents, did not rise to the fearful dignity of war. Regarding it now, after this lapse of time, I am unable to see that any notable success or any marked or real advance on the part of the insurgents has essentially changed the character of the contest. It has acquired greater age, but not greater or more formidable proportions. It is possible that the acts of foreign powers, and even acts of Spain herself, of this very nature, might be pointed to in defense of such recognition. But now, as in its past history, the United States should carefully avoid the false lights which might lead it into the mazes of doubtful law and of questionable propriety, and adhere rigidly and sternly to the rule which has been its guide, of doing only that which is right and honest and of good report. The question of according or of withholding rights of belligerency must be judged in every case in view of the particular attending facts. Unless justified by necessity, it is always and justly regarded as an unfriendly act and a gratuitous demonstration of moral support to the rebellion. It is necessary and it is required when the interests and rights of another government or of its people are so far affected by a pending civil conflict as to require a definition of its relations to the parties thereto. But this conflict must be one which will be recognized in the sense of international law as war. Belligerence, too, is a fact. The mere existence of contending armed bodies, and their occasional conflicts, do not constitute war in the sense referred to.

Applying to the existing condition of affairs in Cuba the tests recognized by publicists and writers on international law, and which have been observed by nations of dignity, honesty, and power, when free from sensitive or selfish and unworthy motives, I fail to find in the insurrection the existence of such a substantial political organization, real, palpable, and manifest to the world, having the forms and capable of the ordinary functions of government toward its own people and to other states, with courts for the administration of justice, with a local habitation, possessing such organization of force, such material, such occupation of territory as to take the contest out of the category of a mere rebellious insurrection, or occasional skirmishes, and place it on the terrible footing of war, to which a recognition of belligerency would aim to elevate it. The contest, moreover, is solely on land. The insurrection has not possessed itself of a single sea-port whence it may send forth its flag, nor has it any means of communication with foreign powers, except through the military lines of its adversaries. No apprehension of any of those sudden and difficult complications which a war upon the ocean is apt to precipitate upon the vessels, both commercial and national, and upon the consular officers of other powers, calls for the definition of their relations to the parties to the contest.

Considered as a question of expediency, I regard the accordance of belligerent rights still to be as unwise and premature as I regard it to be at present indefensible as a measure of right. Such recognition entails upon the country according the rights which flow from it difficult and complicated duties, and requires the exaction from the contending parties of the strict observance of their rights and obligations. It confers the right of search upon the high seas by vessels of both parties; it would subject the carrying of arms and munitions of war, which now may be transported freely and without interruption in the vessels of the United States, to detention and to possible seizure; it would give rise to countless vexatious questions; would release the parent government from responsibility for acts done by the insurgents, and would invest Spain with the right to exercise the supervision recognized by our treaty of 1795 over our commerce on the high seas, a very large part of which, in its traffic between the Atlantic and the Gulf States and between all of them and the States on the Pacific, passes through the waters which wash the shores of Cuba. The exercise of this supervision could scarce fail to lead, if not to abuses, certainly to collisions perilous to the peaceful relations of the two states. There can be little doubt to what result such supervision would before long draw this nation. It would be unworthy of the United States to inaugurate the possibilities of such result by measures of questionable right or expediency or by any indirection. Apart from any question of theoretical right, I am satisfied that while the accordance of belligerent rights to the insurgents in Cuba might give them a hope and an inducement to protract the struggle, it would be but a delusive hope and would not remove the evils which this Government and its people are experiencing, but would draw the United States into complications which it has waited long and already suffered much to avoid. The recognition of independence or of belligerency being thus, in my judgment, equally inadmissible, it remains to consider what course shall be adopted should the conflict not soon be brought to an end by acts of the parties themselves, and should the evils which result therefrom, affecting all nations, and particularly the United States, continue. In such event I am of opinion that other nations will be compelled to assume the responsibility which devolves upon them, and to seriously consider the only remaining measures possible, mediation and intervention. Owing perhaps to the large expanse of water separating the island from the peninsula, the want of harmony and of personal sympathy between the inhabitants of the colony and those sent thither to rule them, and want of adaptation of the ancient colonial system of Europe to the present times, and to the ideas which the events of the past century have developed, the contending parties appear to have within themselves no depository of common confidence to suggest wisdom when passion and excitement have their sway, and to assume the part of peace-maker. In this view, in the earlier days of the contest, the good offices of the United States as a mediator were tendered in good faith, without any selfish purpose, in the interest of humanity and in sincere friendship for both parties, but were at the time declined by Spain, with the declaration, nevertheless, that at a future time they would be indispensable. No intimation has been received that in the opinion of Spain that time has been reached. And yet the strife continues, with all its dread horrors and all its injuries to the interests of the United States and of other nations. Each party seems quite capable of working great injury and damage to the other, as well as to all the relations and interests dependent on the existence of peace in the island; but they seem incapable of reaching any adjustment, and both have thus far failed of achieving any success whereby one party shall possess and control the island to the exclusion of the other. Under these circumstances the agency of others, either by mediation or by intervention, seems to be the only alternative which must sooner or later be invoked for the termination of the strife. At the same time, while thus impressed, I do not at this time recommend the adoption of any measure of intervention. I shall be ready at all times, and as the equal friend of both parties, to respond to a suggestion that the good offices of the United States will be acceptable to aid in bringing about a peace honorable to both.

It is due to Spain, so far as this Government is concerned, that the agency of a third power, to which I have adverted, shall be adopted only as a last expedient. Had it been the desire of the United States to interfere in the affairs of Cuba repeated opportunities for so doing have been presented within the last few years, but we have remained passive, and have performed our whole duty and all international obligations to Spain with friendship, fairness, and fidelity, and with a spirit of patience and forbearance which negatives every possible suggestion of desire to interfere or to add to the difficulties with which she has been surrounded. The government of Spain has recently submitted to our minister at Madrid certain proposals which it is hoped may be found to be the basis if not the actual submission of terms to meet the requirements of the particular griefs of which this Government has felt itself entitled to complain. These proposals have not yet reached me in their full text. On their arrival they will be taken into careful examination, and may, I hope, lead to a satisfactory adjustment of the questions to which they refer, and remove the possibility of future occurrences such as have given rise to our just complaints. It is understood, also, that renewed efforts are being made to introduce reforms in the internal administration of the island. Persuaded, however, that a proper regard for the interests of the United States and of its citizens entitle it to relief from the strain to which it has been subjected by the difficulties of the questions, and the wrongs and losses which arise from the contest in Cuba, and that the interests of humanity itself demand the cessation of the strife before the whole island shall be laid waste and larger sacrifices of life be made, I shall feel it my duty, should my hopes of a satisfactory adjustment and of the early restoration of peace and the removal of future causes of complaint be unhappily disappointed, to make a further communication to Congress at some period not far remote, and during the present session, recommending what may then seem to me to be necessary.

The Free Zone, so called, several years since established by the Mexican government in certain of the states of that republic adjacent to our frontier, remains in full operation. It has always been materially injurious to honest traffic, for it operates as an incentive to traders in Mexico to supply without customs charges the wants of inhabitants on this side the line, and prevents the same wants from being supplied by merchants of the United States, thereby to a considerable extent defrauding our revenue and checking honest commercial enterprise.

Depredations by armed bands from Mexico on the people of Texas near the frontier continue. Though the main object of these incursions is robbery, they frequently result in the murder of unarmed and peaceably disposed persons, and in some instances even the United States post-offices and mail communications have been attacked. Renewed remonstrances upon this subject have been addressed to the Mexican government, but without much apparent effect. The military force of this Government disposable for service in that quarter is quite inadequate to effectually guard the line even at those points where the incursions are usually made. An experiment of an armed vessel on the Rio Grande for that purpose is on trial, and it is hoped that, if not thwarted by the shallowness of the river and other natural obstacles, it may materially contribute to the protection of the herdsmen of Texas.

The proceedings of the joint commission under the convention between the United States and Mexico of the 4th of July, 1868, on the subject of claims, will soon be brought to a close. The result of those proceedings will then be communicated to Congress.

I am happy to announce that the government of Venezuela has, upon further consideration, practically abandoned its objection to pay to the United States that share of its revenue which some years since it allotted toward the extinguishment of the claims of foreigners generally. In thus reconsidering its determination, that government has shown a just sense of self-respect, which cannot fail to reflect credit upon it in the eyes of all disinterested persons elsewhere. It is to be regretted, however, that its payments on account of claims of citizens of the United States are still so meager in amount and that the stipulations of the treaty in regard to the sums to be paid and the periods when those payments were to take place should have been so signally disregarded.
